one hundred million square miles, and rolls between six hundred million people (Asiatics) on one side, and about three hundred million (Americans and Europeans) on the other. That ocean will be the theater of the triumphs of civilization in the future. It is on that line that are to be fought the great battles of the hereafter. It is there that the institutions of this world will be fashioned and its destinies decided. If this transfer is successful it will no longer be an European civilization or an European destiny that controls us. It will be a higher civilization and a nobler destiny. It may be an American civilization, an American destiny of six hundred million souls. Across that great ocean of the future there is not one that is not a friend of this country, nor a government that is not willing to strike hands with us in any just movement for any just purpose. Russia, China, Japan, India—so far as she is left to herself—even Turkey, the whole of these powers have been and are and still may be, even to the end, friendly to us. As for ourselves we have nothing to fear from Europe. In this future and in the presence of these powers Europe loses, as every nation in time loses, her prestige and becomes subordinate to the new powers in the progress of human civilization and the destiny of nations.

Now, sir, the possession of Alaska is the key of this ocean. It brings this continent within seventy or eighty miles of the Asiatic coast on the north. It gives us the control of the Arctic, whatever it may be, and of that Arctic Ocean we yet know nothing. This Arctic Ocean, too, has a future, it may be a boundless and glorious future, and it is for us. The possession of Alaska makes Behring sea substantially an American sea. It throws out from its peninsula the mysterious chain of Aleutian Islands almost to the Asiatic coast. Our watermen can communicate with an open boat by this strange chain of islands between America and Asia, between the continents of the New and the Old World, and with the aid of the chain of Kurile Islands, reach by the same boat China, Japan, or India, never being more than two or three days at sea, rarely or never out of sight of land, and exposed to as slight perils of the sea as mariners can ever expect to encounter. We can thus return, according to Chevalier, the visits which hundreds of years since the Asiatic people made to America by the same chains of Aleutian and Kurile Islands, who first settled Alaska, California, Mexico, and Central America, and gave to this continent its first faint impress of the coming civilization, traces of which are still seen on the coast and in the interior, in the language and in the customs of the islands, this intermediate communication between the two continents, this drawbridge between America and Asia, these stepping-stones across the Pacific Ocean. If we give them to another government, if we subject the Pacific Ocean to the control of Europe and European civilization, the power of the future is theirs and not ours, and its progress is after their spirit and idea and not ours. Instead of giving new light and leading to new thought other nations, we lose our own, and are followers rather than guides.

General Banks then spoke of the military importance of the acquisition.

I pass now to a consideration of the character and resources of the territory itself.

I received only a day or two since a letter from Mark Whiteman, a native of Russian Poland, who has been in this country twenty-one years, who served the United States in the survey of New Mexico, who went to California in pursuit of gold, thence to Australia, thence to Fraser's river, and then with his companions from the sources of the Stikine in a direct line north, working his way through the whole of Alaska. He says that we know nothing of the great importance of these new possessions; that in every direction it is rich in minerals, and that the natives are peaceful and friendly.

But I do not desire to put my statement solely upon human testimony. There are laws of nature, results of national experience running through many centuries, to which we refer for the support of our conclusions. Since the sixteenth century, until a very recent period, it has been the belief of everybody that the precious metals were confined to the tropics. It was not till California was acquired and gold discovered that this opinion ceased to have control of the public mind.

Moving from the tropics northward we found gold in California, even up to the very boundary of British Columbia. It was then discovered still further northward, at the sources of the Stikine, and the miners are still following it further northward. It was this law of nature so recently discovered that led Mark Whiteman and his associates from the sources of the Stikine river, through Alaska, to the Arctic Ocean, and that exhibited to them up to the ocean itself its limitless mineral wealth.

We have from everybody in Alaska—from miners, from correspondents, from sea-faring men, from lumber-men, from people, from the Arctic Ocean to the Gulf of Mexico. But our visits will be for a different purpose, with nobler results. They returned nothing to the distant lands from which they came. In our return visit we take to the other continent civilization, laws, progress, and the ideas of justice between man and man in the government of nations. Before we have time to go, they come to us. A tale of the Arabian nights has nothing so marvelous as the recent movement of the Chinese nation. Abandoning, of their own motion, the policy of isolation, placing themselves first in the great movements of modern nations, they come first to us because we are territorially nearest and most ready to receive them. They take as their representative one of our own citizens, perhaps least likely to have been selected in advance for such a mission, who has by great good sense, as well as great good fortune, impressed upon them his spirit, and to whom they have confided their hopes and their power. There is nothing left that is impossible. Hereafter our civilization may be theirs. It is based upon the same idea. The civilization of Europe rests upon education of masters, the ignorance of the masses. The civilization of America of the present age and of the future rests upon universal education and intelligence. In China every person of mature age can read and write. Intelligence is at the basis of their government and the source of their power. It is the foundation upon which they construct their classes of society and their orders in government. And however their institutions of the family or the state may differ from ours, where intelligence is the common bond of union and the representative of the common power, as it is with us and with them, we shall be led gently but surely to the same objects and the same end. And they come to us at the moment when by a strange coincidence we push our territorial jurisdiction toward them. Both were animated by the same spirit and without the knowledge of each other moving to the same end by different means.

Now, through the advent of this spirit and power by the possession of Alaska on the north, with the Aleutian Islands in the center, and amicable arrangements not for possession—because we do not press upon others, and certainly not upon feeble nations to deprive them of their property—but with amicable relations of commerce and trade with the government of the Sandwich Islands, which cannot be long postponed, we have in our grasp the control of the Pacific Ocean, and may make this great theater of action for the future whatever we may choose it shall be. But it is indispensable that we shall possess these explorers, from natives, from Russians connected with the government there, and from Americans—confirmation of these deposits they found there. It was exactly the same evidences of the existence of these mineral deposits that were seen fifteen or twenty years ago in California, and later still in British Columbia.

CADWALADER C. WASHBURN [Wis.].—If the gentleman has any authority to show that there are precious metals of any kind in Alaska I beg he will refer me to the document and page where I can find it.

GEN. BANKS.—There is no authority which will convince the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Washburn]. If he could lay his hand on the print in the side he would not believe.

Mark Whiteman found the precious metals himself, and brought them away with him; among others, platina in large quantities, the nature and value of which he did not understand until the specimens which he brought home were analyzed in California.

Many beds of bituminous coal have been discovered on the coast and in the Aleutian Islands. The Russian steamers have long taken coal from the mines of Kodiak, which can furnish it for future commerce for many years yet.

We have received within a few days a carefully prepared and elaborate statement of Professor Davidson, whose opinions cannot be discredited, who says that in this territory is to be found the purest and the best coal upon the Pacific coast.

Pure copper is found in large cubic masses. Copper plates, hammered out by the natives, and with hieroglyphics engraved upon them, the history of their tribes and families, have been found. Silver is also found in many places; also quartz, with sulphate of iron and lead.

There is no doubt whatever about the existence of large quantities of gold on the Stikine river, and also on other streams washing down from the mountains which extend through the whole of this territory.

GEORGE F. MILLER [Pa.].—I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to explain what quantity of the land embraced in this purchase is susceptible of cultivation.

GEN. BANKS.—The territory between the forty-fifth and sixtieth parallels of north latitude, west of the Rocky Mountains, on the Pacific coast, embraces three hundred thousand square miles of cultivable, arable land, according to the statement of the land commissioner, based upon the authority of Mr. Blodgett, the climatologist, a gentleman of Pennsylvania, whose character is perfectly well known and highly appreciated in this country. There are three hundred thousand square miles of cultivable and arable land between the forty-fifth and sixtieth parallels, the greater portion of which is in Russian America—that part between the forty-fifth and fifty-fourth degrees above Vancouver's Island to the Russian possessions, west of the mountains, being narrow and unimportant—according to Mr. Blodgett's statement. The Commissioner of Public Lands says there are twelve million eight hundred thousand acres—twenty thousand square miles—of land which can be brought into cultivation by actual settlers under the present land system of the United States.

The correspondents of the Alta Californian and Journal say there are twenty thousand square miles of cultivable and arable lands in the vicinity of Cook's inlet, which they call the garden of Alaska. There is more arable land in Alaska, according to the official statement of the land office, than there was estimated to be in California when we purchased that country from Mexico.

The testimony of newspaper correspondents and of our own officers and scientific men shows that in many portions of this territory herds-grass, of excellent quality, grows wild without care or culture; white and burr clover are found there; cattle are fat, and beef tender and delicate; oats and barley thrive like native grasses; peas grow at Onalaska in latitude 64°; turnips, potatoes, carrots, beets, cabbages, and other root crops are the main support of the people. Winter gooseberries, blackberries, cranberries, raspberries, huckleberries, and thimbleberries are abundant. The rose, poppy, marigold, astrea, and holly-hock grow in perfection in the gardens of the officers at Sitka. Plants are found in the Arctic regions which belong to a temperate climate. Poisonous plants are few and not virulent, and reptiles, toads, and lizards are never seen.

This is the character of the country in its agricultural aspect. It is covered with gigantic pine forests, with the exception of a strip of land upon the northern coast opposite Behring Strait. Trees measure between three and six feet.

The timber of Alaska consists of white fir, spruce fir, white and yellow pine, cedar and hemlock, alder, some oak, and a few other species of timber of which we know little. The Alaska cedar for ship-building is the best in the world. An imperial commission of the French Government sitting at Toulon in 1860 reported that masts and spars from Vancouver's Island are superior to those from Riga. The timber of Alaska is of the the fisheries of the northwestern coast of North America. Now, here are two hundred and forty thousand square miles of fishing grounds, which will give occupation to at least one hundred and twenty thousand men in the cod and halibut fisheries alone. The fisheries of the United States return every year a product of $34,000,000, four-fifths of which is from the whale and cod fishing. Of that we obtain our share now from the eighty-four thousand square miles of the fisheries of the northeast coast of America, sharing its wealth with England and France, who have by far the best opportunities, to whose fishing grounds we are admitted only upon the payment of onerous tonnage taxes. By this purchase we treble the extent of the fisheries of which we have exclusive possession, and of course we obtain a corresponding increase of employment and product.

I come now to a question of practical importance. What is the value of these things to us? They add to the industrial product of the country, from native industries alone, employment for fishermen, lumbermen, miners, colliers, mariners, ship-builders, trappers, hunters, farmers, ice-cutters, and traders. From the native industries of this possession, carrying nothing there but men, we will find, when the resources of the territory are fully developed, employment for two hundred and fifty thousand persons. A quarter of a million of people will be engaged in peaceful, honorable, profitable, national, native industries in this territory alone. And, allowing each man to represent a family of four persons, it will furnish a support for a population of a million souls.

Who is interested in this purchase? The Pacific States. Will you say to them that it is worthless; that we do not want it; that the Government has no right to acquire it? They know better. They know that the possession of this territory is hereafter identified with the prosperity of this Government and the development and increase of our industry. California proved herself a fast and important friend of this Government in our hour of trial. She gave the whole Pacific coast to the cause of liberty and union, and to us, through the Providence of God, the victory. She asks now the extension of our interests on the Pacific coast. With what grace can the East deny her request? With what justice can the Mississippi valley, that was acquired by a similar treaty, deny to California a favor which, while it strengthens her interests, enlarges, consolidates, and extends those of the whole country?

At every step from 1780 up to this hour Russia has been our friend. In the darkest hour of our peril, when France same quality as that of Vancouver's Island. The hemlock will be used for tanning hides, which are abundant in Siberia, and the alder is extensively used in curing fish.

Gentlemen tell us, although this timber may exist in quantities and of the excellent character described, it is of no use, because we have enough elsewhere. They forget that the world changes. Everywhere we see evidences that this continent is being rapidly stripped of its forests, which once covered it as they now cover Alaska.

At any rate, we cannot have too much timber. What is the market for the timber of the Pacific coast? It is, in the first place, Russia, China, Japan, India, Australia, California, Mexico, South America, all the countries that line the coasts of the Pacific Ocean. We send it also to the Atlantic side of South America, and even into the Gulf of Mexico on that side. The unsurpassed masts and spars of the Pacific coast are sent to every port in every part of the world. Who is here to say that we have too much of this property, or that it is a crime to increase our supply?

Let me come now to the matter of the fisheries. When the committee were considering the matter of the fisheries, a statement from the officers of the Coast Survey relating to the quantity of fish found in these bays and rivers was presented, and it was so extravagant that gentlemen of the committee thought it would be better to omit it in the report.

Mr. Chairman, there is in no part of the world, except on a small scale in the fjords of Norway, anything like the arrangement of the bays and rivers and islands on the Alaska coast. Here is an ocean covering a hundred million square miles that has never been fished so far as we know. When we consider the vast multitude of fish that the Pacific Ocean must contain we can very well believe that when storms drive them into these bays they are as numerous as they are represented to be. It is not a matter of fancy, but a matter of fact. The Indians from all portions of Alaska go down to the coast when, from indications which they get from the flight of birds, whose flocks darken the heavens, that the fish are coming in schools upon the coast, and lay in their supply for the year. These waters abound in whale, cod, halibut, salmon, and all the varieties of fish that inhabit the cold waters. The whale has abandoned the seas of the northeast coast and is pursued to seas adjacent to Alaska, twenty thousand miles from whence he is followed into the Arctic Ocean. The superintendent of the Bureau of Statistics informs me that there are sixty thousand men engaged every year in and England were contemplating the recognition of the rebel confederacy, the whole world was thrilled by the appearance in San Francisco of a Russian fleet, and nearly at the same time, whether by accident or design, a second Russian fleet appeared in the harbor of New York. Who knew how many more there were on the voyage here? From that hour, France on one hand and England on the other recoiled, and the American Government regained its position and power.

Now, shall we flout the Russian Government in every court of Europe for her friendship? Having sought from her for twenty-five years the fisheries of the northwest coast, and having received from her not only the incident of the fisheries but the substance of the territorial possession incident to the fisheries, shall we do what never before has been done, refuse to execute the treaty she has made at our solicitation with our own Government, upon the conditions and according to the letter of our own Constitution? I do not believe it. Whoever of the Representatives of the American people in this House on this question turns his back not only upon his duty, but upon the friends of his country, upon the Constitution of his Government, the honor of his generation, cannot long remain in power.

There is one precedent we must dismiss from memory before we can do that. We must erase from our history the glorious incident of Jackson's administration, when he compelled France to pay under a treaty contracted with us, and when France answered, as we are now urged to answer, that the appropriation of money was another matter. Although she was the best friend we had, yet Jackson asserted he would compel the execution of the treaty at the hazard of war. Gentlemen cannot make a distinction between that case and the one now presented. If we do refuse to appropriate this money, when we owe another government under treaty stipulations, it will be a greater dishonor than our country yet has known.

Mr. Washburn replied to General Banks on the following day (July 1).

If gentlemen will come down from the region of the clouds to which they were transported by the honorable gentleman, and from those realms of fancy and imagination in which he revealed, to plain matters of every-day fact, I shall not despair of doing something yet to protect the rights of my constituents and of the people of this country.

Gentlemen could not fail to observe all through the speech made by the gentleman on yesterday the extreme lack of authorities to sustain his statements, and the great preponderance, instead, of spread-eagle oratory. Sir, I shall enter into no contest with the gentleman in the eagle business; I resign that to him altogether. But I shall ask those members who have not arrived at the sublime position of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who declared "that he did not rely on human testimony, that he was above it"—I shall ask those gentleman who do care for such testimony to listen while I unfold the facts that surround this most extraordinary case.

I shall attempt to demonstrate five propositions, and if I shall succeed in doing so I think I may claim the judgment of this committee and of the House. Those propositions are:

1. That at the time this treaty was negotiated not a soul in the whole United States asked for it.
2. That it was secretly negotiated and in a manner to prevent the representatives of the people from being heard.
3. That by existing treaties we possessed every right that is of any value to us without the responsibility and never-ending expense of governing a nation of savages.
4. That the country is absolutely without value.
5. That it is the right and duty of the House to inquire into the treaty, and vote or not vote the money according to its best judgment.

My first proposition is that on the 30th day of March, 1867, the day on which this treaty was signed, there was not a man in the whole length and breadth of the United States who had ever conceived the idea that this territory of Alaska was a valuable territory for the United States to possess; not even the gentleman from Massachusetts, though he now declares it to be absolutely necessary to the very safety and existence of this nation. Even on the Pacific coast, which is now said to be clamorous for it, no such idea had entered the brain of any man there.

As to the gentleman's point that we are in honor bound to appropriate money to execute treaties, I would say that, although the House has never refused to appropriate money to carry out treaties, it has, nevertheless, asserted its right to do so, and the point has never been yielded; and when money has been voted to execute treaties it has always been on the ground that the House approved them, and not because it was believed that they were under any obligation to do so.

On this point I invite attention to the opinion of Judge John McLean, of the Supreme Court of the United States. The treaty of Paris, negotiated in 1831. But that case is in no sense parallel to the one under consideration. There the claim of this Government existed long before the treaty was negotiated. The treaty merely liquidated the amount which France was to pay. Our right to the money was perfect and complete before the treaty was made, and a refusal to pay it was as much a cause of war before the treaty as afterward; and had there been no treaty liquidating the amount, the right to demand payment would still have existed, and, if need be, to use force to compel it.

Every intelligent man must see that if we had an existing treaty with Russia that gave us the right to trade on that coast, the right to fish on that coast, the right to land and cure fish on the coast, and the right to visit the interior waters and trade with the natives, we had virtually everything that is desirable, and that there could be no excuse for this treaty. Neither the chairman of the committee nor any other gentleman will dispute that if we could have those privileges it would be better for us to have them without the responsibility and never-ending expense of ruling and governing a nation of savages. Now the gentleman from Massachusetts undertakes to say that we had no such treaty rights. As these things are denied, it is made my duty to prove them.

In 1832 a treaty was negotiated with Russia, the negotiators being Hon. James Buchanan on the part of the United States and Count Nesselrode on the part of Russia. That treaty gave us the rights I have mentioned, and was of full force and effect at the time of the negotiation of the late treaty for the purchase of Russian America.

The gentleman says that this treaty was abrogated. I take issue with him. This treaty having been in existence ten years, that provision of it in article four, which allowed our people to go inland into the harbors and bays and rivers to trade with the natives, was abrogated, and the reason assigned was that our people went there not for the purpose of legitimate trade, but for the purpose of selling whiskey and firearms to the Indians; and that provision was therefore abrogated after a long conference and correspondence between the State Department, through Mr. Forsyth, and the Russian Government. Mr. Forsyth maintained always, and never yielded the point, that under the first article of the treaty we had the right of landing on the coast, but not to visit the interior bays, and that right was not and could not be terminated.

This treaty of which I speak—the treaty of 1832—has never case of Turner vs. American Baptist Missionary Union (5 McLean, 344) decides as follows:

"A treaty is the supreme law of the land only when the treaty-making power can carry it into effect.

"A treaty which stipulates for the payment of money undertakes to do that which the treaty-making power cannot do; therefore the treaty is not the supreme law of the land.

"To give it the effect the action of Congress is necessary. And in this action the Representatives and Senators act on their own judgment and responsibility, and not on the judgment and responsibility of the treaty-making power.

"A foreign government may be presumed to know the power of appropriating money belongs to Congress.

"No act of any part of the Government can be held to be a law which has not all the sanctions to make it law."

But it is said that Russia has given us possession, and for that reason we should vote the money. Quite otherwise. Why was possession taken by the Executive of this Government and yielded by Russia before the money was paid or even voted? No interest of this Government was suffering for the want of immediate possession, and it is believed that no benefit could arise to this Government from having possession before the time stipulated for the payment of the money. The same may be said in regard to Russia, unless the country was so worthless that every day she held possession was a positive damage to her, and for that reason she was in haste to be rid of it. It requires no great stretch of imagination to divine the scarcely hidden causes which governed the parties negotiating this treaty in stipulating for immediate possession. They could hardly have failed to foresee that this treaty would be strongly opposed in this House, and that upon its merits it could have no chance for the necessary appropriation. An extraordinary pressure was seen to be necessary, and that pressure was sought for in giving and taking possession.

Will this House allow itself to be coerced by any such performance? To state the question is to answer it. But it is said that Russia, our best friend, will be offended if we fail to appropriate the money. I fully recognize the friendly character of the Russian Government in the past, and the importance of cultivating friendly relations in the future; but, for the reason stated, it is denied that any just ground of offence can exist if this House fails to sanction the treaty. It is maintained that the refusal to appropriate money to carry this treaty into execution would be cause of war on the part of Russia, and the action of President Jackson is cited, in the case of the refusal of France to pay the money stipulated to be paid in the been abrogated, and never can be abrogated until a certain notice has been given, which never has been yet given. It is a good and valid treaty to-day; and under that treaty we are entitled to all the rights which they have granted to Great Britain or to any other country, including the fishing rights granted to Great Britain in 1859.

Gentlemen who have looked into this matter will have discovered that when this treaty was first negotiated the proposition was to pay only $7,000,000; that was the original agreement. But Mr. Seward insisted that it should be free from all incumbrances; and Mr. Stoeckl agreed to that, and then Mr. Seward said very mildly, without inquiring what those incumbrances were: "I will give you a couple of hundred thousand dollars in gold in addition if you will do so." Of course Mr. Stoeckl agreed to take the additional $200,000 in coin.

Now, I will tell you what those incumbrances are, and which are not yet removed, and which cannot be removed. First, the treaty with Great Britain, which cannot be abrogated for ten years from 1859, and which gives them the right to navigate these rivers forever.

GENERAL BANKS.—It is not provided by that treaty that Great Britain shall have the right to navigate the rivers of Russian America forever. It provides that in relation to the rivers rising in British Columbia and passing through this portion of Russian America in front of British Columbia the right of navigation shall be secured to Great Britain. It is a right which covers the Stikine only, and it is a right which this country has claimed from its very foundation; that where a river takes its rise in one country and passes through another country the people of the country where the river took its rise have the right to follow the river to its mouth.

MR. WASHBURN.—This provision does not apply to the Stikine river only. Every river of any importance in Alaska rises in British America, and the British people have the right to navigate those rivers forever. By that same treaty Sitka is guaranteed to Great Britain as a free port for the term of ten years. It is a free port to-day for the Government of Great Britain. Does the gentleman deny it? Yet here he asks us to pay $7,200,000 in gold for this territory before these incumbrances are removed.

GENERAL BANKS.—The ten years will have expired next year.

MR. WASHBURN.—Very well; when the incumbrance is removed it will be time enough to talk about paying this money for it. And how do you propose to remove the incumbrances on the rivers which are made free to Great Britain forever? The sailors, traders, and fishermen of Great Britain have the right to-day to go into all the interior waters of Alaska under this treaty; just the same right that our people have. Great Britain to-day has the same right on the coast of Alaska that we have, except the miserable privilege of governing the fifty, sixty, or seventy thousand wretched savages there. And yet the gentleman comes in here and coolly asks us to vote $7,200,000 in gold for this territory.

Now, sir, this treaty was negotiated in secret. I say it was negotiated in such a manner that the representatives of the people might not know of it, as it was justly feared they would protest against it. The negotiation was carried on here while we were in session in March, 1867. Mr. Stoeckl, on the 25th of March, 1867, said to Mr. Seward that he would accept his proposition. The trade was closed between them, but they kept it a profound secret until our adjournment. Why? This House adjourned on the 30th of March, 1867, at twelve o'clock. On the same day was signed this treaty in Washington. I believe that signatures were withheld until after our adjournment that no remonstrance could be heard from the representatives of the people.

I wish I had time to answer every proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts at length; but I cannot follow him in his flights of fancy. He pictured Alaska as the finest country upon the face of the earth. He declared solemnly there was no country on the face of God's earth which could support as many industries as Alaska. He said it would support one million people in more industries than any other country. He told us it was a magnificent agricultural country. If gentlemen would like through the eye to have an idea of this territory, of Alaska, they can look upon a photograph of Sitka which I have here, the most favorable place upon the coast. [Here Mr. Washburn held up a large photograph.] They have established themselves on various places, but had finally to give them up and confine themselves to Sitka. We have testimony that there are not a dozen acres of arable land in the neighborhood of Sitka, yet we are told by the Commissioner of the General Land Office that there are twelve million acres of arable land in Alaska. He has no information of his own, and yet he undertakes to instruct us and make statements that have no foundation whatever. He has written a letter containing an "infinite deal of nothing." He has no authority for anything not act entirely upon his own judgment when he bought this territory. I believe the fact to be that when he conceived the idea of purchasing it he telegraphed to General Halleck, at San Francisco, to inquire of him how much it would do to pay for Alaska, and General Halleck replied that it would answer to pay from five to ten million dollars. Mr. Seward thought it would not be quite right to offer the smallest sum; so he split the difference and offered $7,000,000.

The treaty having been negotiated, it became necessary to get it through the Senate; and the first piece of machinery is a telegram from General Halleck, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, April 4, 1867.

HON. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War:

I learn from a gentleman who has recently visited many parts of Russian America that its value is greater than has been supposed. The rejection of the treaty will cause great dissatisfaction on this coast, especially in California.

H. W. HALLECK, Major General.

This dispatch was instantly made public here to operate on the Senate. It will be observed that he says that its rejection would cause great dissatisfaction in California. How could he know that? No man in California or Washington not behind the scenes knew that any such scheme was on foot on the 4th day of April, the date of his dispatch. Now, sir, there is no evidence produced that any desire for this acquisition existed on the Pacific coast, either at the time the treaty was negotiated or now. A leading Republican paper of California, one of the ablest, if not the ablest, in the State, the Sacramento Union, as late as November last speaks of the treaty in very contemptuous terms, calls Alaska a terra incognita, and says: "That persons well informed as to Alaska are ungrateful enough to hint that we could have bought a much superior elephant in Siam or Bombay for one hundredth part of the money, with not a ten thousandth part of the expense incurred in keeping the animal in proper condition."

After the treaty was negotiated Captain Howard, of the revenue service, was sent up to explore Alaska. He was told to look for fishing banks, for coal, and for precious metals. I have his report here.

In regard to minerals, the geologist of the expedition, Mr. Blake, says that "exaggerated ideas have been formed of the mineral wealth of Alaska." None of these gentlemen succeeded in finding mineral wealth of any kind there, although they were constantly in pursuit of it.

he says. There is not one grain of wheat in this bushel of chaff. He talks of deposits of gold. I defy any living man upon the face of the earth to produce any evidence that an ounce of gold was ever extracted from the territory of Alaska.

My friend from Massachusetts gets up here and tells us there are over twelve million acres of arable land in Alaska, and that it is capable of sustaining a thrifty and happy population of over one million freemen. Now, sir, without resorting to that kind of testimony that he has brought in, I have official documents from St. Petersburg of a date no longer ago than August last. Mr. Seward, dear soul, in his simplicity of heart, wrote to Cassius M. Clay, Minister to Russia, to ascertain what system of disposing of lands prevailed in Alaska. Well, Mr. Clay submitted that letter to the Russian Cabinet, and I think I see them reading it, and they must have had a very jolly time of it at the expense of the Secretary of State. Here is the answer they gave:

"The native population of each separate island is so insignificant that the inhabitants of any one could not meet with the slightest cause of collision of interest in the use of lands; in addition to this, the soil itself being perfectly barren and unfit either for agricultural or grazing purposes, there was no reason why the natives should endeavor to extend the limits of their lands."

"There was even less ground for the enactment of any particular regulations in view of immigrant settlers. Who can ever have a mind to settle in that country, where permanent fogs and dampness of atmosphere and want of solar heat and light, leaving out of the question anything like agriculture, make it impossible to provide even a sufficient supply of hay for cattle, and where man, from want of bread, salt, and meat, to escape scurvy must constantly live upon fish, berries, shell-fish, sea-cabbages, and other products of the sea, soaking them profusely with the grease of sea beasts. The Aleutian Islands may attract transient traders, but no permanent settlers; to inhabit them one must be an Aleute; and, if it were not for the sea surrounding the islands, this country, owing to its unfavorable climatic conditions and the sterility of its ground, would have never been inhabited at all."

This is the paradise which we heard depicted in such eloquent terms yesterday, and I was almost led to believe that the generally received account we have that the Garden of Eden was on the green banks of the Euphrates was a mistake, and that the paradise of our first parents was really on "Oonalaska's shore."

But, sir, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the influences that have been brought to bear to induce this House to vote this appropriation. It dates back to the time when the treaty was first negotiated. I believe I state nothing more than the fact when I say that the Secretary of State did

GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

Exaggerated reports in regard to this country in reference to its furs have been circulated. Mr. Wilson, in his letter, says that the value of the fur seals alone is over half a million annually.

Now, I assert—and I have the facts and figures to prove it—that the fur trade is becoming rapidly exhausted, and that the total value of all the furs gathered in Alaska is considerably less than two hundred thousand dollars a year, and is diminishing from year to year with great rapidity.

Mr. Bulkeley, who says that the seal fisheries alone could be made to pay for Alaska, admits himself that unless the seal fisheries are protected as the Russians protected them they will not last any length of time. And Professor Davidson says that with the utmost care on the part of the Russian authorities the furs and fur-bearing animals have rapidly diminished from year to year. With the transfer to this Government, and the consequent invasion of the country by our people, it can safely be said that the fur trade will soon cease to exist. Under the Russian system they only captured about thirty-three thousand seals a year, which, at three dollars a piece, their highest value, is $99,000; and yet we are told that the seal trade will pay for the whole purchase. Now, if under the Russian system they received less than $100,000 a year for the fur seals captured, how long would it take to pay off this debt of $7,200,000? It is a good deal like the sum that used to be in the arithmetic about the frog at the bottom of the well jumping up two feet and falling back three feet each day, and about the time that the frog would get to the surface you would pay off this debt from the fur seal trade.

In regard to salmon, we read of such immense numbers up those streams that they are driven up on the shores, forming winrows three feet in depth, and that they sell for seven cents a pound in gold, and we are also informed that the bears come down from the mountains to feed upon them, their dainty appetites selecting only the heads, rejecting the other parts of the salmon altogether. This is told in the report of the majority of the committee, and we are gravely asked to believe it, and the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated substantially the same in his speech, and gave us the philosophy of it. Wilson, the philosopher, must look to his laurels.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that there are many salmon in the rivers of Alaska. That is also the case in regard to the rivers of Washington Territory and Oregon. Inexhaustible numbers of salmon annually visit the rivers, sounds, and bays of our western coast, and we have now no occasion, and will have no occasion for a hundred years to come, to visit the rivers of Alaska for salmon.

The gentleman from Massachusetts also quotes the testimony of Captain Bryant, who says that Behring Sea is an immense reservoir for codfish. Yet Colonel Bulkley, of the telegraphic expedition, whom my friend from Massachusetts says is good authority, says there are few or no codfish in Behring Sea, and he, too, gives the "philosophy" why codfish do not exist up in that sea.

There is one other subject that I ought to speak of, and that is the timber of this region. I will only say that it does not exist to any extent on the Aleutian Islands, nor north of Cook's inlet, and that what there is on the inaccessible mountains that skirt the coast south of Mount St. Elias, and along a strip of country but thirty miles wide.

Now I think, Mr. Chairman, I have pretty clearly demonstrated the utter worthlessness of this Alaska territory. You are not simply asked to appropriate $7,200,000 in gold for a worthless country—if we could get off with that I might, perhaps, be content to submit to it—but with this $7,200,000 come the annual expenses of this territory, in my judgment amounting to several million dollars a year, with no corresponding return.

You will recollect, Mr. Chairman, that I called attention to the agency of a gallant general on the Pacific coast in forcing this purchase upon the country. I will now read from a letter of his of May 22, 1867, to the Adjutant-General of the army, in which he gives his opinion as to how much this country will cost us. After we had acquired it he began to see its true character. He says:

"This country and the adjacent British territory contain a very large Indian population, some of whose tribes are warlike, and of a character far superior to those of Oregon, California, Nevada, and adjacent countries. Should our Indian system, with its treaties, annuities, agents, frauds, and speculations, be introduced there, Indian wars must inevitably follow, and instead of a few companies for its military occupation as many regiments will be called for, with the resulting expenditure of many million dollars every year."

Such are the kind of inhabitants you acquire with Alaska. It is said this is only a little sum; only $7,200,000. Yes, sir; it is only $7,200,000. But let me tell gentlemen that if they pass this appropriation it will be but a few days before you

He maintained that it was in evidence before the House officially "that for ten years the entire product of the whole country of Alaska did not exceed three million dollars."

John A. Peters (Maine) pronounced the territory "intrinsically valueless, the conclusive proof of which is found in the fact that Russia is willing to sell it." He criticised the action of the Senate in negotiating the treaty.

"If the treaty-making power can buy, they can sell. If they can buy land with money, they can buy money with land. If they can buy a part of a country, they can buy the whole of a country. If they can sell a part of our country, they can sell the whole of it!"

Rufus P. Spalding (Ohio) on the other hand maintained that "notwithstanding all the sneers that have been cast on Alaska, if it could be sold again, individuals would take it off our hands and pay us two or three millions for the bargain."¹

General Robert C. Schenck (Ohio) thought the purchase in itself highly objectionable, but was "willing to vote the money because the treaty had been made with a friendly power; one of those that stood by us, almost the only one that stood by us when all the rest of the powers of the world seemed to be turning away from us in our recent troubles."

Thaddeus Stevens (Pennsylvania) supported the measure on the ground that it was a valuable acquisition to the wealth and power of the country. He argued also in favor of the right of the Senate to make the treaty.

Leonard Myers (Pennsylvania) was sure that if we did not acquire Alaska it would be transferred to Great Britain.

"The nation which struggled so hard for Vancouver and her present Pacific boundary, and which still insists on having the little island of San Juan, will never let such an opportunity slip. Canada, as matters now stand, would become ours some will hear of the ratification by the Senate of the treaty for the purchase of St. Thomas; and if the doctrine of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] obtains here, you cannot avoid paying $7,500,000 more for the purchase of St. Thomas. Now, the gentleman will not say that St. Thomas is not as valuable a purchase as Alaska. If we pay for Alaska we shall pay for St. Thomas.

But are we to stop with the purchase of Alaska and St. Thomas? No, sir. I believe a treaty is now being negotiated with Denmark for the purchase of Greenland and Iceland. [Laughter.] Well, gentlemen, laugh at it. I tell gentlemen who go for Alaska that Greenland to-day is a better purchase. And the man who votes for Alaska must vote for Greenland or he will be an inconsistent man. This is not mere loose talk. I have had placed upon my table since I began to speak to-day some pages of a document now printing at the Government Printing Office for the State Department, which shows that the purchase of Greenland is in contemplation.

Men talk about "manifest destiny," and assure us that we are destined to absorb this entire continent, and the idea seems so grand that no one feels inclined to count the cost or inquire into consequences. When that day comes we shall cease to be the "United States," but "States dissevered, discordant, belligerent." Sir, I will be no party to the inauguration of this policy you now propose, of acquiring remote and worthless possessions at the expense of my constituents, and to them I appeal for my justification.

Other speeches upon the Alaska Purchase are thus summarized by Mr. Blaine in his "Twenty Years of Congress":

General Benjamin F. Butler (Massachusetts) sustained Mr. Washburn's position in a characteristic speech, especially answering General Banks' argument that we should pay this amount from a spirit of friendship for Russia.

"If we are to pay this price as usury on the friendship of Russia, we are paying for it very dear indeed. If we are to pay for her friendship, I desire to give her the seven million two hundred thousand dollars in cash, and let her keep Alaska, because I think it may be a small sum to give for the friendship if we could only get rid of the land, or rather the ice, which we are to get by paying for it."

day could her people learn to be Americans; but never if England secures Alaska."

William Higby (California) answered the objections relating to climate.

"I do not know whether the people of the East yet believe what has been so often declared, that our winters on the Pacific are nearly as mild as our summers, and yet such is the fact."

Samuel Shellabarger (Ohio) opposed the purchase. He said those nations which had been compact and solid had been the most enduring, while those which had the most extended territory lasted the least space of time.

Hiram Price (Iowa) thought that it was "far better to expend the $7,200,000 in improving the Mississippi river, in order that bread-stuffs may be transported cheaply from the West to the seaboard." He had no faith in the value of the territory proposed to be purchased.

Dennis McCarthy (New York) rejected the plea that we should purchase Alaska because Russia is a friendly power.

"I ask this House whence this friendship comes. It comes from self-interest. She is the absorbing power of the eastern continent, and she recognizes us as the absorbing power of the western continent; and through friendship for us she desires to override and overbalance the governments of Europe which are between her and us."

General Butler moved a proviso, that:

"The payment of $500,000 of said appropriation be withheld until the imperial government of Russia shall signify its willingness to refer to an impartial tribunal all such claims by American citizens against the imperial government as have been investigated by the State Department of the United States and declared to be just, and the amounts so awarded to be paid from said $500,000 so withheld."

General James A. Garfield, presiding at the time over the Committee of the Whole, ruled it out of order, and on an appeal being taken the decision was sustained by 93 ayes and 27 nays. After dilatory motions and the offer of various amendments which were rejected the bill was passed on July 14 by 113 ayes and 43 nays.

The House prefaced the bill by a preamble, asserting in effect that "the subjects embraced in the treaty are among those which by the Constitution are submitted to the power of Congress, and over which Congress has jurisdiction, and for these reasons it is necessary that the consent of Congress should be given to the said stipulations before the same can have full force and effect." There was no mention of the Senate's ratification, merely a reference to the fact that "the President has entered into a treaty with the Emperor of Russia, and has agreed to pay him the sum of seven million, two hundred thousand dollars in coin." The House by this preamble evidently claimed that its consent to the treaty was just as essential as the consent of the Senate—that it was, in short, a subject for the consideration of Congress.

The Senate was unwilling to admit such a pretension, especially when put forth by the House in this bald form, and therefore rejected the bill unanimously. The matter was sent to conference, and by changing the preamble a compromise was promptly effected, which preserved the rank and dignity of both branches. It declared that "whereas the President had entered into a treaty with the Emperor of Russia, and the Senate thereafter gave its advice and consent to said treaty, . . . and whereas said stipulations cannot be carried into full force and effect, except by legislation to which the consent of both Houses of Congress is necessary; therefore be it enacted that there be appropriated the sum of $7,200,000" for the purpose named. With this compromise the bill was readily passed and became a law by the President's approval July 27, 1868.

The preamble finally agreed upon, says Mr. Blaine, though falling far short of the one first adopted by the House, was yet regarded as a victory for that branch. The issue between the Senate and the House, now adjusted by a compromise, was an old one, agitated at different periods ever since the controversy over the Jay treaty in 1794-95. It is simply whether the House is bound to vote for an appropriation to carry out a treaty constitutionally made by the President and the Senate without judging for itself whether, on the merits of the treaty, the appropriation should be made.

CHAPTER XV

THE ALABAMA CLAIMS

Depredations by the Alabama and Other Confederate Privateers on Northern Commerce—Great Britain's Complicity in the Matter—Her Early Refusal to Grant Redress—Johnson-Clarendon Treaty: Senator Charles Sumner [Mass.] Opposes Its Confirmation; It Is Rejected—Negotiations Reopened by Great Britain—Treaty of Washington Submits the Alabama and Other Disputes with Great Britain to Arbitration—Alabama Arbitrators Find in Favor of the United States—Minor British Claims Allowed—Canadian Boundary Dispute Settled in Favor of the United States.

THE Declaration of Paris, adopted by the chief European nations, including Great Britain, in 1856, abolished privateering. The Confederate Government, however, adopted the practice as one of its first acts, and a number of privateers set out from Southern ports to harass the commerce of the North. Meanwhile Queen Victoria had issued a proclamation of neutrality in the American war, according belligerent rights to both contestants, and forbidding her subjects to equip or aid vessels of either party. Notwithstanding this, harbors such as Nassau in the British West Indies became the refuge of Confederate cruisers—privateers no less than blockade runners.

Against this practice Charles Francis Adams, the American minister to Great Britain, made firm and frequent protests which were not heeded.

The Confederate privateer Alabama was the most notorious offender against the Declaration of Paris. She was built at Birkenhead, England, ostensibly for the use of British subjects, but under circumstances which indicated that this purpose was a subterfuge, and that, so soon as she was on the high seas, she would be turned over to Confederates for privateering purpose. While she was building Minister Adams repeatedly protested to the British Government that this was the purpose, and, after delaying until she was ready to sail, the Government took feeble measures to detain her. These were evaded by the vessel, known simply as "No. 290," sailing without registry or clearance on July 29, 1862. She took on her equipment from two English vessels in the Azores, assumed the name Alabama, and, under command of Raphael Semmes, began her career of depredation on United States commerce. She had destroyed seventy United States vessels, before her own destruction on June 19, 1864, near Cherbourg, France, by the United States war vessel, the Kearsarge, John A. Winslow, commander. Captain Semmes escaped on a private English yacht.

In similar manner other Confederate privateers such as the Florida, Georgia and Shenandoah were aided by British subjects, and in this escaped the attention of British officials. These, too, committed many depredations on United States commerce, the total direct damage of all the cruisers being enormous. The secondary damage arising from the decrease of American shipping for fear of loss and from high insurance rates was incalculable. These losses greatly increased the strength of the contention of the Peace party in the North that the war should be stopped before the commerce and industry of the country were irreparably injured. Thereby Mr. Lincoln's Government was greatly impeded in the prosecution of the war.

At the close of the war in 1865 Minister Adams proposed to Lord John Russell, the British foreign secretary under Lord Palmerston, premier (whom Russell succeeded in the same year as premier), that the matter be submitted to friendly arbitration. This proposal was flatly refused. Thereupon William H. Seward, the United States Secretary of State, notified the British Government that no further efforts for arbitration would be made. In August, 1866, he submitted to the British Government a list of individual claims for damages inflicted by the Alabama. Mr. Stanley, who had succeeded to the office of British foreign secretary under the administration of his father, the Earl of Derby, who had followed Russell, decisively declined to receive the claims. The Earl of Derby died in 1868 and was succeeded by Benjamin Disraeli, later Earl of Beaconsfield.

In May, 1868, Minister Adams retired from his mission, and in June, 1868, Reverdy Johnson succeeded him. Before he could reopen negotiations on the Alabama claims Disraeli was succeeded by William E. Gladstone, and Lord Stanley, in the Foreign Office, by the Earl of Clarendon.

With Lord Clarendon, Minister Johnson, with the approval of Secretary Seward, promptly agreed upon a treaty in the matter, which reached the United States in February, 1869. It was presented to the Senate, which acted upon it in executive (secret) session. Charles Sumner (Massachusetts), chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, opposed confirmation of the treaty in a speech in executive session on April 13, 1869. Later, after confirmation had been refused, the injunction of secrecy was removed by order of the Senate, and the speech was published in the Congressional Globe.

OUR CLAIMS ON ENGLAND

SENATOR SUMNER

I do not disguise the importance of this act; but I believe that, in the interest of peace, which every one should have at heart, the treaty must be rejected. A treaty which, instead of removing an existing grievance, leaves it for heart-burning and rancor, cannot be considered a settlement of pending questions between two nations. It may seem to settle them, but does not. It is nothing but a snare. And such is the character of the treaty now before us. The massive grievance under which our country suffered for years is left untouched; the painful sense of wrong planted in the national heart is allowed to remain. For all this there is not one word of regret or even of recognition; nor is there any semblance of compensation. It cannot be for the interest of either party that such a treaty should be ratified. It cannot promote the interest of the United States, for we naturally seek justice as the foundation of a good understanding with Great Britain; nor can it promote the in-

The treaty not merely makes no provision for the determination of the great question, but it seems to provide expressly that it shall never hereafter be presented. The petty provision for individual claims, subject to a set-off from the individual claims of England, so that in the end our country may possibly receive nothing, is the consideration for this strange surrender. I borrow a term from an English statesman on another occasion, if I call it a "capitulation." For the settlement of a few individual claims we condone the original, far-reaching, and destructive wrong.

Whatever the treaty may say in terms, there is no settlement in fact, and, until this is made, there will be a constant menace of discord. Nor can it be forgotten that there is no recognition of the rule of international duty applicable to such cases. This, too, is left unsettled.

While doing so little for us the treaty makes ample provision for all known claims on the British side. As these are exclusively "individual" they are completely covered by the text, which has no limitations or exceptions. Already it is announced in England that even those of "confederate bondholders" are included. I have before me an English journal which describes the latter claims as founded on "immense quantities of cotton, worth at the time of their seizure nearly two shillings a pound, which were then in the legal possession of those bondholders"; and the same authority adds, "these claims will be brought, indifferently with others, before the designed joint commission whenever it shall sit." From another quarter I learn that these bondholders are "very sanguine of success under the treaty as it is worded, and certain it is that the loan went up from 0 to 10 as soon as it was ascertained that the treaty was signed." I doubt if the American people are ready just now to provide for any such claims. That they have risen in the markets is an argument against the treaty.

Passing from the treaty, I come now to consider briefly, but with proper precision, the true ground of complaint; and here again we shall see the constant inadequacy of the remedy now applied.

Here the speaker recalled British recognition of Confederate belligerency on the sea as well as on the land.

Ocean belligerency being a "fact," and not a "principle," can be recognized only on evidence showing its actual existence, according to the rule, first stated by Mr. Canning and afterward terest of Great Britain, which must also seek a real settlement of all pending questions.

If we look at the negotiation, which immediately preceded the treaty, we find little to commend. You have it on your table. I think I am not mistaken when I say that it shows a haste which finds few precedents in diplomacy, but which is explained by the anxiety to reach a conclusion before the advent of a new Administration. Mr. Seward and Mr. Reverdy Johnson both unite in this unprecedented activity, using the Atlantic cable freely. I should not object to haste or to the freest use of the cable if the result were such as could be approved; but, considering the character of the transaction, and how completely the treaty conceals the main cause of offence, it seems as if the honorable negotiators were engaged in huddling something out of sight.

The treaty has for its model the Claims Convention of 1853. To take such a convention as a model was a strange mistake. This convention was for the settlement of outstanding claims of American citizens on Great Britain, and of British subjects on the United States, which had arisen since the treaty of Ghent in 1815. It concerned individuals only and not the nation. It was not in any respect political; nor was it to remove any sense of national wrong. To take such a convention as the model for a treaty, which was to determine a national grievance of transcendent importance in the relations of two countries, marked on the threshold an insensibility to the true nature of the difference to be settled. At once it belittled the work to be done.

An inspection of the treaty shows how from beginning to end it is merely for the settlement of individual claims on both sides, putting both batches on an equality—so that the sufferers by the misconduct of England may be counterbalanced by British blockade-runners.

The provisions of the treaty are for the trial of these cases. A commission is constituted, which is empowered to choose an arbitrator; but in the event of a failure to agree, the arbitrator shall be determined "by lot" out of two persons named by each side. Even if this aleatory proceeding were a proper device in the umpirage of private claims, it is strangely inconsistent with the solemnity which belongs to the present question. The moral sense is disturbed by such a process at any stage of the trial; nor is it satisfied by the subsequent provision for the selection of a sovereign or head of a friendly state as arbitrator.

recognized by Earl Russell. But no such evidence was adduced; for it did not exist and never has existed.

Too much stress cannot be laid upon the rule that belligerency is a "fact" and not a "principle." It is, perhaps, the most important contribution to this discussion, and its original statement, on the occasion of the Greek revolution, does honor to its author, unquestionably the brightest genius ever directed to this subject. According to this rule, belligerency must be proved to exist, it must be shown. It cannot be imagined or divined or invented; it must exist as a "fact" within the knowledge of the world, or at least as a "fact" susceptible of proof. Nor can it be inferred on the ocean merely from its existence on the land. From the beginning, when God called the dry land earth and the gathering of the waters called He seas, the two have been separate, and the power over one has not necessarily implied power over the other. There is a dominion of the land and a dominion of the ocean. But, whatever power the rebels possessed on the land, they were always without power on the ocean. Admitting that they were belligerents on the land, they were never belligerents on the ocean:

The oak leviathans, whose huge ribs make Their clay creator the vain title take
Of Lord of thee, and arbitrer of war;

these they never possessed. Such was the "fact" that must govern the present question. The rule, so simple, plain, and intelligible, as stated by Mr. Canning, is a decisive touchstone of the British concession, which, when brought to it, is found to be without support.

Unfriendly in the precipitancy with which it was launched, this concession was more unfriendly in substance. It was the first stage in the depredations on our commerce. Had it not been made no rebel ship could have been built in England. Every step in her building would have been piracy. Nor could any munitions of war have been furnished. The direct consequence of this concession was to place the rebels on an equality with ourselves in all British markets, whether of ships or munitions of war. As these were open to the national Government, so were they open to the rebels. The asserted neutrality between the two began by this tremendous concession when rebels, at one stroke, were transformed not only into belligerents, but into customers.

In attributing to that bad proclamation this peculiar influence I follow the authority of the law lords of England, who, according to authentic report, announced that, without it, the fitting out of a ship in England to cruise against the United States would have been an act of piracy. That England became an "arsenal" for the rebels we know, but this could not have been unless the proclamation had prepared the way.

The only justification that I have heard for this extraordinary concession, which unleashed upon our country the furies of foreign war to commingle with the furies of rebellion at home, is that President Lincoln undertook to proclaim a blockade of the rebel ports. By the use of this word "blockade" the concession is vindicated. Had President Lincoln proclaimed a closing of the rebel ports, there could have been no such concession. This is a mere technicality. Lawyers might call it an apex juris; and yet on this sharp point England hangs her defence. It is sufficient that in a great case like the present, where the correlative duties of a friendly power are in question, an act fraught with such portentous evil cannot be vindicated on a technicality. In this debate there is no room for technicality on either side. We must look at the substance and find a reason in nothing short of overruling necessity. War cannot be justified merely on a technicality; nor can the concession of ocean belligerency to rebels without a port or prize court. Such a concession, like war itself, must be at the peril of the nation making it.

The British assumption, besides being offensive from mere technicality, is inconsistent with the proclamation of the President, taken as a whole, which, while appointing a blockade, is careful to reserve the rights of sovereignty, thus putting foreign powers on their guard against any premature concession. After declaring an existing insurrection in certain States, and the obstruction of the laws for the collection of the revenue, as the motive for action, the President invokes not only the law of nations but the "laws of the United States," and, in further assertion of the national sovereignty, declares rebel cruisers to be pirates. Clearly the proclamation must be taken as a whole and its different provisions so interpreted as to harmonize with each other. If they cannot stand together, then it is the "blockade" which must be modified by the national sovereignty and not the national sovereignty by the blockade. Such should have been the interpretation of a friendly power, especially when it is considered that there are numerous precedents of what the great German authority, Heffter, calls "pacific blockade," or blockade without concession of ocean belligerency, as, in the case of France, England and Russia against Turkey,

Here beyond all question was negligence, or, according to the language of Lord Brougham on another occasion, "crass negligence," making England justly responsible for all that ensued.

Lord Russell, while trying to vindicate his government and repelling the complaints of the United States, more than once admitted that the escape of the Alabama was a "scandal and a reproach," which, to my mind, is very like a confession. Language could not be stronger. Surely such an act cannot be blameless. If damages are ever awarded to a friendly power for injuries received it is difficult to see where they could be more strenuously claimed than in a case, which the First Minister of the offending power did not hesitate to characterize so strongly.

Here the speaker presented evidence showing the enlistment of a crew, many of the "royal navy reserve," with the express understanding that they were to engage in privateering against United States commerce.

The dedication of the ship to the rebel service, from the very laying of the keel and the organization of her voyage with England as her naval base, from which she drew munitions of war and men, made her departure as much a hostile expedition as if she had sailed forth from Her Majesty's dockyard. At a moment of profound peace between the United States and England there was a hostile expedition against the United States. It was in no just sense a commercial transaction, but an act of war.

The case is not yet complete. The Alabama, whose building was in defiance of law, international and municipal, whose escape was "a scandal and reproach," and whose enlistment of her crew was a fit sequel to the rest, after being supplied with an armament and with a rebel commander, entered upon her career of piracy. Mark, now, a new stage of complicity. Constantly the pirate ship was within reach of British cruisers, and, from time to time, within the shelter of British ports. For six days unmolested she enjoyed the pleasant hospitality of Kingston, in Jamaica, obtaining freely the coal and other supplies so necessary to her vocation. But no British cruiser, no British magistrate ever arrested the offending ship, whose voyage was a continuing "scandal and reproach" to the British government.

The excuse for this strange license is a curious technicality, as if a technicality could avail in this case at any stage. Bor-

1827; France against Mexico, 1837-39; France and Great Britain against the Argentine Republic, 1838-48; Russia against the Circassians, 1831-36, illustrated by the seizure of the Vixen so famous in diplomatic history (Hautefeuille, Des Droits et des Devoirs des Neutres). Cases like these led Heffter to lay down the rule that "blockade" does not necessarily constitute a state of regular war (Droit International, Secs. 112, 121), as was assumed by the British proclamation—even in the face of positive words by President Lincoln asserting the national sovereignty and appealing to the "laws of the United States." The existence of such cases was like a notice to the British government against the concession so rashly made. It was an all-sufficient warning, which this power disregarded.

So far as is now known, the whole case for England is made to stand on the use of the word "blockade" by President Lincoln. Had he used any other word the concession of belligerency would have been without justification, even such as is now imagined. It was this word which, with magical might, opened the gates to all those bountiful supplies by which hostile expeditions were equipped against the United States. It opened the gates of war. Most appalling is it to think that one little word, unconsciously used by a trusting President, could be caught up by a friendly power and made to play such a part.

I may add that there is one other word often invoked for apology. It is "neutrality," which, it is said, was proclaimed between two belligerents. Nothing could be fairer, always provided that the "neutrality" proclaimed did not begin with a concession to one party, without which this party would be powerless. Between two established nations, both independent, as between Russia and France, there may be neutrality; for the two are already equal in rights, and the proclamation would be precisely equal in its operation. But where one party is an established nation and the other is nothing but an odious combination of rebels, the proclamation is most unequal in operation; for it begins by a solemn investiture of rebels with all the rights of war, saying to them, as was once said to the youthful knight, "Rise; here is a sword; use it." To call such an investiture a proclamation of neutrality is a misnomer. It was a proclamation of equality between the national Government on the one side and rebels on the other, and no plausible word can obscure this distinctive character.

Here the speaker recounted the building and escape of the "pirate" ships.

rowing a phrase from that master of admiralty jurisprudence, Sir William Scott, it is said that the ship "deposited" her original sin at the conclusion of her voyage, so that afterward she was blameless. But the Alabama never concluded her voyage until she sank under the guns of the Kearsarge, because she never had a port of her own. She was no better than the Flying Dutchman, and so long as she sailed was liable for that original sin which had impregnated every plank with an indelible dye. No British cruiser could allow her to proceed, no British port could give her shelter without renewing the complicity of England.

Thus her depredations and burnings, making the ocean blaze, all proceeded from England, which, by three different acts, lighted the torch. To England must be traced also all the widespread consequences which ensued.

I take the case of the Alabama because it is the best known, and because the building, equipment, and escape of this ship were under circumstances most obnoxious to judgment; but it will not be forgotten that there were consort ships, built under the shelter of that fatal proclamation, issued in such an eclipse of just principles, and, like the ships it unloosed, "rigged with curses dark." One after the other ships were built; one after the other, they escaped on their errand; and, one after the other, they enjoyed the immunities of British ports. Audacity reached its height when iron-clad rams were built, and the perversity of the British government became still more conspicuous by its long refusal to arrest these destructive engines of war, destined to be employed against the United States. This protracted hesitation, where the consequences were so menacing, is a part of the case.

It is plain that the ships which were built under the safeguard of this ill-omened proclamation; which stole forth from the British shores and afterward enjoyed the immunities of British ports, were not only British in origin, but British in equipment, British in armament, and British in crews. They were British in every respect, except in their commanders, who were rebel, and one of these, as his ship was sinking, owed his safety to a British yacht, symbolizing the omnipresent support of England. British sympathies were active in their behalf. The cheers of a British passenger ship crossing the path of the Alabama encouraged the work of piracy, and the cheers of the House of Commons encouraged the builder of the Alabama, while he defended what he had done and exclaimed, in taunt to him who is now an illustrious member of the British Cabinet,

John Bright, that he "would rather be handed down to posterity as the builder of a dozen Alabamas" than be the author of the speeches of that gentleman "crying up" the institutions of the United States, which the builder of the Alabama, rising with his theme, denounced "as of no value whatever and as reducing the very name of liberty to an utter absurdity," while the cheers of the House of Commons echoed back his words.

There are two circumstances by which the whole case is aggravated. One is found in the date of the proclamation, which lifted the rebels to an equality with the national Government; opening to them everything that was open to us, whether shipyard, foundries, or manufactories; and giving to them a flag on the ocean coequal with the flag of the Union. This extraordinary manifesto was issued on the day before the arrival of our minister in England. The British government knew of his coming. But in hottest haste they did this thing.

The other aggravation is found in its flagrant, unnatural departure from that anti-slavery rule, which, by manifold declarations, legislative, political, and diplomatic, was the avowed creed of England. Often was this rule proclaimed, but, if we except the great act of emancipation, never more pointedly than in the famous circular of Lord Palmerston, while Minister of Foreign Affairs, announcing to all nations that England was pledged to the universal abolition of slavery. And now, when slaveholders, in the very madness of barbarism, broke away from the national Government and attempted to found a new empire with slavery as its declared cornerstone, anti-slavery England, without a day's delay, without even waiting the arrival of our minister, who was known to be on his way, made haste to decree that this shameful and impossible pretension should enjoy equal rights with the national Government in her shipyards, foundries, and manufactories, and equal rights on the ocean. Such was the decree. Rebel slaveholders, occupied in a hideous attempt, were taken by the hand, and thus, with the official protection and the God-speed of anti-slavery England, commenced their accursed work.

I close this part of the argument by the testimony of Mr. Bright, who, in a speech at Rochdale, among his neighbors, February 3, 1863, thus exhibits the criminal complicity of England:

"I regret more than I have words to express this painful fact, that, of all the countries in Europe, this country is the only one which has men in it who are willing to take steps in favor of this intended slave government. We supply the ships;

Mr. Webster, in his negotiation with Lord Ashburton, characterized this act as "of itself a wrong and offence to the sovereignty and the dignity of the United States, for which to this day no atonement, or even apology, has been made by Her Majesty's government"; all these words being strictly applicable to the present case. Lord Ashburton, in reply, after recapitulating some mitigating circumstances and expressing a regret "that some explanation and apology for this occurrence was not immediately made," proceeds to make these. Here again was reparation for a wrong done to the nation.

Looking at what is due to us on the present occasion, we are brought again to the conclusion that the satisfaction of individuals whose ships have been burned or sunk is only a small part of what we may justly expect. As in the earlier cases where the national sovereignty was insulted, there should be an acknowledgment of wrong, or at least of liability, leaving to the commissioners the assessment of damages only. The blow inflicted by that fatal proclamation, which insulted our national sovereignty and struck at our unity as a nation, followed by broadside upon broadside, driving our commerce from the ocean, was kindred in character to those earlier blows, and, when we consider that it was in aid of slavery, it was a blow at civilization itself. Besides degrading us and ruining our commerce, its direct and constant influence was to encourage the rebellion, and to prolong the war waged by slave masters at such cost of treasure and blood. It was a terrible mistake, which I cannot doubt that good Englishmen must regret. And now, in the interest of peace, it is the duty of both sides to find a remedy, complete, just, and conciliatory, so that the deep sense of wrong and the detriment to the republic may be forgotten in that proper satisfaction which a nation loving justice cannot hesitate to offer.

Individual losses may be estimated with reasonable accuracy. Ships burned or sunk with their cargoes may be counted and their value determined; but this leaves without recognition the vaster damage to commerce driven from the ocean, and that other damage, immense and infinite, caused by the prolongation of the war, all of which may be called national in contradistinction to individual.

Our national losses have been frankly conceded by eminent Englishmen. I have already quoted Mr. Cobden, who did not hesitate to call them "cruel losses." During the same debate in which he let drop this testimony, he used other words, which show how justly he comprehended the case. "You have been,"

we supply the arms, the munitions of war; we give aid and comfort to the foulest of crimes. Englishmen only do it."—Bright's Speeches, Vol. I, p. 239.

At last the rebellion succumbed. British ships and British supplies had done their work, but they failed. And now the day of reckoning has come; but with little apparent sense of what is due on the part of England. Without one soothing word for a friendly power deeply aggrieved, without a single regret for what Mr. Cobden, in the House of Commons, called "the cruel losses" inflicted upon us, or for what Mr. Bright called "aid and comfort to the foulest of crimes," or for what a generous voice from Oxford University denounced as a "flagrant and maddening wrong," England simply proposes to submit the question of liability for "individual losses" to an anomalous tribunal where chance plays its part. This is all. Nothing is admitted even on this question; no rule for the future is established; while nothing is said of the indignity to the nation, nor of the damages to the nation. On an earlier occasion it was otherwise.

Here the speaker referred to the Chesapeake affair (see page 129).

The brilliant Mr. Canning, British Minister of Foreign Affairs, promptly volunteered overtures for an accommodation, by declaring His Majesty's readiness to take the whole of the circumstances of the case into consideration and "to make reparation for any alleged injury to the sovereignty of the United States, whenever it should be clearly shown that such injury has been actually sustained and that such reparation is really due." After years of painful negotiation the British minister at Washington, under date of November 1, 1811, offered to the United States three propositions: first, the disavowal of the unauthorized act; secondly, the immediate restoration, so far as circumstances would permit, of the men forcibly taken from the Chesapeake; and, thirdly, a suitable pecuniary provision for the sufferers in consequence of the attack on the Chesapeake.

I adduce this historic instance to illustrate partly the different forms of reparation. Here, of course, was reparation to individuals; but there was also reparation to the nation, whose sovereignty had been outraged.

The speaker then referred to the burning by Canadians of the American vessel Carolina in 1837.

said he, "carrying on war from these shores with the United States, and have been inflicting an amount of damage on that country greater than would be produced by many ordinary wars. It is estimated that the loss sustained by the capture and burning of American vessels has been about $15,000,000, or nearly £3,000,000 sterling. But this is a small part of the injury which has been inflicted on the American marine. We have rendered the rest of her vast mercantile property useless." After confessing his fears with regard to "the heaping up of a gigantic material grievance such as was then rearing," he adds, in memorable words:

"You have already done your worst toward the American mercantile marine. What, with the high rate of insurance, what with these captures, and what with the amount of damage you have done to that which is left, you have virtually made valueless that vast property. Why, if you had gone and helped the Confederates by bombarding all the accessible seaport towns of America a few lives might have been lost which, as it is, have not been sacrificed, but you could hardly have done more injury in the way of destroying property than you have done by these cruisers. [Hear, hear.]"

In the same debate William E. Forster said that so entirely was our commerce driven from the ocean that for six weeks not an American vessel was seen by the Georgia on her second cruise.

Mr. Forster announced that "the carrying trade of the United States was transferred to British merchants"; and Mr. Cobden declared this circumstance to be "the gravest part of the question of our relations with America." But this "gravest part" is left untouched by the pending treaty.

Such is the candid and explicit testimony of Englishmen, pointing the way to the proper rule of damages.

I refer to the interesting report of Mr. Morse, our consul at London, made during the last year and published by the Secretary of State. After a minute inquiry the report shows that, on the breaking out of the rebellion in 1861, the entire tonnage of the United States, coasting and registered, was 5,539,813 tons, of which 2,642,625 tons were registered and employed in foreign trade, and that, at the close of the rebellion in 1865, notwithstanding an increase in coasting tonnage, our registered tonnage had fallen to 1,602,528 tons, being a loss during the four years of more than a million tons, amounting to about forty per cent. of our foreign commerce. During the same four years the total tonnage of the British empire rose from 5,895,- 369 tons to 7,322,604 tons, the increase being especially in the foreign trade. The report proceeds to say that, as to the cause of the decrease in America and the corresponding increase in the British empire, "there can be no room for question or doubt."

Beyond the actual loss in the national tonnage there was a further loss in the arrest of our natural increase in this branch of industry, which an intelligent statistician puts at five per cent. annually, making, in 1866, a total loss on this account of 1,384,958 tons, which must be added to 1,229,035 tons actually lost. The same statistician, after estimating the value of a ton at forty dollars gold, and making allowance for old and new ships, puts the sum total of national loss on this account at $110,000,000.

To these authorities I add that of the National Board of Trade, which, in a recent report on American shipping, after setting forth the diminution of our sailing tonnage, says that it is all to be traced to the war on the ocean, and the result is summed up in the words, that, "while the tonnage of the nation was rapidly disappearing by the ravages of the rebel cruisers and by sales abroad, there was no construction of new vessels going forward to counteract the decline even in part." Such is the various testimony, all tending to one conclusion.

This is what I have to say for the present on national losses through the destruction of commerce. These are large enough; but there is another chapter where they are larger far. I refer, of course, to the national losses caused by the prolongation of the war and traceable directly to England. No candid person, who studies this eventual period, can doubt that the rebellion was originally encouraged by hope of support from England; that it was strengthened at once by the concession of belligerent rights on the ocean; that it was fed to the end by British supplies; that it was quickened into renewed life with every report from the British pirates, flaming anew with every burning ship; nor can it be doubted that without British intervention the rebellion would have soon succumbed under the well-directed efforts of the national Government. Not weeks or months, but years were added in this way to our war, so full of the most costly sacrifice. The subsidies which, in other times, England contributed to Continental wars were less effective than the aid and comfort which she contributed to the rebellion. It cannot be said too often that the naval base of the rebellion was not in America, but in England. Mr. Cobden boldly said in the House of Commons that England made war from her shores on the United States "with an amount of damage to that case of the nation the evidence is historic; and this is enough. Impartial history will record the national losses from British intervention, and it is only reasonable that the evidence of these losses should not be excluded from judgment. Because the case is without precedent, because no nation ever before received such injury from a friendly power, this can be no reason why the case should not be considered on the evidence.

Even the rule of the common law furnishes no impediment; for our damages are the natural consequence of what was done. But the rule of the Roman law, which is the rule of international law, is broader than that of the common law. The measure of damages, according to the Digest, is, "whatever may have been lost or might have been gained": quantum mihi abest, quantumque lucrari potui. This rule opens the door to ample reparation for all damages, whether individual or national.

There is another rule of the common law, in harmony with strict justice, which is applicable to the case. I find it in the law relating to nuisances, which provides that there may be two distinct proceedings, first, in behalf of individuals, and, secondly, in behalf of the community. Obviously reparation to individuals does not supersede reparation to the community. The proceeding in the one case is by action at law, and, in the other, by indictment. The reason assigned by Blackstone for the latter is "because the damages being common to all the king's subjects, no one can assign his particular proportion of it." (3 Black. Com., p. 219.) But this is the very case with regard to damages sustained by the nation.

A familiar authority furnishes an additional illustration, which is precisely in point:

"No person, natural or corporate, can have an action for a public nuisance, or punish it; but only the king in his public capacity of supreme governor and pater familias of the kingdom. Yet this rule admits of one exception; where a private person suffers some extraordinary damage beyond the rest of the king's subjects."—Tomlins' Law Dict., Art. Nuisance.

Applying this rule to the present case, the way is clear. Every British pirate was a public nuisance, involving the British government, which must respond in damages, not only to the individuals who have suffered but also to the national Government, acting as pater familias for the common good of all the people.

Thus by an analogy of the common law, in the case of a public nuisance, also by the strict rule of the Roman law, which enters so largely into international law, and even by the rule of the country greater than in many ordinary wars." According to this testimony, the conduct of England was war; but it must not be forgotten that this war was carried on at our sole cost. The United States paid for a war waged by England upon the national unity.

The sacrifice of precious life is beyond human compensation; but there may be an approximate estimate of the national loss in money. The rebellion was suppressed at a cost of more than four thousand million dollars, a considerable portion of which has been already paid, leaving twenty-five hundred millions as a national debt to burden the people. If, through British intervention, the war was doubled in duration, or in any way extended, as cannot be doubted, then is England justly responsible for the additional expenditure to which our country was doomed; and, whatever may be the final settlement of these great accounts, such must be the judgment in any chancery which consults the simple equity of the case.

This plain statement, without one word of exaggeration or aggravation, is enough to exhibit the magnitude of the national losses, whether from the destruction of our commerce or the prolongation of the war. They stand before us mountain-high, with a base broad as the nation, and a mass stupendous as the rebellion itself. It will be for a wise statesmanship to determine how this fearful accumulation, like Pelion upon Ossa, shall be removed out of sight, so that it shall no longer overshadow the two countries.

Perhaps I ought to anticipate an objection from the other side to the effect that these national losses, whether from the destruction of our commerce or the prolongation of the war, are indirect and remote, so as not to be a just cause of claim. This is expressed at the common law by the rule that "damages must be for the natural and proximate consequence of an act." (2 Greenleaf, Ev., p. 210.) To this excuse the answer is explicit. The damages suffered by the United States are twofold, individual and national, being in each case direct and proximate, although in the one case individuals suffered and in the other case the nation. It is easy to see that there may be occasions, where, overtopping all individual damages, are damages suffered by the nation, so that reparation to individuals would be insufficient; nor can the claim of the nation be questioned simply because it is large, or because the evidence with regard to it is different from that in the case of an individual. In each case the damage must be proved by the best possible evidence, and this is all that law or reason can require. In the common law relating to damages, all losses, whether individual or national, are the just subject of claim. It is not I who say this; it is the law.

Here the speaker recounted the sharp refusals by Great Britain on our repeated early presentations of the claims.¹

Had the early overtures of our Government been promptly accepted, or had there been at any time a just recognition of the wrong done, I doubt not that this great question would have been settled; but the rejection of our very moderate propositions and the protracted delay, which afforded an opportunity to review the case in its different bearings, have awakened the people to the magnitude of the interests involved. If our demands are larger now than at our first call it is not the only time in history where such a rise has occurred. The story of the Sibyl is repeated, and England is the Roman king.

Shall these claims be liquidated and canceled promptly, or allowed to slumber until called into activity by some future exigency? There are many among us who, taking counsel of a sense of national wrong, would leave them to rest, without settlement, so as to furnish a precedent for retaliation in kind, should England find herself at war. There are many in England who, taking counsel of a perverse political bigotry, have spurned them absolutely; and there are others who, invoking the point of honor, assert that England cannot entertain them without compromising her honor. Thus there is peril from both sides. It is not difficult to imagine one of our countrymen saying with Shakespeare's Jew, "The villainy you teach me I will execute, and it shall go hard, but I will better the instruction"; nor is it difficult to imagine an Englishman firm in his conceit, that no apology can be made and nothing paid. I cannot sympathize with either side. Be the claims more or less, they are honestly presented, with the conviction that they are just, and they should be considered candidly, so that they shall no longer lower, like a cloud ready to burst, upon two nations, which, according to their inclinations, can do each other such infinite injury or such infinite good. I know it is sometimes said that war between us must come sooner or later. I do not believe it. But if it must come, let it be later, and then I am sure it will never come. Meanwhile, good men must unite to make it impossible.

¹See Chapter VII.

The Senate promptly rejected the Johnson-Clarendon Treaty with the approval of President Grant. The rejection was announced to the British Government by John Lothrop Motley, who had succeeded Mr. Johnson as our minister to Great Britain. Hamilton Fish, our Secretary of State, suggested to Mr. Motley that negotiations be temporarily suspended, though with maintenance of the justice of our claims.

In his second annual message (December, 1870) President Grant inaugurated a reopening of the claims by his recommendation that Congress should authorize a commission to fix the amounts, ownership, etc., of the private claims, notifying the British minister at Washington (Sir Edward Thornton) of the fact, and should give the United States Government power to prosecute these, as well as its own claim for general damages.

This declaration of the President made a profound impression on Great Britain. The Franco-American war was then in progress, and Great Britain was apprehensive that she might become involved in a European conflict. Therefore she was apprehensive that in event of this the United States would use the precedent of the Alabama and other cases to engage in privateering against British commerce. Accordingly, early in January, 1871, she sent to the United States Sir John Rose, an English banker, on a secret mission upon the matter. As a result of his prompt and adroit action, an understanding was reached between the two countries which resulted in a proposal, on January 26, from the British Government, presented by its minister at Washington, to reopen the settlement of the fishery question and all other matters affecting the relations of the United States to British America by establishing a Joint High Commission to meet at Washington.

Secretary Fish suggested to Minister Thornton that the Alabama claims should also be settled by this commission. Under instructions cabled by the Earl of Granville, British Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Minister Thornton accepted the suggestion. On February 22 the British commissioners arrived in this country, having been so hurried by their Government, it was said, that

The American case before the arbitrators was prepared by J. C. Bancroft Davis and argued by William M. Evarts, Caleb Cushing, and Morrison R. Waite. The chief counsel for Great Britain was Sir Roundell Palmer. The chief contention was over the American claims for indirect damages (see preceding speech of Senator Sumner). Several times dissolution of the commission was threatened on this issue, and finally these claims were disallowed.

The award was paid by Great Britain in 1872. On June 23 of this year Congress created a Court of Claims to distribute the award among the individual claimants. This court rendered judgments aggregating $9,315,753. A second and similar court was established on June 5, 1882. Much of the remainder of the award remains undistributed. At various times it has been proposed, but without result, to return the balance to Great Britain.

The commission to adjust other war claims between they came with hand luggage only, leaving their trunks to follow with their servants.

The British commissioners were Earl de Grey; Lord Ripon, President of the Queen's Counsel; Sir Stafford Northcote, late Secretary of the Exchequer; Minister Thornton; Sir John MacDonald, Canadian Premier; and Montague Bernard, Oxford Professor of International Law.

The American commissioners were Secretary Fish; Robert C. Schenck, who had just been appointed Minister to Great Britain; Samuel Nelson, Associate-Justice of the Supreme Court; E. Rockwood Hoar, late Attorney-General; and George H. Williams, late Senator from Oregon. The American commissioners were appointed by the President with confirmation by the Senate.

The Joint High Commission concluded the Treaty of Washington on May 8, 1871. By this the Alabama claims were to be adjusted by five arbitrators, one to be named by Queen Victoria, one by President Grant, one by the King of Italy, one by the President of Switzerland, and one by the Emperor of Brazil. The question was to be settled according to the principles of International Law as prevailing at the time, the British Government, to save its face, not conceding that it recognized these principles at the time the claims originated, when it had refused to admit the principles.

Other claims for damages between citizens of the two countries arising during the war were to be adjusted by a commission meeting in Washington; and the boundary dispute (San Juan) with Canada was to be referred to the Emperor of Germany.

On the Geneva Commission Great Britain appointed Sir Alexander Cockburn; the United States, Charles Francis Adams; Italy, Count Frederick Sclopis; Switzerland, Jacob Staempfli; Brazil, Baron d'Itajubá. The commission met in December, 1871, and sat until September 14, 1872, when it gave judgment that Great Britain should settle the claims in full by paying $15,500,000 in gold. Sir Alexander Cockburn was the only arbitrator who dissented from the award.

British and American citizens was constituted of three appointees by President Grant, Queen Victoria, and by these two appointees. It met at Washington on September 26, 1871, and after several adjournments made its final award at Newport, Rhode Island, on September 25, 1873. All American claims were rejected and British claims to the amount of $1,929,819 were allowed. This was subsequently paid.

In the Treaty of Washington an attempt was made to settle definitely the fishery dispute, by allowing citizens of the United States to take fish of any kind except shellfish, in all Canadian waters, and British subjects to do the same in all waters of the United States north of 39° north latitude. But as it was asserted by Great Britain that the privilege of fishing in American waters was worthless, the subject was referred to a commission, to be composed of one appointee from the United States, one from Great Britain, and a third to be named by the Emperor of Austria. The commission met in Halifax, Nova Scotia, on June 5, 1877. It awarded Great Britain $5,500,000 for the use of her fisheries for twelve years, the period of the treaty. The money was appropriated by Congress in 1878 with the proviso that the fishery articles in the Treaty of Washington "ought to be terminated at the earliest period consistent with the provisions of the treaty." The articles were therefore discontinued on July 1, 1885. In 1888 a new treaty was negotiated, but was rejected by the Senate. Not until 1910 was the vexatious fishery dispute finally settled. On June 1 of that year Great Britain and the United States submitted the question to the International Court of Arbitration at The Hague. The decision of the Court was announced on September 7. The Court decided:

1. Great Britain has the right to make regulations for the preservation of her fisheries without the consent of the United States.
2. Inhabitants of the United States have the right to employ as members of their fishing crews persons not inhabitants of the United States.
3. The requirement that American fishing vessels report at Canadian custom-houses is not unreasonable. But American fishermen must not be subjected to light, harbor or other dues not imposed upon Canadian fishermen.

4. Americans are entitled to fish in the bays, creeks and harbors of the treaty coasts of Newfoundland and the Magdalen Islands.

The Canadian boundary dispute which was referred to the Emperor of Germany, who in turn referred it to experts, was settled purely on the legal construction of the treaty of June 15, 1846, and on geographical facts. The decision (rendered October 21, 1872) was in favor of the United States, which thereby acquired possession of the island of San Juan in Pacific waters. This was largely due to the fact that the American case was presented by George Bancroft, minister at Berlin, who had been minister to Great Britain when the treaty of 1846 was made, and was therefore thoroughly conversant with the subject. The decision was the last of the various boundary disputes which had been a source of irritation between the United States and Great Britain (including Canada) since the close of the Revolution.

INTRODUCTION

NATIONALISM AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS¹

A MAN must first care for his own household before he can be of use to the state. But, no matter how well he cares for his household, he is not a good citizen unless he also takes thought of the state. In the same way a great nation must think first of its own internal affairs; and yet it cannot substantiate its claim to be a great nation unless it also thinks of its position in the world at large.

The United States of America has not the option as to whether it will or will not play a great part in the world. It must play a great part. All that it can decide is whether it will play that part well or badly. And it can play it badly if it adopts the rôle either of the coward or of the bully. Nor will it help it in the end to avoid either part if it play the other. It must avoid both. Democratic America can be true to itself, true to the great cause of freedom and justice, only if it shows itself ready and willing to resent wrong from the strong, and scrupulously desirous of doing generous justice to both strong and weak.

There are, of course, very few people who will openly take the position that we are justified in doing what is wrong simply because it is to our interest. But in actual practice there are always plenty of men willing to condone and excuse any wrongful act which they think is advantageous. These men by themselves never tion to showing them, do their best to keep the country unprepared for the trouble which they are so lightly willing to provoke. Wantonly to insult a friendly nation is bad; to be unable ourselves to resist wrong is worse; but the lowest depth is reached by those who practice the policy of peace with insult, who are ever ready to join in measures or to use language extremely offensive to foreign powers, and who nevertheless by their votes or speeches on the question of national defence show that they lack either the far-sightedness or the patriotism to take thought of the interest of the nation in the years to come.

So much for those Americans who fall short of the proper standard of international good manners, and just and kindly treatment as regards foreign peoples. Now for the American who commits the even worse offence of endeavoring to make this nation the derision and butt of other nations by refusing to allow it to take proper measures for its own defence. Unfortunately, many of those often well-meaning persons who claim a leading position among the advocates of international peace have harmed their cause in the eyes of all really far-sighted and patriotic citizens by advocating for America a position which would be abjectly unworthy of her standing among the nations. This category includes those who opposed our war with Spain, those who opposed the subsequent enforcement of law and order in the Philippines, those who opposed the building up of the navy, and those who now oppose the fortification of the Panama Canal. Some of these men are misguided men of good character; others, however, are merely men who do not possess any keen sense of international honor, and who are perfectly willing to see this nation expose itself to the chance of discredit and disaster, because their own small souls would be unaffected by a national defeat which would make most Americans bow their heads with bitterness and shame. As regards these men, I should not have the slightest objection to their inviting the disaster that would come upon them if their wishes were fulfilled, were it not for the fact that the rest of us would unfortunately have form more than a minority, and usually a very small minority, of our people; but often the majority is supine, indifferent, or ill-informed, and thus may give a free hand to an unscrupulous minority. In making treaties, for instance, there must be give and take; and yet too often a treaty which represents actual performance in the present—as distinguished from the usually worthless type of general arbitration treaty which represents nothing but vague general promise for the future—will fail simply because our people permit a small section of their number to insist that it shall be all take and no give. Again, as the nation, and not the several States, has to deal with foreign powers, the nation should have complete control over all questions likely to cause trouble with foreign powers, and therefore should have the complete and fully recognized ability to protect all aliens in their treaty rights. Yet in actual practice occasions have not infrequently arisen which have shown rather pitiable national shortcomings in this respect.

I do not think, however, that, on the whole, much blame rests on us so far as action of this kind is concerned. I wish it were possible for us always to say as much as regards speech. Too many, both of our public men and publicists, seek at times to gratify themselves or their constituents in unworthy fashion by the use of insulting language in reference to foreign powers. The better American a man is, the more confident he is in America's strength and standing, the more ashamed he must be at every such exhibition of international bad manners on the part of any representative of our people. Courtesy is as much the mark of a gentleman as courage. If we respect ourselves, we individually show both qualities; and, in our collective capacity, we should demand of our representatives that the nation show both qualities in its dealings with other nations. We despise the coward; we despise no less heartily the loud-mouthed brawler. Bad manners and vituperation never yet won respect for either nation or individual. There is, however, a lower depth than is reached by those who merely show these shortcomings; that is, by those who, in addito share in the disaster. It is somewhat exasperating to reflect that we have to protect these particular peace advocates of the crazy type from themselves, and, in spite of their shrieking protests, guard them and their children against suffering their share of the national humiliation they do their best to bring about. If these men were capable of learning any lesson from history what has happened and is happening in China before their eyes would prove to them that a nation, however big, however industrious and populous, which is incapable of self-defence, not only invites humiliation for itself, but is a fruitful source of discord and possible war as regards other nations.

It behooves a democracy to remember that one of the favorite taunts leveled against it by the representatives of great military monarchies is that a democracy will never prepare for war, and will rarely show wisdom in choosing positions valuable for national defence. Unquestionably it is true that a democracy has plenty of bad advisers. Among these bad advisers are the foolish creatures who try to prevent our having a big navy and the equally foolish creatures who say that if we have a big navy there is no need of fortifications. As a matter of fact, fortifications should always be established on the land side as well as on the sea side; and one of their prime uses is to leave the navy foot-loose. If the Panama Canal were not fortified, in time of war we should either have to abandon it to any enterprising enemy, or else paralyze our fleet by employing it to defend the canal. If it is adequately fortified our fleet can absolutely disregard it save in so far as it fulfills the vital requisite of a first-class naval base. War vessels are inefficient substitutes for forts, and the poorest way to use a navy is to string the vessels in small groups in the ports along a coast, for then the enemy's navy can get them in detail. An unfortified Panama Canal would be a great source of weakness to this country; a fortified Panama Canal would enormously increase our strength. With the possible exception of Hawaii there is no other spot so necessary to fortify as the Panama Canal. We should have very few naval bases. These few should be thoroughly fortified and strongly held, and among them the two most important are those above mentioned.

One of the difficulties in dealing with foreign affairs is the queer tendency of many people to treat desire on our part to have an adequate navy and coast fortifications as equivalent to the statement that we believe there will be a war, and as justifying offensive war talk. Most certainly we hear at times offensive, and therefore utterly improper, talk of war with some entirely friendly nation, now Germany, now England, now Japan. No one can regret such talk more than I do, and it is almost never indulged in by men who would themselves respond to the call to arms if war should unhappily come. A man who is of the type apt to be useful in war is usually of too serious a nature to talk with levity or brutality of war, or in such fashion as to provoke war. My hearty reprobation of this type of offensive agitation does not interfere in the least with my belief, in the first place, that war is unlikely with any power, and in the next place that we can render it still more unlikely, as well as guarantee ourselves against possible humiliation and disaster, by the exercise of moderate forethought and preparation. To the good people who, because we laugh at a war scare about the Japanese or Germans, think that therefore we should abandon the upbuilding of the navy and the proper care of the army, I feel inclined to put the question whether, if they own houses, they have them insured or not. If the house is insured against fire it does not in the least mean that the owner thinks it will be burned down; he thinks it unlikely that it will be burned down, but, as a prudent man, he wishes to discount even the slight risk. It is just so with us. In my time I have seen war scares about England, Germany, and Japan. I should regard war with any of the three as an unspeakable calamity. I admire all three nations. To speak only of the nation concerning which there has been most recent talk of war, I not only have a great respect and admiration for the Japanese, but I very strongly feel that we have much to learn from them. I regard a

ANNEXATION OF SAN DOMINGO

President Grant Negotiates Treaty of Annexation with the Dominican Republic; It Is Rejected by the Senate—He Returns to the Proposition in His Second Annual Message—Oliver P. Morton [Ind.] Introduces in Senate Joint Resolution to Investigate San Domingo—Debate: Varying Views by Allen G. Thurman [O.], John Sherman [O.], Garrett Davis [Ky.], Willard Warner [Ala.], Justin S. Morrill [Vt.], George F. Edmunds [Vt.], Thomas F. Bayard [Del.], Charles Sumner [Mass.], Senator Morton, James W. Nye [Nev.], Zachariah Chandler [Mich.], Roscoe Conkling [N. Y.]; Resolution Is Passed—Jacob A. Ambler [O.] Moves Proviso in the House That Congress Be Not Committed by the Investigation; Adopted—Resolution Passed by Congress—The Commission Recommends Annexation; Recommendation Not Acted Upon—The President's Vindication of His Motives.

PRESIDENT GRANT, through negotiations conducted by one of his private secretaries, Gen. Orville E. Babcock, made a treaty annexing the republic of Dominica (San Domingo) on November 29, 1869. This territory constituted the eastern portion (about two-thirds of the whole) of the island now known as Haiti, which is, next to Cuba, the largest of the West Indies, comprising 28,000 square miles. Announcing this treaty and assuming its ratification by the Senate, the President in his first annual message in December dilated upon the advantages which the annexation of the republic would bring to the United States, asserting that San Domingo would yield all the sugar, coffee, tobacco, and other tropical products which the country would consume.

The subject of confirming the President's treaty annexing the West Indian republic was discussed by the Senate in executive session, the speeches of which are not published. Finally, on June 30, 1870, the Senate by good understanding between Japan and the United States as of capital consequence to this country, and as of the first importance from the standpoint of preserving peace in the Pacific. It would not be for the interest of either country to admit from the other country any considerable number of wageworkers, small farmers, or men engaged in small agricultural pursuits, and the wisest and most far-seeing men of both countries take the same view of this matter. But there should be the closest and friendliest relations between the two countries, conducted on a basis of absolute equality and of mutual regard and respect.

The American democracy not only owes it to itself to be thoroughly able and ready to defend America against any possible foes, but it also owes to itself the duty of treating in a spirit of genuine courtesy and friendliness all foreign powers; and as regards no power is this duty more incumbent than toward our great and friendly neighbor across the Pacific, that ancient empire which has all the most astounding vigor of youth—the Empire of Japan.

Theodore Roosevelt

a tie vote, 28 to 28, refused to confirm the treaty, to do which a three-fourths affirmative vote was required. The President, however, persisted in his project, upon which he had evidently set his heart, recommending it again in his second annual message at the convening of Congress early in the following December.

"Time," he said, "has only confirmed me in my former view." He believed that if we failed to annex the country a free port would be inaugurated in the Bay of Samana.

A large commercial city will spring up to which we will be tributary without receiving corresponding benefits, and then will be seen the folly of our rejecting so great a prize.

The acquisition of San Domingo is desirable because of its geographical position. It commands the entrance to the Caribbean Sea, and the isthmus transit of commerce. It possesses the richest soil, best and most capacious harbors, most salubrious climate, and the most valuable products of the forest, mine, and soil, of any of the West India islands. Its possession by us will in a few years build up a coastwise commerce of immense magnitude, which will go far toward restoring to us our lost merchant marine. It will give to us those articles which we consume so largely and do not produce, thus equalizing our exports and imports. In case of foreign war it will give us command of all the islands referred to, and thus prevent an enemy from ever again possessing himself of rendezvous upon our very coast. At present our coast trade between the States bordering on the Atlantic and those bordering on the Gulf of Mexico is cut in two by the Bahamas and the Antilles. Twice we must, as it were, pass through foreign countries to get by sea from Georgia to the west coast of Florida.

San Domingo, with a stable government, under which her immense resources can be developed, will give remunerative wages to tens of thousands of laborers not now upon the island. This labor will take advantage of every available means of transportation to abandon the adjacent islands, and seek the blessings of freedom and its sequence—each inhabitant receiving the reward of his own labor. Porto Rico and Cuba will have to abolish slavery, as a measure of self-preservation, to retain their laborers.

San Domingo will become a large consumer of the products of northern farms and manufactories. The cheap rate at which her citizens can be furnished with food, tools, and machinery will make it necessary that contiguous islands should have the same advantages, in order to compete in the production of sugar, coffee, tobacco, tropical fruits, etc. This will open to us a still wider market for our products. The production of our own supply of these articles will cut off more than one hundred millions of our annual imports, besides largely increasing our exports. With such a picture it is easy to see how our large debt abroad is ultimately to be extinguished. With a balance of trade against us (including interest on bonds held by foreigners, and money spent by our citizens traveling in foreign lands) equal to the entire yield of the precious metals in this country, it is not so easy to see how this result is to be otherwise accomplished.

The acquisition of San Domingo is an adherence to the "Monroe doctrine"; it is a measure of national protection; it is asserting our just claim to a controlling influence over the great commercial traffic soon to flow from west to east, by way of the Isthmus of Darien; it is to build up our merchant marine; it is to furnish new markets for the products of our farms, shops, and manufactories; it is to make slavery insupportable in Cuba and Porto Rico at once, and ultimately so in Brazil; it is to settle the unhappy condition of Cuba and end an exterminating conflict; it is to provide honest means of paying our honest debts without overtaxing the people; it is to furnish our citizens with the necessities of everyday life at cheaper rates than ever before; and it is, in fine, a rapid stride toward that greatness which the intelligence, industry, and enterprise of the citizens of the United States entitle this country to assume among nations.

In view of the importance of this question, I earnestly urge upon Congress early action, expressive of its views as to the best means of acquiring San Domingo. My suggestion is that, by joint resolution of the two houses of Congress, the Executive be authorized to appoint a commission to negotiate a treaty with the authorities of San Domingo for the acquisition of that island, and that an appropriation be made to defray the expenses of such commission. The question may then be determined, either by the action of the Senate upon the treaty, or the joint action of the two Houses of Congress upon a resolution of annexation, as in the case of the acquisition of Texas. So convinced am I of the advantages to flow from the acquisition of San Domingo, and of the great disadvantages, I might almost say calamities, to flow from non-acquisition, that I believe the subject has only to be investigated to be approved.

pared to annex Dominica in its present condition, without one man in it out of ten thousand who can speak the English language, without one man out of ten thousand who can read a word in any language, without one man in ten thousand who has the slightest idea of our Government? Is the Senate prepared to admit Dominica as a State in this Union at this session of Congress? That is the question.

Nobody, I think, has the least idea that any treaty for its annexation can be ratified. This Senate is not so ignorant that it did not know every essential thing in this resolution when it voted on the treaty. It would be to stultify ourselves to say that there is one single material inquiry in all this resolution that was not known to the Senate when it voted on the treaty.

What, then, is the use of this commission? What is the use of sending out these people who are to inquire into every sort of thing—these men who are to inquire into government, into debt, and then to turn ethnologists and hunt up information as to the physical, material, and moral condition of the people of Dominica, and then to turn mineralogists and geologists, and find out what is the mineral wealth of Dominica, and then to find out what is the atmosphere, the temperature, the variation of seasons, and the climate of that island; and so on from step to step, being a commission scientific, political, economical, historical, and the Lord only knows what it is not, according to this resolution? What is the use of all that if the Senate is not willing to admit Dominica as a State, for that is the real question and the only question?

Mr. President, it is a wide departure that we are asked to take from the original policy of the Government. It was at one time made a question, and a very serious one, whether Congress had the right to acquire territory at all. We all know that Mr. Jefferson, when it was proposed to acquire Louisiana, if not in his public messages, in his private letters, said that there was no power vested in Congress to acquire it, even although it was a great commercial necessity, and he advised his friends to violate the letter of the Constitution and depend upon the people for an amendment afterward to justify it.¹ But now we are asked not simply to annex territory within the continent, but to go outside and commence the policy of insular acquisition. That policy is well worth inquiring into before we send a commission to investigate the physical and mental and moral condition of the people who inhabit the island which we are asked to annex.

INVESTIGATION OF SAN DOMINGO

SENATE, DECEMBER 12-21, 1870

In accordance with the recommendation in the President's message, on December 12, 1870, Oliver P. Morton [Ind.] introduced in the Senate a joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint three commissioners to investigate the political and social conditions and natural resources of the republic of Dominica with reference to the desirability of its annexation to the United States as one of its territories, the commissioners to have expenses paid but to receive no compensation. The resolution was brought forward for discussion on December 20.

Allen G. Thurman [O.] opposed the resolution. The rejection of the Dominican treaty by the Senate, he said, showed a direct opposition to the President, to which the masterful man in the White House was evidently unwilling to defer.

Seeing that Dominica is not likely to be annexed under the treaty-making power, for want of the requisite support in the Senate, he suggests that it may be annexed by joint resolution, as in the case of Texas; and it is with a view to carry out, no doubt, the wishes or opinions of the President in this particular that the Senator from Indiana has introduced this joint resolution.

Now, the first thing that strikes me is this: is the Senate ready to recede from its position? Is the Senate willing to ratify a treaty for the annexation of Dominica, or is the Senate ready to annex Dominica by joint resolution? And in that connection I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that you cannot by joint resolution annex Dominica as a Territory; you must annex her as a State if you annex her by joint resolution. There is no clause in the Constitution of the United States that provides for the acquisition of territory by joint resolution of Congress unless it be one single provision, and that is that the Congress may admit new States into the Union. It was upon that doctrine that the resolution in the case of Texas was passed. But no one has ever pretended that you could by joint resolution annex territory as a Territory without admitting it as a State. Then, if a treaty is to be abandoned, the proposition which is before the Senate is, is this Senate pre-

GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

John Sherman [O.] submitted that the question before the Senate was one to investigate Dominica and not to annex it.

Garrett Davis [Ky.] believed that the annexation of Texas by joint resolution (which as a Representative at the time he had opposed) had established the precedent that foreign territory may be admitted into the Union only as a State.

The President of the United States so seems to consider this subject in his annual message. We know that he negotiated a treaty with what is called the Government of Dominica, but which it is a burlesque and an abuse of language to call a government at all. That treaty was laid before the Senate. It received the deliberate and protracted consideration of the Senate. Without violation of duty I may say that one of the ablest debates I ever listened to in either House of Congress was produced by the submission of that treaty to the Senate.¹ After all the light and instruction which that debate laid before the members of the Senate the treaty was rejected, and its rejection as a treaty was in fact a finality by the vote of the Senate upon the question of its ratification, and it is so considered by the President in his annual message. Now, sir, this is a favorite pet measure of the President of the United States. He ought to have been satisfied with the rejection of the treaty which he negotiated for the annexation of Dominica. He ought to have submitted himself to the judgment of the Senate, and to the deliberate judgment of the country which came to the Senate to sustain its action in rejecting that treaty. But he did not do so. He comes to the charge deliberately, and after much consideration and anxiety, in his annual message, and he there proposes, in substance, if not in form, that Congress by joint resolution shall provide for the acquisition of Dominica as a part of the United States; not by the treaty-making power, but by the action of the two Houses of Congress. He does not propose, nor even contemplate, in that message that Dominica shall be admitted as a State. He would not so insult the understanding and the dignity of Congress, the understanding and the rights of the American people, as to make any such monstrous proposition. Still there is a general vague and covert proposition that Dominica shall be received into the Union by joint resolution of Congress, and as he in effect repudiates and does not give any countenance to the idea of its admission by joint resolution as a State into the Union, what is the effect and purpose of the President's elaborate consideration and dissertation upon that subject in his message? Simply that Congress shall advance beyond the principle and the provision of the Constitution, beyond all the precedents, and admit Dominica, not as a State into the Union, but as a Territory whose inhabitants are incompetent to take upon themselves the duties and responsibilities of citizens of the United States in the business of self-government in adopting a constitution and acting the part of a State in the Union.

It is in furtherance of this proposition, as I understand, that this joint resolution has been introduced. It is simply to take up this furtive, unconstitutional project of the President, to be effected without authority of the Constitution, and perverting and usurping its powers by Congress assuming the prerogative of the treaty-making power in admitting into the Union, as a Territory, territory that now forms part of a foreign country.

Willard Warner [Ala.] said that opposition to ratifying the President's treaty with Dominica had been based at the time on insufficiency of information concerning the country. Recognizing the force of this objection, the friends of annexation now urged a thorough and complete investigation. If gentlemen really believed that Dominica would not be a desirable acquisition they should welcome this investigation. The President would certainly appoint the very best men he could find in order to get the real facts, which he sincerely believed were in favor of the acquisition.

Justin S. Morrill [Vt.] said that any commission, knowing the President's desires, would be favorably biased toward acquisition in its report. The Senate had sufficient information about Dominica now on which to base its action—an array of documents, the fruit of vast research for years. He believed that the resolution, which had been admitted by its mover to be faulty in one particular, should be referred to the committee on foreign relations.

George F. Edmunds [Vt.] thought that it was desirable that the Senate, before whom the question of ac-they may be admitted, if the time shall ever come, into this great family of free States.

Thomas F. Bayard [Del.] declared that the form of the resolution made the appointees ambassadors to prepare for annexation rather than mere investigators. Why, Senators, you give them a clerk who is really a secretary of legation!

Sir, my objection *in limine*¹ to this proposition is that without the usual and proper examination by an appropriate committee it is proposed that we should embark the Government of the United States upon the vast and trackless sea of imperialism, to change it into an imperial government of outlying and distant dependencies with a foreign population, strangers to us in race, in blood, in customs, in all their systems, political, social, moral, and religious.

In so important a departure as this resolution proposes haste is not only unwise, but, in my opinion, grossly indecorous. Already this measure has been proposed in due form to the department appointed by our Constitution of Government for its consideration, and it has been rejected.

The resolution looks to the incorporation within our political system and family of States of part of an island now held by a semi-barbarous race, the descendants of African slaves, whose attempts at self-government, continued for upward of half a century, have been but a series of blood-stained failures; whose populations have dwindled away to a mere fraction of their former number in internecine strife and moral and physical degradation. Their institutions are mere mockeries, bloody travesties of political government, and to them the presence of a strong-handed and just-minded white ruler would be the greatest blessing that Heaven could bestow.

In the beginning our Union was a sisterhood of neighboring States, and we had natural boundaries. One of these is the Atlantic Ocean. Are the people of America prepared to disregard every tradition of their Government? Are the people of America prepared to embark upon this imperial system, to forsake the ancient landmarks and guides of our nation's history?

Washington in his Farewell Address warned the American people that—quisition would eventually come, should have the information before it which the passage of the resolution would procure. He believed that the investigation would be adverse to annexation, but for other reasons we could not know too much about any of the West Indian islands.

"At the threshold."

We cannot fail to look with absorbing interest upon all the peoples and the islands of this great archipelago of the tropics. We have for more than half a century held out to the world that we should look with a jealous eye upon any interference with their affairs by foreign nations further than the principles of public law and the existing condition of things permitted it. Certainly if there be any distinctive American doctrine upon which the whole people are supposed to be a unit it is that we shall not permit European interference or aggression beyond existing conditions (which the faith of treaties and public law do not permit us to interfere with) or the enlargement of the domain of that species of interference in governments in this great tropical archipelago of which I have spoken. Therefore, information in respect to any of these islands, in respect to their capacity to uphold and support a free, industrious, and self-governing population, is of interest to the people of the United States. I say this with reference to Cuba as well as San Domingo; Hayti, the other end of this island, as well as Dominica; St. Thomas, or whatever the island may be; as to the people who inhabit all those islands, there must be with us always a centering and absorbing interest, they, taken as a whole, lying in that great Mediterranean Sea of the western hemisphere connecting us with the Isthmus of Panama and our great coast on the Pacific. We must exclude from that sea any aggressive movement of any people on the face of the earth.

Therefore, while according to my present information I think it entirely undesirable that any of the people of these islands should be incorporated into the political system of this country, I think it entirely desirable that we should fill our archives with information as to their condition; that we should enter into treaties of alliance and protection with every one of those people; so that, if the condition of things that now exists shall be attempted to be disturbed by any foreign power or potentate whatever, it will be not only our right, but our duty, to interfere and to protect our allies and friends in these tropical countries in their present independence until the diffusion of emigration, of intelligence, of education shall make it fit that

"The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible."

It may be said that he at that time directed his thoughts particularly to political alliances with either England or France, in whose affairs we were invited to mingle; but the principle that he there stated was true for all time; and no words can come with stronger significance and more effect to the ears of his fellow-countrymen than that potent question, "Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground?"

Why, sir, every man must see that the acquisition of a portion, and that the more distant portion, of the island of San Domingo will inevitably lead to the acquisition of the remainder of that island, and then, finally, of the circumjacent islands, those lying between the United States and the Bay of Samana. This spirit of greed, this land-robbing spirit of the Norman, which we have expanded under democratic institutions, will crave all that surrounds this island, and the entire group of the West India islands will finally be absorbed by the American Government. At the cost of what losses by war, at what cost of death by climate, of public treasure, of demoralization to our people, who shall say?

One thing I do see so plainly that I cannot imagine how any other man, however hopeful he may be of other benefit that may arise from the acquisition of this territory, can doubt that such a scheme of empire, if indulged in, will destroy our republican system of government. The population of this island, or of these islands, can never be governed by a constitutional government like ours. They are utterly unfitted for it, permanently, naturally disqualified for it; and another government unknown to our system of laws must be framed to bring anything like peace or order or security to life or property among them. Sir, we are unable, the fiat of nature has declared that we are unable, to elevate such a race as inhabit that island to the level of our own. If a level is to be achieved at all it will only be by dragging us down, and not by bringing them up:

"We to herd with narrow foreheads, vacant of our glorious gains
Like a beast with lower pleasures; like a beast with lower pains!"²

Sir, the idea is repellant to every man who values the institutions of this country and who recognizes the great difficulty in our own land of sustaining sufficient virtue in the public mind or intelligence throughout the country to maintain the institutions of government that have descended to us. I protest against this hurrying of the nation into a policy in regard to which they have had no opportunity distinctly and deliberately to express their views. So far as they have been enabled to express them, my own opinion is that the sentiment of the people of the United States is overwhelmingly in opposition to the scheme of the Administration, without regard to party. In the section of country in which I live I doubt if one-tenth of the people could be found to sustain this proposition. Then, sir, in the face of this opinion, why should this indecorous haste mark the pressure of this pet measure of the Administration through Congress?

Charles Sumner [Mass.] said that the resolution committed Congress "to a dance of blood."

It is a new step in a measure of violence. Several steps have already been taken, and Congress is now summoned to take another.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] said that the resolution was simply one of inquiry, and that therefore there could be no objection to it. I was astonished when I heard one of his experience in this chamber and his familiarity with legislation characterize this simply as a resolution of inquiry. The Senator is mistaken. It is a resolution creating three offices under the Constitution of the United States, offices contemplated in the Constitution itself, and specially mentioned by name in the act of 1856 to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States.

Sir, it is something more than a resolution of inquiry. It is a serious measure, and it begins on its face by an affront to the Constitution of the United States, which expressly declares that the President "shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls"; but by this resolution he is to appoint them without the advice and consent of the Senate; and yet this resolution is accepted by my honorable friend, the Senator from Ohio.

The Senator, it seems to me, has not comprehended the object of this resolution. To my mind it is plain. It is simply this: It is to commit Congress to the policy of annexation. Otherwise, why is the resolution introduced? The President does not need it. Under his general powers he is authorized to

The young officer, aid-de-camp of the President of the United States, with this important and unprecedented document in his pocket, returned to Washington. Instead of being called to account for this unauthorized transaction, pledging the Chief Magistrate to use his influence privately with Congress in order to cram down a measure that the confederates justly supposed to be offensive, he was sent back to this island with directions to negotiate a treaty. I would not allude to that treaty if it had not been made the subject of discussion by the President himself in his annual message. You know it. The treaty itself is not on your tables legislatively; it has never been communicated legislatively to Congress. The other House, which may be called to act upon this important measure, can know nothing of that treaty, and what we know of it we cannot speak of even in this debate. We can simply speak of its existence, for the President himself has imparted that to Congress and to the country. The treaty exists, and now the practical question is by what means was it negotiated? I have described to you the three confederates who seduced into their company the aid-de-camp of the President; and now I have to aver, and I insist that the evidence will substantiate what I say, that, at the time of the signature of the treaty of annexation, Baez was sustained in power by the presence of our naval force in the waters of the Dominican Government. Go to the documents, and you will find that what I say is true. Confer with naval officers, confer with honest, patriotic citizens who know the case, and they will all testify that without the presence of our ships of war in those waters Baez would have been obliged to flee.

This is not all, sir; I broaden this allegation. Ever since the signature of the treaty, and especially since its rejection, Baez has been sustained in power by the presence of our naval force. I ask you, sir, to do as I have done; go to the State Department and Navy Department and read the reports there on file, and what I state will be found to be substantially true.

Sir, this is a most serious business. Nothing more important to the honor of the Republic has occurred for long years. How many of us now are hanging with anxiety on the news from Europe? There stand matched in deadly combat two great historic foes, France and Germany, France now pressed to the wall; and what is the daily report? That Bismarck may take Louis Napoleon from his splendid prison and place him again on the throne of France, that he may obtain from him that treaty of surrender which the republic never will sign. Are we not all indignant at the thought? And now, sir, this is the very appoint agents, if he pleases, to visit foreign countries, and he is supplied with a secret-service fund by which their expenses may be defrayed.

Sir, others may do as they please; others may accept this policy; I will not. I have already set myself against it, and I continue now as firm against it as ever. The information which I have received since our discussions last year has confirmed me in the conclusions which I felt it my duty then to announce. In now presenting those conclusions I beg to say that I shall forbear from considering whether the territory of Dominica is desirable or not; I shall forbear from considering its resources, even its finances, even its debt—menacing as I know it is to the treasury of our country—except so far as that debt is connected with the relations with Hayti.

I object to this proposition because it is a new stage in a measure of violence which, so far as it has been maintained, has been propped by violence ever since. I use strong language, but only what the occasion requires. As a Senator, as a patriot, I cannot see my country suffer in its good name without an earnest effort to save it.

The negotiation for annexation began with a person known as Buenaventura Baez. All the evidence, official and unofficial, shows him to be a political jockey. But he could do little alone; he had about him two other political jockeys, Cazneau and Fabens; and these three together, a precious copartnership, seduced into their firm a young officer of ours, who entitles himself "aid-de-camp to the President of the United States." Together they got up what was entitled a protocol, in which the young officer entitling himself aid-de-camp to the President proceeded to make certain promises for the President.

Senator Sumner declared that the protocol was illegal, since the title of "aid-de-camp to the President" does not appear in the Constitution or the diplomatic statutes of the United States, and the duties of an "aid-de-camp" are, by general usage, incompatible with those of a commissioner.

The assumption of this exalted and exceptional character by this young officer shows at least his inexperience in diplomacy. However, he assumed it; and it doubtless produced a great effect with Baez, Cazneau, and Fabens, the three confederates. They were doubtless pleased with the distinction. It helped on the plan they were engineering.

part played by the American Government. Baez has been treated as you fear Bismarck may treat Louis Napoleon. You call him "president"; they call him down there "dictator"; better call him "emperor," and then the parallel will be complete. He is sustained in power by the Government of the United States that he may betray his country. Such is the fact, and I challenge any Senator to deny it. I submit myself to question, and I challenge the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton], who, as I have already said, champions this proposition, to deny it.

SENATOR MORTON.—If this commission go down there they can return an answer to all these broad statements of the Senator, whether they are true or not. The Senator understands that; but I wish to ask him if he does not know that in answer to all this that he is talking about it has been urged that all parties in San Domingo, whether they are for Baez or Cabral, or whoever they are for, are for annexation? If that is true, all this is utterly immaterial except as something thrown in to obscure this subject before the public. I aver—and the commission will show it—that all parties, whether against the Baez government or for it, are equally for annexation, and if that is true all this is frivolous.

SENATOR SUMNER.—Mr. President, I alluded yesterday to the late prime minister of France [M. Ollivier], who accepted war "with a light heart." The Senator from Indiana speaks in the same vein. He says that my allegation is "frivolous." Sir, never was there a more important allegation brought forward in this chamber. Frivolous! Is it frivolous when I see the flag of my country prostituted to an act of wrong? Is it frivolous when I see the mighty power of this Republic degraded to an act of oppression? Nothing frivolous—

SENATOR EDMUNDS.—What do you say as to the point, what are the wishes of the people of that country?

SENATOR SUMNER.—Let me finish; I was in the midst of a sentence.

SENATOR EDMUNDS.—I wish to apologize to my distinguished friend from Massachusetts. I understood him to challenge inquiry, and I asked him therefore in a friendly way to state to us the point that the Senator from Indiana made to him as to what he believed the sentiments of the people there to be.

SENATOR SUMNER.—The Senator interrupted me in the midst of a sentence.

SENATOR EDMUNDS.—Very well; I apologize and subside.

SENATOR SUMNER.—I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator if he wishes to speak, and I will speak when he is through.

SENATOR EDMUNDS.—By no means. The Senator from Massachusetts challenged anybody to ask him a question, and I in my own way ventured that very thing, and my friend, instead of answering it, flies into a passion because I did so.

SENATOR SUMNER.—Not at all; I said the Senator interrupted me while I was answering the Senator from Indiana, and in the midst of a sentence. I had proposed to proceed still further if I can have the permission of my excellent friend, the Senator from Vermont. I was remarking on the charge of frivolity—perhaps the Senator wishes me to finish on that head; I had not finished. I say that there is nothing frivolous in the suggestion; I say that it is grave. It is too grave; it is oppressive to this Government and this country. The Senator from Indiana asks, why not send out this commission? I say, why send them out when we now have in the archives of this Republic evidence that this very man is sustained in power by the naval force of the United States? Can you send out a commission under such circumstances without making yourself a party to the transaction?

And now I answer still further. The Senator asks if I am not aware that all persons there are in favor of annexation. I answer categorically, no; I am not aware of it. I understand the contrary. I have at least as good information as any accessible during the last week, and it is not four days old, just to the contrary. There are two chieftains in Dominica—one the political jockey with whom our Government has united and who is now sustained in power by our naval force, and the other is Cabral, who, as I have been assured by one who is bound to be well informed, represents the people of his country. Some time ago Cabral favored the sale of the bay of Samana to the United States; but I have been assured that he has never favored annexation to the United States. I am assured that his policy is to bring the two Governments of Dominica and Hayti once more together, as they were down to the revolution and war which lasted from 1846 to 1848, terminating in the uncertain independence of the Dominican part of the island.

Suppose during our Civil War Louis Napoleon, in an evil hour, had undertaken to set up Jefferson Davis as the head of this Government, and then to make a treaty with him by which Texas, said to have been much coveted by the emperor, should be yielded and become part of Mexico, which itself was to become more or less part of France. Would not our blood

All this is aggravated when we consider the relations between Dominica and Hayti, and bring this incredible transaction to the touchstone of international law. Dominica and Hayti became one under President Boyer in 1823, and the whole island continued as a unit until 1844, when Dominica rose against Hayti, and, after a bloody conflict of four years, in 1848 succeeded in securing its independence.

In 1838, while the two constituted one, a treaty was made with France, by which the Haytian Government agreed to pay, in certain annual installments, the sum of 60,000,000 francs. Since the separation of the two, Hayti has proceeded with those payments, and I think the Senator over the way will not deny that there is at least ground of claim on the part of Hayti against Dominica for contribution to those payments.

Senator Morton here claimed that this 60,000,000 francs was for spoliation upon the property of French citizens in Hayti.

Senator Sumner replied that nothing was said in the treaty with the United States about the consideration for the payments.

Senator Morton replied that the history of the transaction showed it.

SENATOR SUMNER.—History shows, however, that the two governments were one at this time, and I have to submit that there is at least a question whether Dominica is not liable to Hayti on that account. I mention this that you may see the relation between the two governments.

But this is not all. Besides the treaty with France, there is another between Hayti and Dominica.

Now, the point which I wish to present to the Senate and to impress is that Hayti having these claims on Dominica is interdicted from their pursuit by an American commodore.

The President's treaty had no effect until ratified by the Senate, and every attempt at jurisdiction in those waters was a usurpation and an act of violence; I think I should not go too far if I said it was an act of war.

Those waters were as sacred as the waters about France or about England. He might as well have penetrated the ports of either of those countries and launched his menace there as have penetrated the waters of this weak power and launched his menace.

boil? Would it be commended at all because we were told that there were large numbers in the Southern States who favored it? Would not the transaction be considered intolerable? And yet this is precisely what the United States are now doing in the bay of Samana and the port of St. Domingo.

Three ships out of the small navy of the United States are sent down to these waters to enforce this policy! If force were not to be employed why these three ships? Why the necessity of any ship?

When I think of all this accumulated power in those waters, those three vessels, with the patronage naturally incident to their presence, it is not astonishing that there is on the seaboard, immediately within their influence, a certain sentiment in favor of annexation. But when you penetrate the interior, beyond the sight of their smoke, at least beyond the influence of their money, it is otherwise. There the sentiment is adverse. There it is Cabral who prevails. So at least I am assured.

Sir, I have presented but half of this case, and perhaps the least painful part. I am now brought to another aspect of it. This naval force to which I have referred has also been directed against the neighboring republic of Hayti (the only colored government now existing in the world, a republic seeking to follow our great example) penetrating its harbors and undertaking to dictate to it what it shall do. If you will read again the reports at the Navy Department you will find that I do not overstate when I say that they have undertaken to dictate to the Government of Hayti what it should do. Nor is this all. In an unhappy moment the commodore of an American fleet, going ashore, allowed himself to insult and menace the government there, saying that if it interfered in any way with the territory of Dominica he would blow the town down. So I have been informed by one who ought to know. You look grave, sir. Well you may. I wish I could give you the official evidence on this assumption; but I am assured, on evidence that I regard as beyond question, that this incident has occurred. In what school was our commodore reared? The mother of Tittlebat Titmouse¹ told him that he must be careful never to fight with a boy of his size. An American commodore, in the same spirit, has undertaken to insult a sister republic too weak to resist. Of course, if he did this on his own motion and without instructions from Washington he ought to be removed, in my judgment, and rather than carry out such instructions he ought to have thrown his sword into the sea.

24 GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

It is an act of war—war, sir, made by the Executive without the consent of Congress.

In other days, to carry a project [the admission of Kansas with slavery], a President has tried to change a committee. It was James Buchanan. And now we have been called this session to witness a similar endeavor by our President. He was not satisfied with the Committee on Foreign Relations as constituted for years. He wished a change. He asked first for the removal of the chairman [Mr. Sumner]. Somebody told him that this would not be convenient. He then asked for the removal of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Schurz], and he was told that this could not be done without affecting the German vote. He then called for the removal of my friend the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Patterson], who unhappily was not a German. It was finally settled that this could not be done.

I allude to these things reluctantly and only as part of the case. They illustrate the spirit we are called to encounter. They illustrate the extent to which the President has fallen into the line of bad examples.

Sir, I appeal to you, as Vice-President.¹ By official position and by well-known relations of friendship you enjoy opportunities which I entreat you to use for the good of your country, and, may I add, for the benefit of that party which has so justly honored you. Go to the President, I ask you, and address him frankly with the voice of a good friend to whom he must hearken. Counsel him not to follow the example of James Buchanan; tell him not to allow the oppression of a weak and humble people; ask him not to exercise war powers without authority of Congress, and remind him kindly that there is a grandeur in justice and peace beyond anything in material aggrandizement, beyond anything in war.

Again I return to the pending resolution, which I oppose as a new stage in the long-drawn machination. Am I wrong in holding up this negotiation, which has in it so much of violence—violence toward Dominica, violence toward Hayti? Of course the proposed treaty assumed the civil war pending in the territory annexed. No prudent man buys a lawsuit; we should buy a bloody lawsuit.

Be taught, if you please, by the experience of Spain, when in 1860 this power, on the invitation of a predecessor of Baez, undertook to play the part we are asked to play. Forts were built and troops were landed. When at last this power withdrew she had expended forty millions of hard Spanish dollars and "sacrificed sixteen thousand of the flower of her army." Are we ready to enter upon this bloody dance? Are we ready to take up this bloody lawsuit?

Vain to set forth, as the message does, all manner of advantages, "commercially and materially." What are these if justice and humanity are sacrificed? What are these without that priceless blessing, peace? I am not insensible to the commercial and material prosperity of my country. But there is something above these. It is the honor and good name of the Republic, now darkened by an act of wrong. If this territory, so much coveted by the President, were infinitely more valuable than it is, I hope the Senate would not be tempted to obtain it by trampling on the weak and humble. Admit all that the advocates of the present scheme assert with regard to the resources of this territory, and then imagine its lofty mountains, bursting with the precious metals, its streams flowing with amber over silver sands, where every field is a garden of the Hesperides, blooming with vegetable gold, and all this is not worth the price we are now called to pay.

There is one other consideration, vast in importance and conclusive in character, to which I allude only, and that is all. The island of San Domingo, situated in tropical waters and occupied by another race, never can become a permanent possession of the United States. You may seize it by force of arms or by diplomacy, where a naval squadron does more than the minister; but the enforced jurisdiction cannot endure. Already by a higher statute is that island set apart to the colored race. It is theirs by right of possession; by their sweat and blood mingling with the soil; by tropical position; by its burning sun, and by unalterable laws of climate. Such is the ordinance of nature, which I am not the first to recognize. San Domingo is the earliest of that independent group, destined to occupy the Caribbean sea, toward which our duty is plain as the Ten Commandments. Kindness, beneficence, assistance, aid, help, protection, all that is implied in good neighborhood, these we must give, freely, bountifully; but their independence is as precious to them as is ours to us, and it is placed under the safeguard of natural laws which we cannot violate with impunity.

I conclude as I began. I protest against this resolution as another stage in a drama of blood. I protest against it in the name of justice, outraged by violence; in the name of humanity insulted; in the name of the weak trodden down; in the name of peace imperiled, and in the name of the African race, whose first effort at independence is rudely assailed.

assertions. He states these things, he says solemnly, because he knows them to be true; but he has not favored the Senate with any evidence to sustain the most of them. Perhaps the Senator thinks that what he does not know in regard to the Republic of San Domingo is not worth knowing; but while he may know it very well, he may not be able to satisfy all the rest of us; he may not be able to satisfy the country. And now we propose a commission that shall go upon the ground and make an examination so far as it can be made, and report to us the facts, that we may judge for ourselves whether or not annexation is desirable.

Now, sir, allow me to say that nearly all the Senator's points are immaterial—immaterial to the purpose of this resolution. He has spent his force upon matters that, so far as the merits of this resolution are concerned, may be designated as frivolous, wholly unimportant. We are not now proposing to examine whether the treaty was correctly and properly negotiated. We have passed by the treaty; we are beginning de novo; we are proposing to examine this question as if a treaty had never been made, and we propose to go to the vital and material points in the matter, and to do that we propose to send a commission to the island, where this information is most accessible and can be most accurately obtained.

But, sir, what of the protocol? The Senator seemed to think it was a very important matter, a great lion in the way that could not be gotten over, and that rendered this resolution improper, and the interrogatories unimportant. Why, sir, he confessed himself, as I understood him, that General Babcock had made that protocol without authority; and he did do it upon his own motion, and there was nothing in his instructions that authorized him to do so; but, as all men familiar with diplomatic negotiations understand, protocols are of very common occurrence, and are always of a private character, and never constitute a part of the treaty. But as the treaty is gone, as we have passed that by, as it is merely a relic of the past, where is the importance of dwelling upon this protocol and attempting to fix crime upon the President in consequence of it? Sir, the objection is frivolous, and I pass it by.

The Senator began his speech by saying that this resolution inaugurated a "dance of blood." This was a tremendous sentence, and burst upon the Senate like a rocket in the air, which always leaves darkness just after; and I would like to inquire whether anybody was hit by the stick when it came down. And I might inquire whether blood can dance, if that was ever heard

Senator Morton replied to Senator Sumner. He repudiated the charge that he (Morton) was a confidential adviser of the President; referring to his age and extremely crippled condition (which caused him often to speak from his chair), he said that he was too old and too lame to begin to act as a "go-between"—but, ever since Fort Donelson, he had been the admirer of Ulysses S. Grant, and had been constant in repelling the calumnies with which he had been assailed as no other President, perhaps, since Jefferson. He said that the assault of the Senator from Massachusetts was especially unprovoked and indefensible. It was not due to a difference of political principles, for he had charged the President with usurpation, with crime.

The argument of the Senator from Massachusetts throughout has demonstrated the necessity and the importance of this investigation. My friend has appeared upon the stand this afternoon as a witness. He has testified copiously, voluminously, and yet has scarcely produced testimony to sustain one of his

of before; and if it can, whether his favorite and his model president, Saget, the President of Hayti, did not engage in that "dance of blood?"

Then the Senator from Massachusetts says that this commission will commit Congress to the policy of annexation. Is there one word of foundation for this statement? Is any Senator who may not favor the annexation of San Domingo under his present convictions to be frightened from voting for this resolution by the bald declaration that it commits Congress to annexation?

Then, again, he says the resolution is unnecessary because the President has full power to appoint the commissioners without it. Why, this is a most astonishing argument! After having pressed upon us with great force that the appointment of Babcock was a usurpation, and that his negotiation was a crime, the Senator comes back and tells us that this commission is wholly unnecessary, the President has power to appoint commissioners without any act of Congress to go there and do all that we propose they shall do, and even more!

Why, sir, suppose the President had taken that authority without consulting us, would he not have been denounced fiercely for usurpation? Would this commission not have been denounced as a mere private agency on his part—and so it would have been—for the purpose of aiding him in a most iniquitous scheme? No, sir; we took a different view of it; and the President, allow me to say, has no power to appoint a commission like this; he has no power to provide a secretary; he has no power to make the provisions that are contained in this resolution.

Then, again, the Senator calls Baez, Cabral, Fabens, and Babcock jockeys—

SENATOR SUMNER.—Not Cabral; Cazneau.

SENATOR MORTON.—Ah! not Cabral; that revolutionist is in favor, is he? A mere adventurer who for the last two years has not had four hundred men under his command at any time, and has kept himself in the mountains of Hayti, and has not been in Dominica except upon one occasion, when he was immediately driven back. Why, sir, he is a mere commander of banditti who does not and has not endangered the government of Baez; but he has all the time been presented in the consideration of this question as a formidable leader, with great strength behind him, and not to be resisted except by the naval force that the President has put at the command of Baez to keep him in power!

The Senator charges that we have kept Baez in power by three ships of war stationed upon that coast, and that the treaty was negotiated under the guns of that fleet. Admiral Poor has been denounced in the bitterest terms for his conduct in regard to Dominica and Hayti. Why, sir, I should regard this as a very serious statement if it did not appear to me to be ridiculous. With all respect to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, it seems to me that he has overdrawn this thing in a manner that can only be described as ridiculous or ludicrous. These revolutionists are not seagoing people. They have no fleet. Their field of operations, small as it is, is inland and among the mountains. But they have been kept in subjection by the three frigates of Admiral Poor! We must understand that the admiral has marched those frigates across the island and through the mountains, doubtless with a large crew of horse marines, that have kept this Cabral and his powerful army under subjection!

Mr. President, the truth is simple; it lies upon the surface; I have been long satisfied with it; and I confess to you that, so far as I am concerned, I do not require the investigation on many of these points to satisfy my mind. But while I may be satisfied others may not be. The great truth is that men of all parties in San Domingo are in favor of annexation; that the followers even of Cabral are for it, and that Cabral himself has been in favor, and is now in favor, of annexation. He undoubtedly would like to make the treaty or to conclude the negotiations, instead of Baez.

Even the people of Hayti are in favor of annexation. Only a few months ago we had Mr. Tait here, an able, educated, and intelligent man, the minister from Hayti sent by the Salmave government. He stated that the people of Hayti, the great majority, were in favor of annexation; and that they were in favor of the annexation of Dominica to the United States because they hoped that would be the precursor of their own annexation. But Salmave was murdered in cold blood; and the wretched and desperate military adventurer, the model president of the Senator from Massachusetts, when he came into power, for some reason desired to interpose an objection to the annexation of Dominica to the United States. I am told—I do not know how true it is, but it is stated in the papers, and the Senator has evidently great faith in what is stated in the papers from the reference he made to myself—that the minister of Saget, the blood-stained president, or dictator, I should say, of Hayti, had no more knowledge of his duties than to send an impertinent note to our Secretary of State remonstrating against what the President of the United States had said in his message, and that he was promptly rebuked for his ignorance and his insolence by our Secretary of State, and I believe has apologized.

Then the Senator says that the President tried to get him and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Patterson] off the Committee on Foreign Relations. I would like to know who it is informed the Senator of that fact. Who is his authority? Who is so familiar with the President as to obtain the expression of his secret desires, his secret operations, and then goes and informs the Senator from Massachusetts? I undertake to say that he is mistaken.

Mr. President, the annexation of San Domingo will come. I prophesy here to-night that it will come. It may not come in the time of General Grant, or in my time; but I believe it is destined to come; and with it, too, the annexation of Cuba and Porto Rico. Why, sir, this thing was foreseen long ago.

San Domingo is the richest piece of earth. Why, sir, it is a great natural cabinet of all the choicest productions of the world; and San Domingo alone, which if we get it will cost us but very little, is worth to us, commercially, socially, and in every other way, fifty Alaskas, for the acquisition of which my friend from Massachusetts was greatly in earnest, and in the bringing about of which he had a large influence.

But I know there is talk about the populations of these countries. Sir, they are friendly to us now, and will rapidly incorporate and consolidate with the people of this nation in case of acquisition. They will become consolidated and absorbed in this great people long before the people of Canada will be converted to annexation. The Senator from Massachusetts is greatly in favor of the acquisition of all the Canadas, and I shall be, too, when the time comes; but I tell him that the most unreasonable, the most unconquerable, and obstinate thing in this world is a British prejudice, and that the people of Canada are further from us to-day, and are less inclined to annexation at this time, than they were thirty years ago. When they are ready to come peaceably, and are anxious for it, I am ready to receive them; but the line of demarcation between them and us in point of feeling and sentiment would still remain distinct long after that between us and the people of San Domingo and Cuba would be obliterated.

I remember, when the proposition was made to annex California and New Mexico, what fearful pictures were drawn of the character of the New Mexican population, and yet there is not to-day a more loyal people to this Government than the people of New Mexico.

JAMES W. NYE [Nev.].—I submit the question to the country whether the honorable Senator to-day in his speech treated the President with that fairness with which I would have him treated by everybody. There are certain characters that have been so luminous by deeds of bravery and of patriotism as to attract attention and stand out preëminently in advance of their fellows. Two such characters are the President of the United States and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. Do what he may, cut down this friend or the other, I shall remember the glory that has clustered around him and the triumphs that he has won, and nothing shall extract from me an expression of unkindness toward him. While I glory in his independence, I glory likewise in the independence of those who differ in opinion from him. Sometimes long series of successes to those who have been in the habit of leading make it appear an offence for a person to differ with them. I do not know but that may be slightly the case with my honorable friend. He has led us through a terrible labyrinth. But other questions have sprung up on which minds differ, and I do not know but that he feels as though we all ought to bow down to him as we did upon the great measure that he made the specialty of his life. Sir, did it not involve a principle, I would always do it with deference to his superior judgment.

But, sir, we are told that the people of this country are opposed to Dominican annexation. If so, they want the information which we seek. Is there any better way? Not at all. If the honorable Senator desires to share further in this matter let him be a commissioner and go himself, and he will come back with a new song in his mouth, I will warrant you. So apparently blind to everything else, he seems to think that the President reached out after him to remove him from the Committee on Foreign Relations. This mysterious knowledge; this knowledge that is not for the public; this knowledge that one keeps so sacred that he will not even tell the body that he asks to act upon it—what is it except that he has been told so and so? Sir, what have you been told a thousand times; what have all of us been told? And when we came down to the fact the teller was the inventor of the tale. Do you suppose that if I should hear to-morrow that my friend was longing for the blood of the President I would believe it? [Laughter.] No, sir; the only place where he uses blood is in a "dance." [Laughter.] Visions of danger are floating about him when he is as safe as the babe in its mother's arms. It only shows what a heightened, quickened fancy can imagine. Everything is wrong because the President of the United States is in favor of annexing San Domingo, and not a creature that his fancy can create but what starts at his bidding! I advise my friend to just take a little of Radway's Ready Relief [laughter] get a sound sleep, and all these fancies will flee away to the source from whence they came.

The honorable Senator is not quite content in swinging his saber in a threatening attitude over the head of the President, but he attacks with more ferocity still what he terms the aid-de-kong—that is the French of it, I suppose; we call it in plain English aid-de-camp. Now, sir, because in this protocol, as it is called, evidently drawn by Mr. Gautier, in which he describes this man as aid-de-camp of the President, fancy is on its wheels; here is a regal power, the President has got an aid-de-camp, and the Senator inquires whether in the Constitution or laws there is such an office! I answer no, there is no such office; but a man of tinsel put it in; but when Mr. Babcock comes to sign his name, he signs it plain "Orville E. Babcock." But my friend says—now comes the lawyer—that the description in a deed is what gives it character.

Suppose I should, in a deed that I was going to execute to my friend, describe him as "Charles Sumner, the greatest of living American statesmen," would it vitiate the deed? [Laughter.] Suppose I should say "Charles Sumner, the leading abolitionist in America," would that vitiate the deed? Suppose I should say "the man who had military aspirations, but never gratified them," would that vitiate the deed? [Laughter.] There is anarchy, there is usurpation; consult the Constitution, consult the law, says the honorable Senator, and see if you can find such a thing! We all knew before he told us that there was not any such thing there. He puts up an image to combat when there is no image there.

"Optics nice it takes, I ween,
To see what is not to be seen."

The Senator tries to make out a case not only upon broad grounds, but upon little specialties on which he dwells with a relish equalled only by those who like to feed on rottenness, as elements of the criminality of the President of the United States. Sir, before some country justice of the peace that might do in an early day; but it will not do in this day of light and intelligence. It is reaching out after something that does not exist and magnifying a mole hill into a mountain. Upon such authority he hurls the dart of his power against the President of the United States. It may do for Sumner, but it would not do for me.

Now, sir, the treaty to which this was a protocol is dead through the instrumentality of its most polite executioner, the honorable Senator himself. Why resurrect that? This inquiry is not in relation to that treaty. Why stand here and pound a corpse? That treaty is dead. My friend seems desirous of convincing us that there is punishment after death, and he goes after that dead treaty. [Laughter.]

I complain that in the discussion upon this question of reference the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has seized upon an occasion to do what will be painful to him to his last day; he has seized upon this occasion to strike so high that the bow which he drew with such terrific power will not have strength enough in it to carry the arrow to the mark. No, sir; he will stand to-day and for all time as the boldest among the bold of the champions of human freedom. He will stand as spotless as the mountain snow of anything of crime within the memory of all of us who know him. Pure as is the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, equally pure is the President of the United States, and he would shrink from the commission of a crime with all the sensitiveness that the fine feeling of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts would.

My friend had a beautiful conclusion! And you know, Mr. President, that no man rounds his periods so beautifully as my friend; he rolls up in colossal forms his figures and caps them with the finest specimens of eloquence. In his conclusion he said that he did not stand here to oppose this measure simply upon such and such grounds, but, rising to his enormous fullness of stature, he declared that he did it in behalf of humanity. Sir, what is the true course of humanity to pursue? To stop the effusion of blood there. His description of the effect of our flag there was a tribute that it never received before. Its simple presence was the harbinger of peace; and the bugle of Cabral and the turbulence, if you please, of Baez were hushed before the power of that flag.

But my friend asks why are ships of war there but for a menace? Sir, we float our ships in the Mediterranean. Whom are we menacing there? Why do our ships float in the southern Atlantic, along the whole line of coast of other governments? They are patrolling the seas as watchmen, vigilant and faithful on their course. Why were our ships found weighing up to Alaska, when it was not ours, but Russia's? To see, as with

THE VICE-PRESIDENT.—The chair desires to state to the Senator from Michigan that he doubts whether the word "brutal" is proper to be applied to a speech made by a Senator.

SENATOR CHANDLER.—I will change the language to make it as strong as I can and still have it parliamentary. [Laughter.] Mr. President, it would hardly be supposed from what fell from the lips of the Senator from Massachusetts to-day that he was the first Senator consulted by the President upon the subject of the San Domingo treaty. And yet such is the fact.

SENATOR SUMNER.—After the treaty was signed.

SENATOR CHANDLER.—The first Senator consulted after the treaty was signed was the Senator from Massachusetts, and he certainly left upon the mind of the President the impression that he was favorably disposed toward that treaty. I will read here two or three extracts from the letters of two individuals to this effect.

Here he read extracts from letters of General Babcock and others.

The Senator from Massachusetts is to go down in history beside President Grant as a statesman. President Grant will live in the memory of his countrymen and his laurels will be fresh and green when the Senator from Massachusetts will be forgotten. But, sir, as statesmen they are to go down in history, and what do they present as their trophies? The Senator from Massachusetts marches up to the front with what? With the north pole on his shoulder and an iceberg by his side, and there is the result of his statesmanship. But the President of the United States comes with the islands of the Gulf and untold millions of wealth. There are the results of two specimens of statesmanship.

Sir, I am willing to compare those trophies side by side. We all remember the tremendous effort made by the Senator from Massachusetts last winter to get up an expedition to the north pole, and we all remember with what wonderful skill and power he advocated paying $7,200,000 in gold for Alaska, and now the result of his statesmanship is the north pole and an iceberg. The result of the President's statesmanship will be the islands of the Antilles and untold wealth to this great nation.

Mr. President, there are critical periods in human life. Children sometimes die at the teething age. If they pass through that age they may grow to manhood; but that is the trying time with the infant. Sir, there is also a trying time in the lives the eye of the eagle, the approach of any threatened danger to our country. Why do our ships go everywhere? Why are they seen in the Bosphorus? They are seen there as missionaries of our country, bearing the flag of joy and peace wherever they go. They are seen at Samana under the same commission; they are seen at San Domingo under the same commission; they are seen at Havana under the same commission, and from time to time at every other port of the known world. Sir, it is the glory of this country that her ships penetrate every nook and corner of the inhabitable world to guard and protect her commerce, to give evidence to other nations that the eyes of the American people are on their citizens everywhere. Seek other cause than that to show crime on the part of the President. I hope what the honorable Senator has said is true, that our vigilance has stayed the hands of the bloodthirsty there; and humanity, if it could speak, should thank us instead of charging it as a crime upon the President. In the name of humanity I rejoice at it, and in the name of justice the world will rejoice.

Zachariah Chandler [Mich.] called upon Senator Sumner for his authority for his statement that the President desired his (Sumner's) removal from the Committee on Foreign Relations. Senator Sumner replied that his informant was a certain Senator to whom the President had expressed that desire, but that he refused to give the Senator's name. Then, said Senator Chandler, you had no right to make the charge.

Mr. President, we have had to-day the most extraordinary exhibition that ever has taken place upon the floor of this body since I have had the honor to be a member of it. I have had the honor of a seat in this body for nearly fourteen years, and never during that time, in all the heat of political antagonism, never during the war, never before the war, have I heard so brutal an assault made upon any President of the United States as was made upon President Grant to-day in this body. This morning when the Senator denied that he had ever used a disrespectful word in secret session with regard to the President, and called upon any member of this body to contradict him if it were not so, I did not feel at liberty to rise in my seat and contradict him. But I desire to say now that his speech in secret session substantially corresponds with his speech to-day in open session, so far as the scope and spirit of it were concerned, toward the President; and there I leave it.

of public men, and if they pass that, they may live into a green old age. That fatal age is from sixty-two to sixty-five. It is the age when men are bitten with the presidential mania, and once bitten there is no cure. They die of that disease; there is no remedy.

We have had eminent examples of that description. You remember, sir, that the honorable Senator from New York—I allude to Mr. Seward—who, perhaps, had more power in this body, more power throughout the country, more popularity than any other man of his generation, was a candidate for the Presidency; and, when Mr. Lincoln obtained the nomination, he turned his back upon his old associates, never doubting but that with his tremendous power and influence, his overshadowing talent, he could at least divide the Republican party and insure a victory to its enemies. In 1862 they formed a Union party, and Mr. Seward, seduced by the hope that the Democracy would take him up in case he was dropped by the Republicans, marched over into the ranks of the enemy, and he took one vote and no more. He went down, and there was not a ripple upon the surface of the water where he went under.

A few years later another eminent statesman [Salmon P. Chase], who thought he was entitled to a presidential nomination, was disappointed. He made his appearance at the door of the Republican convention, but did not receive the nomination, and in a few days he was rapping at the door of the Democratic convention. He went out; and he, too, took one vote, and no more. Both of them had a tremendous power while they were coöperating with their friends and with their party organization; but the moment they left their party they ceased to be a power at all. And now the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, not profiting by experience, has made up his mind that with his great power, his vast influence, he can do almost anything he pleases. Well, sir, he can, inside of the Republican party; but when he organizes his troops on the other side of the chamber, when the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] marches to the bugle call of Charles Sumner, when the honorable Senators from Delaware fall into line and dress at his command, he will not have a large force, and will increase their present numbers just one. The line will not be long; it will be easily handled.

SENATOR SUMNER.—When Charles Sumner finds the Senators over the way ranging under his banner, as the Senator predicts, this country will be regenerated, for the Democratic party will be Republican.

The Senator here [Mr. Nye] says, and the Senator over the way [Mr. Norton], I think, said the same thing, that I have assailed the President. I have done no such thing. I alluded to the President as little as possible, and never except in strict subordination to the main question. On this question of annexation I feel strongly; not, as the Senator [Mr. Nye] has most uncandidly suggested, from any pride of opinion, or because I have already expressed myself one way and the President another, but because for long years I have felt strongly always when human rights are assailed. I cannot see the humble crushed without my best endeavor against the wrong. Long ago I read those proud words by which Rome in her glory was described, as making it her business to spare the humble, but to war down the proud. I felt that we had before us a case where the rule was reversed, and in an unhappy hour our Government was warring down the humble. So it seemed to me on the evidence.

Do I err? Then set the facts before the people that they may judge; but as I understand those facts, whether from official documents or from the testimony of officers or citizens who have been in that island latterly, Baez has been maintained in power by the arms of the United States. Correct me if I am wrong; but if the facts be as I believe, you must leave me to my judgment upon them.

ROSCOE CONKLING [N. Y.].—Mr. President, during this debate I have held my peace till now. I should be silent still but for the violence done this day to justice and to fairness, but for the wrong heaped upon one, foremost, not in the easy greatness of things written and said, but in the arduous greatness of things done; one who has excelled not in swollen periods, but in brave, honest deeds which have covered his name with imperishable renown. Injury and affront have been offered grievously to several, but especially to him who stands not only in his own right as a citizen, not only as the head of a great party to which a majority of the members of this body belong, but as the Chief Magistrate of the nation; and in the last character his position gives him in American esteem official primacy in the world. How comes "back-wounding calumny," intrenched behind parliamentary privilege, to strive in our very presence to soil his personal and official fame? What relation has envenomed aspersion of the President to the business which the Senate considers now?

It is notorious that a treaty was last year negotiated for the annexation of San Domingo. It is notorious that that treaty

"Mr. Sumner said: 'Those young military men whom the President had gathered around him or in his actual Cabinet, by what warrant it was difficult to say, had taken a notion that there was a good speculation in that quarter, and Grant had, honestly enough, been persuaded into their scheme. Why, a friend of mine, who has been down there, says that the whole coast of the bay of Samana is staked off into lots, and marked "Cazneau" and "Babcock" and "Baez," and that one or two particularly large ones are marked "Grant."'"

That statement, borne upon the wings of the press, has gone to be read from sea to sea. And yet, sir, the alleged author of that blasting statement is chief among those who rise in this chamber to deny to the President of the United States the privilege of sending, without cost beyond expenses, a commission of intelligent and unbiased men to report whether it be true that aggravated and agglomerated fraud besmears the treaty and the very soil of Samana.

Turn to some of the accusations hurled to-day at the President. The Senator said the negotiation of the treaty was managed by violence throughout; he said it was "propped" by violence throughout; and at that point he added, "This I aver"; "go and ask any resident in San Domingo, and he will tell you that it is true." And yet he, the man who again to-day speaking, as John Quincy Adams once said, that the nation may hear—he who thus speaking reiterates this charge of fraud and violence against the President and against those who were his agents, in the same breath denies a cheap and simple test of truth which might overthrow this malignant charge, a charge in regard to which the Senator says you have only to send witnesses to San Domingo, and every resident there will assure them it is true.

The next point upon which the Senator rose to excessive altitude was the verbal error in a memorandum referred to so properly by the Senator from Nevada: a Spaniard had described General Babcock as an aid-de-camp. I am not going to stop upon that point. It was eminently dramatic. It had well-nigh drowned the stage with tears; for it was at that point that, pausing with spectacular effect, the honorable member, addressing you, sir, exclaimed, "I see, sir, that you look grave." [Laughter.] It must have been the homage which civility pays to an occasion, it was the decorum which the Vice-President wears in his chair, if he could look grave when before a tribunal like this, trying such a cause as this, such a fact is adduced and spun out into dismal argument!

The Senator then again repeated that Baez had been sustained, and was now sustained, by an act of usurpation and by was challenged upon the ground that it was ushered in without adequate information.

So much, I say, is notorious, and light was loudly demanded. Nay, it was insisted by the enemies of the treaty, specifically, that a commission to view, explore, and report should be sent to San Domingo. This is not all. Loathsome charges were sown broadcast throughout the land. It was alleged that the treaty was hedged about with jobs on every side. It was said that fraud had suffocated the very right. Lands were said to have been staked off and labeled with the names of those responsible for the treaty; and it was whispered that the restless foot of guilty and venal adventure had been set upon the soil of Samana. These unclean vaporings were breathed upon the Chief Magistrate and upon members of his official family. Now the Chief Magistrate comes, assuming that he approves the pending resolution, asking Congress for what? For annexation? No, sir. For a committal to a scheme of annexation? No, sir. But to allow disinterested witnesses to visit San Domingo and bring back intelligence which may show that the President and others have been assailed, not with the weapons of the warrior, but with the weapons of the assassin.

Who rises in this chamber to deny to the Chief Magistrate and his subordinates this culprit's right? Who rises here to say that he shall not cleanse his official household from the stains sought to be put upon it? Does any known friend of the President rise to say these shafts have fallen harmless at his feet and he need not condescend to notice the aspersions which have been cast upon him? That would be a friendly office. But no Senator kind or considerate toward the President comes forward with objection. Who comes? Who heads to-day's hunt? The honorable member from Massachusetts. Who is he that he should do it? What relation does he sustain which mitigates the indelicacy and the wrong of his doing it? How can it be decorous or tolerable in him to object to full investigation of the condition of San Domingo, and of the circumstances attending its proposed acquisition?

Sir, the member to whom I refer would have come too late, had he come to-day, to deny that he himself is conspicuous among the authors of the aspersions aimed at the President of the United States.

On November 2, 1869, the following "interview" with Senator Sumner appeared in a Chicago paper. It has not been challenged by the Senator.

The reporter alluded to the subject of San Domingo:

the presence of an armed force. He spoke of it as a crime; and afterward he denied the assertion of the Senator from Michigan that he had assailed the President of the United States. Why, sir, if the charges made by the Senator to-day against the President be true, it would be necessary to convict him of being a fool in order to acquit him of being a knave. And yet the honorable member from Massachusetts says he has said no word against the President!

The Senator then proceeded to say, with a positiveness singular under the circumstances, that the President of the United States imitated, and I think he intimated outran, the worst acts of James Buchanan.

SENATOR SUMNER.—No, no.

SENATOR CONKLING.—The Senator shakes his head, and says "no" in his seat. I listened carefully to his statement. He was not borne upon the heady currents of debate. He spoke with premeditated design and careful preparation.

He said that the President had followed Mr. Buchanan's example in attempting to change the Committee on Foreign Relations. I allude to that statement to say that I do not know it to be true, but believe it to be false; and speaking for myself, upon my own responsibility, I say that the time has come when the Republican majority here owes it to itself to see that the Committee on Foreign Relations is reorganized and no longer led by a Senator who has launched against the Administration an assault more bitter than has proceeded from any Democratic member of this body. I say for myself that it is fit in this epoch of international commotion that the committee of this body having charge of our foreign relations shall be so composed that the President of the United States, without personal degradation, without self-abasement, and with self-respect, can go to the chairman, or send for him and hold converse with him, receiving candid and frank treatment.¹

I am not anxious for one, to commit myself to the annexation of San Domingo. I shall endeavor to exercise the intelligence not only, but the independence, to vote upon that question, should it be presented, in the light of all the circumstances which surround it. I am not anxious to debate the merits of San Domingo now. And yet I cannot shut my eyes to some facts which I can state in a moment. I cannot forget that upward of $58,000,000 of imports come here annually from Cuba, wrung from slave labor. I cannot forget that seventy per cent.

of the commerce of Cuba is with us. I cannot forget that the coffee of Brazil, grown by slaves, nearly all of it comes here. I can never forget that the slave trade, flourishing in Cuba and for Cuba, rode the seas until 1861 under the stolen protection of the starry banner of the Republic; and in that connection I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that if this commission shall corroborate the tidings that we have of the condition, the soil, the climate, and the capacities of San Domingo, by its acquisition we can at once provide ourselves by the medium of free labor with the sugar and the coffee, the products of Cuba and Brazil, and take a long stride on the path which marks the civilization of the world and the melioration of humanity and its wrongs.

But, sir, as I say, I have no wish to anticipate this inquiry. The question which addresses itself to us is widely different. Those who urge this resolution protest against deciding the cause and then trying it afterward, or not trying it at all. That is the issue; and if political effect is to be given in consequence of the essay of the Senator from Massachusetts, or of the speeches upon the other side of this chamber in denunciation of the supposition that a Republican Administration is looking for territory in the Gulf of Mexico, so be it. We will argue that question in the appropriate forum with our opponents and the allies who have recently joined them; and when we do, we will go back in history; we will go back to the time when James Buchanan, John Y. Mason, August Belmont, and Pierre Soulé, assembled at the tomb of Charlemagne and proclaimed the Ostend manifesto. We will go back to the time when it was Democratic doctrine, not only that we needed empire in the tropics, not only that we longed for the West Indian islands, but that the Queen of the Antilles was so essential to us that, falling back on the elementary doctrine of self-preservation, we would assert Rob Roy's right, assert the dogma that might makes right, and, in the language of Mr. Soulé, responding to a serenade in the city of New York, "tear it by force from the old Spanish wolf." That was commendable Democratic doctrine in those days, yet Democrats are against honest purchase now. We will argue before that great jury, too numerous to be packed and too virtuous to be bribed, the question whether in this day it is safe honestly, economically, cheaply to oppose free labor in San Domingo to the slave labor of the cane fields of Cuba, and whether in truth, if this island proves of the value and abounding in the promises ascribed to it, it is wise or otherwise that we acquire it.

But, sir, that question in its political bearings is not here.

language and with precisely the same meaning any agitation whatever of the subject of slavery or the abolition thereof. But there was one man in the Senate of the United States that day, and but one, who repudiated both platforms and both candidates; and that man was Charles Sumner. I see him standing in the Senate chamber then without a single follower. He had no ten men, the number of the Democrats here, to dress into line then; he had nobody but himself, and I have lived to see the day when sixty Senators of the Republican party, the Senator from Michigan among them, too, were following in his footsteps with the most implicit obedience.

Where then were you who now talk of nothing but freedom? Where then were you who now boast of the enfranchisement of the African race? Where then were you who are so ready to denounce any man that ever stood up for the institutions of the country, or at least sought to prevent the country from being ruined by their disturbance? Where were you, Republican Senators, in the year 1852, when the Senator from Massachusetts stood, if not solitary, at least alone? Where were you? One half of you, or nearly so, voting for Franklin Pierce, and the rest of you for Winfield Scott.

Now, I am not here to defend the Senator from Massachusetts. He is quite able to defend himself. I am not here to nominate him as commander-in-chief of this little body of Democrats. I do not think they want his leadership, and I do not think he seeks the command. But when he is reproached with the small number of his followers, with the number ten, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that eighteen years ago he had not one-tenth of ten to follow him, although since that he has had six times ten to obey his commands.

But, again, is there nobody in this chamber who concurs in the opposition of the Senator from Massachusetts to the annexation of San Domingo but this little band of ten Democrats? Are we all? If that be the case, why was not the treaty ratified? If "shoot the deserters" be the word; if "scalp those who do not march with perfect fidelity at the command of the President of the United States" be the order of the day, why is it that the Senator from Massachusetts alone is assaulted, and all those who concurred with him in opposing the ratification of the treaty and now concur with him in opposition to this resolution, members of the Republican party, Republican Senators, are left without assault, and that no scalp of theirs is taken from their heads?

If the result of this discussion and of the vote on this reso-

The question for any purpose whatever is not here. The simple question is whether we will consent to an impartial inquiry.

Mr. President, well is it for the President of the United States, if he be sensitive touching the licentious tongues of his fellow-countrymen, that he did not presume so far as to act on what I think I have heard denominated personal government, as to undertake, without the assent or the authority of Congress, to send commissioners to San Domingo. This chamber would not have been large enough to hold the sound or the reverberations of that sound with which denunciations would have rolled against such an act. Cautious as he has ever been, gifted not only with sight but with insight, he judged, I think, wisely in not hazarding upon the borders of his power an act of his own to accomplish this purpose.

There is no trick underneath this proposition. It is a respect and constitutional deference to Congress. I assume that the President does approve this resolution; I will assume that it is couched in the very words, if you please, in which he would approve it; and then I say it is the decorous, constitutional mode of reaching the end in view. It is the proper way of establishing for the credit of the American name, not to speak of individuals, the falsehood, if they be false, of those accusations which have darkened the air since the original treaty was negotiated. It is the mode at the same time of bringing to us that information, without which the Senate once acted, that information the want of which was trumpeted throughout the land as the fatal vice in the treaty; that information which will enable us to speak with intelligence upon a grave national question.

Senator Thurman rose in defence of Senator Sumner.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Chandler] was pleased to tell the Senator from Massachusetts that when he came to train this little body of Democrats here it would not be a very difficult task, that there were not so many of them but that he might dress them in line without any very great military genius to enable him to do so. When the Senator made that remark my memory took me back eighteen years to the memorable year 1852. There was a presidential election that year. There were two candidates, the Whig candidate, General Winfield Scott, the Democratic candidate, General Franklin Pierce. They stood upon platforms that in one particular had no essential difference whatever; platforms that denounced in almost the same lution is to be the condemnation of Charles Sumner, it is to be the condemnation of a score of Republicans who stand by his side in this controversy. If you are ready to shoot the deserters, or if you are ready to expel them from your ranks, gentlemen, do it as soon as you please. Your party has opened wide arms to deserters; you have looked no gift horses in the mouth; you have taken everything that came, whether halt, lame, or blind. Perhaps we may be as charitable to you [laughter], and when you begin that expulsion which seems to be the order of the day and inaugurated to-night I believe we shall not put you upon too much penance if we only have some reason to hope that you will train with some little degree of fidelity in the Democratic ranks.

Senator Thurman closed by giving his reasons why he was opposed to the annexation of Dominica.

It is because I am opposed to acquiring Hayti [the other part of the island] by force or by fraud; because I am opposed to an increase of the army and the navy; because I am opposed to increasing the expenses of the Government, and because I am opposed to taking any further step in what I think, with all deference to others, is the downward road we are treading toward a consolidated despotism in this land, that I must give my vote at every stage of the case, from first to last, against all propositions that look to the annexation of Dominica.

The joint resolution was passed by 32 yeas, 9 nays. On January 9, 1871, the resolution was brought before the House. Jacob A. Ambler [O.] moved the following amendment:

Provided, That nothing in this resolution contained shall be held, understood, or construed as committing Congress to the policy of annexing the territory of said republic of Dominica.

After considerable discussion this amendment was adopted on January 10 by a vote of 108 yeas, 76 nays; and the resolution was passed by a vote of 123 yeas, 63 nays.

The Senate concurred in the House amendment on January 11 by a vote of 57 yeas and 0 nays. The joint resolution was signed by the President on the 12th.

The President appointed on this commission: Benjamin F. Wade [O.], Andrew D. White [N. Y.], and Samuel G. Howe [Mass.]. After thorough personal investigation of the republic of Dominica they reported that it should be annexed.

In communicating the report to Congress on April 5, 1871, the President said:

The mere rejection by the Senate of a treaty negotiated by the President only indicates a difference of opinion among different departments of the Government, without touching the character or wounding the pride of either. But when such rejection takes place simultaneously with charges, openly made, of corruption on the part of the President, or of those employed by him, the case is different. Indeed, in such case the honor of the nation demands investigation. This has been accomplished by the report of the commissioners, herewith transmitted, and which fully vindicates the purity of motives and action of those who represented the United States in the negotiation. And now my task is finished, and with it ends all personal solicitude upon the subject. My duty being done, yours begins, and I gladly hand over the whole matter to the judgment of the American people and of their representatives in Congress assembled.

"In again submitting to Congress a subject upon which public sentiment has been divided, and which has been made the occasion of acrimonious debates in Congress, as well as of unjust aspersions elsewhere, I may, I trust, be indulged in a single remark. No man could hope to perform duties so delicate and responsible as pertain to the presidential office without sometimes incurring the hostility of those who deem their opinions and wishes treated with insufficient consideration; and he who undertakes to conduct the affairs of a great government as a faithful public servant, if sustained by the approval of his own conscience, may rely with confidence upon the candor and intelligence of a free people, whose best interest he has striven to subserve, and can bear with patience the censure of disappointed men."

The President's view, expressed in his last sentence, that the cause of Senator Sumner's attack upon him was disappointed ambition was generally accepted by the country. After the attack the two statesmen held no personal intercourse, and in 1872 the Senator joined

THE VENEZUELA BOUNDARY

Special Message of President Cleveland—Correspondence Between Lord Salisbury, British Prime Minister, and Richard Olney, American Secretary of State, on the Monroe Doctrine—The "War Scare"—Boundary Commission Appointed—Dispute Arbitrated.

ON December 17, 1895, President Cleveland sent a special message to the Senate on the dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela over the boundary between British Guiana and Venezuela.

This dispute, which had been in existence for fifty years, had been brought to a crisis by recent encroachments of the British upon what Venezuela considered her territory.

Richard Olney, American Secretary of State, had entered into extensive correspondence with the British Government, through its Ambassador at Washington, Sir Julian Pauncefote, on the subject of our rights under the Monroe Doctrine, and had been met by Lord Salisbury, the British prime minister, with a refusal to admit that the Monroe Doctrine, whatever its expediency, "is clothed with the sanction which belongs to a doctrine of international law." This correspondence the President laid before the Senate with his message.

SPECIAL MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT CLEVELAND

In my annual message addressed to the Congress on the 3d instant I called attention to the pending boundary controversy between Great Britain and the Republic of Venezuela, and recited the substance of a representation made by this Government to Her Britannic Majesty's Government suggesting rea-in the Liberal Republican movement to elect Horace Greeley to the Presidency in place of General Grant.

Beyond submitting the report of the commission the President made no attempt to secure further action on the annexation of San Domingo, and the project was quietly dropped by Congress. He nevertheless held to his belief in the expediency of the measure, recurring to it in his last annual message (December, 1876):

"If my views had been concurred in, the country would be in a more prosperous condition to-day, both politically and financially."

sons why such dispute should be submitted to arbitration for settlement and inquiring whether it would be so submitted.

The answer of the British Government, which was then awaited, has since been received, and, together with the dispatch to which it is a reply, is hereto appended.

Such reply is embodied in two communications by the British prime minister to Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British ambassador at this capital. It will be seen that one of these communications is devoted exclusively to observations upon the Monroe Doctrine, and claims that in the present instance a new and strange extension and development of this doctrine is insisted on by the United States, that the reasons justifying an appeal to the doctrine enunciated by President Monroe are generally inapplicable "to the state of things in which we live at the present day," and especially inapplicable to a controversy involving the boundary line between Great Britain and Venezuela.

Without attempting extended argument in reply to these positions, it may not be amiss to suggest that the doctrine upon which we stand is strong and sound because its enforcement is important to our peace and safety as a nation, and is essential to the integrity of our free institutions and the tranquil maintenance of our distinctive form of government. It was intended to apply to every stage of our national life, and cannot become obsolete while our Republic endures. If the balance of power is justly a cause for jealous anxiety among the governments of the Old World and a subject for our absolute non-interference, none the less is an observance of the Monroe doctrine of vital concern to our people and their Government.

Assuming, therefore, that we may properly insist upon this doctrine without regard to "the state of things in which we live," or any changed conditions here or elsewhere, it is not apparent why its application may not be invoked in the present controversy.

If a European power, by an extension of its boundaries, takes possession of the territory of one of our neighboring republics against its will and in derogation of its rights, it is difficult to see why, to that extent, such European power does not thereby attempt to extend its system of government to that portion of this continent which is thus taken. This is the precise action which President Monroe declared to be "dangerous to our peace and safety," and it can make no difference whether the European system is extended by an advance of frontier or otherwise.

It is also suggested in the British reply that we should not seek to apply the Monroe Doctrine to the pending dispute because it does not embody any principle of international law which "is founded on the general consent of nations," and that "no statesman, however eminent, and no nation, however powerful, are competent to insert into the code of international law a novel principle which was never recognized before, and which has not since been accepted by the government of any other country."

Practically the principle for which we contend has peculiar, if not exclusive, relation to the United States. It may not have been admitted in so many words to the code of international law, but since in international councils every nation is entitled to the rights belonging to it, if the enforcement of the Monroe Doctrine is something we may justly claim, it has its place in the code of international law as certainly and as securely as if it were specifically mentioned, and when the United States is a suitor before the high tribunal that administers international law the question to be determined is whether or not we present claims which the justice of that code of law can find to be right and valid.

The Monroe Doctrine finds its recognition in those principles of international law which are based upon the theory that every nation shall have its rights protected and its just claims enforced.

Of course this Government is entirely confident that under the sanction of this doctrine we have clear rights and undoubted claims. Nor is this ignored in the British reply. The prime minister, while not admitting that the Monroe Doctrine is applicable to present conditions, states: "In declaring that the United States would resist any such enterprise if it was contemplated President Monroe adopted a policy which received the entire sympathy of the English Government of that date." He further declares: "Though the language of President Monroe is directed to the attainment of objects which most Englishmen would agree to be salutary, it is impossible to admit that they have been inscribed by any adequate authority in the code of international law."

Again the prime minister says: "They (Her Majesty's Government) fully concur with the view which President Monroe apparently entertained, that any disturbance of the existing territorial distribution in that hemisphere by any fresh acquisition on the part of any European state would be a highly inexpedient change."

given to all available evidence, records, and facts in support of the claims of both parties.

In order that such an examination should be prosecuted in a thorough and satisfactory manner, I suggest that the Congress make an adequate appropriation for the expenses of a commission, to be appointed by the Executive, who shall make the necessary investigation and report upon the matter with the least possible delay. When such report is made and accepted it will, in my opinion, be the duty of the United States to resist, by every means in its power, as a willful aggression upon its rights and interests, the appropriation by Great Britain of any lands or the exercise of governmental jurisdiction over any territory which, after investigation, we have determined of right belongs to Venezuela.

In making these recommendations I am fully alive to the responsibility incurred, and keenly realize all the consequences that may follow.

I am, nevertheless, firm in my conviction that, while it is a grievous thing to contemplate the two great English-speaking peoples of the world as being otherwise than friendly competitors in the onward march of civilization and strenuous and worthy rivals in all the arts of peace, there is no calamity which a great nation can invite which equals that which follows a supine submission to wrong and injustice and the consequent loss of national self-respect and honor, beneath which are shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness.

DIPLOMATIC DEBATE ON THE VENEZUELA BOUNDARY

SECRETARY OLNEY TO AMBASSADOR BAYARD, JULY 20, 1895

The Secretary recounted the status of the dispute. He then said:

The foregoing analysis shows the status to be such that those charged with the interests of the United States are now forced to determine exactly what those interests are and what course of action they require. It compels them to decide to what extent, if any, the United States may and should intervene in a controversy between and primarily concerning only Great Britain and Venezuela, and to decide how far it is bound to see that the integrity of Venezuelan territory is not impaired by the pretensions of its powerful antagonist. Are any such right and duty devolved upon the United States? If not, the

In the belief that the doctrine for which we contend was clear and definite, that it was founded upon substantial considerations and involved our safety and welfare, that it was fully applicable to our present conditions and to the state of the world's progress, and that it was directly related to the pending controversy, and without any conviction as to the final merits of the dispute, but anxious to learn in a satisfactory and conclusive manner whether Great Britain sought, under a claim of boundary, to extend her possessions on this continent without right, or whether she merely sought possession of territory fairly included within her lines of ownership, this Government proposed to the Government of Great Britain a resort to arbitration as the proper means of settling the question, to the end that a vexatious boundary dispute between the two contestants might be determined and our exact standing and relation in respect to the controversy might be made clear.

It will be seen from the correspondence herewith submitted that this proposition has been declined by the British Government, upon grounds which, in the circumstances, seem to me to be far from satisfactory. It is deeply disappointing that such an appeal, actuated by the most friendly feelings toward both nations directly concerned, addressed to the sense of justice and to the magnanimity of one of the great powers of the world and touching its relations to one comparatively weak and small, should have produced no better results.

The course to be pursued by this Government, in view of the present condition, does not appear to admit of serious doubt. Having labored faithfully for many years to induce Great Britain to submit this dispute to impartial arbitration, and having been now finally apprised of her refusal to do so, nothing remains but to accept the situation, to recognize its plain requirements, and deal with it accordingly. Great Britain's present proposition has never thus far been regarded as admissible by Venezuela, though any adjustment of the boundary which that country may deem for her advantage and may enter into of her own free will cannot of course be objected to by the United States.

Assuming, however, that the attitude of Venezuela will remain unchanged, the dispute has reached such a stage as to make it now incumbent upon the United States to take measures to determine with sufficient certainty for its justification what is the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana. The inquiry to that end should of course be conducted carefully and judiciously, and due weight should be

United States has already done all, if not more than all, that a purely sentimental interest in the affairs of the two countries justifies, and to push its interposition further would be unbecoming and undignified, and might well subject it to the charge of impertinent intermeddling with affairs with which it has no rightful concern. On the other hand, if any such right and duty exist, their due exercise and discharge will not permit of any action that shall not be efficient, and that, if the power of the United States is adequate, shall not result in the accomplishment of the end in view.

That there are circumstances under which a nation may justly interpose in a controversy to which two or more other nations are the direct and immediate parties is an admitted canon of international law. The doctrine is ordinarily expressed in terms of the most general character, and is perhaps incapable of more specific statement. It is declared in substance that a nation may avail itself of this right whenever what is done or proposed by any of the parties primarily concerned is a serious and direct menace to its own integrity, tranquillity, or welfare. On the other hand, it is an inevitable though unfortunate consequence of the wide scope of the rule that intervention has only too often been made a cloak for schemes of wanton spoliation and aggrandizement. We are concerned at this time, however, not so much with the general rule as with a form of it which is peculiarly and distinctively American.

Here the Secretary recounted the foreign policy of the United States from the Administration of Washington to that of Monroe.

The Monroe Administration did not content itself with formulating a correct rule for the regulation of the relations between Europe and America. It aimed at also securing the practical benefits to result from the application of the rule. Hence the President's famous message declared that the American continents were fully occupied and were not the subjects for future colonization by European powers. To this spirit and this purpose also are to be attributed the passages of the same message which treat any infringement of the rule against interference in American affairs on the part of the powers of Europe as an act of unfriendliness to the United States. It was realized that it was futile to lay down such a rule unless its observance could be enforced. It was manifest that the United States was the only power in this hemisphere capable of enforcing it. It was therefore courageously declared not merely that Europe ought not to interfere in American affairs, but that any European power doing so would be regarded as antagonizing the interests and inviting the opposition of the United States.

That America is in no part open to colonization, though the proposition was not universally admitted at the time of its first enunciation, has long been universally conceded. We are now concerned, therefore, only with that other practical application of the Monroe Doctrine, the disregard of which by an European power is to be deemed an act of unfriendliness toward the United States. The precise scope and limitations of this rule cannot be too clearly apprehended. It does not establish any general protectorate by the United States over other American states. It does not relieve any American state from its obligations as fixed by international law, nor prevent any European power directly interested from enforcing such obligations or from inflicting merited punishment for the breach of them. It does not contemplate any interference in the internal affairs of any American state or in the relations between it and other American states. It does not justify any attempt on our part to change the established form of government of any American state or to prevent the people of such state from altering that form according to their own will and pleasure. The rule in question has but a single purpose and object. It is that no European power or combination of European powers shall forcibly deprive an American state of the right and power of self-government and of shaping for itself its own political fortunes and destinies.

That the rule thus defined has been the accepted public law of this country ever since its promulgation cannot fairly be denied. Three years after its promulgation, Webster declared that the doctrine involved the honor of the country. "I look upon it," he said, "as part of its treasures of reputation, and for one I intend to guard it," and he added:

"I look on the message of December, 1823, as forming a bright page in our history. I will help neither to erase it nor tear it out; nor shall it be by any act of mine blurred or blotted. It did honor to the sagacity of the Government, and I will not diminish that honor."

Though the rule thus highly eulogized by Webster has never been formally affirmed by Congress, the House in 1864 declared against the Mexican monarchy sought to be set up by the French as not in accord with the policy of the United States, herself. America is not interested in them and ought not to be vexed or complicated with them.

What is true of the material is no less true of what may be termed the moral interests involved. Those pertaining to Europe are peculiar to her and are entirely diverse from those pertaining and peculiar to America. Europe as a whole is monarchical, and, with the single important exception of the Republic of France, is committed to the monarchical principle. America, on the other hand, is devoted to the exactly opposite principle—to the idea that every people has an inalienable right of self-government—and in the United States of America has furnished to the world the most conspicuous and conclusive example and proof of the excellence of free institutions, whether from the standpoint of national greatness or of individual happiness. It cannot be necessary, however, to enlarge upon this phase of the subject. Whether moral or material interests be considered, it cannot but be universally conceded that those of Europe are irreconcilably diverse from those of America, and that any European control of the latter is necessarily both incongruous and injurious. If, however, for the reasons stated, the forcible intrusion of European powers into American politics is to be deprecated—if, as it is to be deprecated, it should be resisted and prevented—such resistance and prevention must come from the United States. They would come from it, of course, were it made the point of attack. But, if they come at all, they must also come from it when any other American state is attacked, since only the United States has the strength adequate to the exigency.

Is it true, then, that the safety and welfare of the United States are so concerned with the maintenance of the independence of every American state as against any European power as to justify and require the interposition of the United States whenever that independence is endangered? The question can be candidly answered in but one way. The states of America, south as well as north, by geographical proximity, by natural sympathy, by similarity of governmental constitutions, are friends and allies, commercially and politically, of the United States. To allow the subjugation of any of them by an European power is, of course, to completely reverse that situation and signifies the loss of all the advantages incident to their natural relations to us. But that is not all. The people of the United States have a vital interest in the cause of popular self-government. They have secured the right for themselves and their posterity at the cost of infinite blood and treasure.

and in 1889 the Senate expressed its disapproval of the connection of any European power with a canal across the Isthmus of Darien or Central America. It is manifest that if a rule has been openly and uniformly declared and acted upon by the executive branch of the Government for more than seventy years without express repudiation by Congress, it must be conclusively presumed to have its sanction. Nor, if the practical results of the rule be sought for, is the record either meager or obscure.

Its first and immediate effect was indeed most momentous and far reaching. It was the controlling factor in the emancipation of South America and to it the independent states which now divide that region between them are largely indebted for their very existence. Since then the most striking single achievement to be credited to the rule is the evacuation of Mexico by the French upon the termination of the Civil War. But we are also indebted to it for the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which both neutralized any interoceanic canal across Central America and expressly excluded Great Britain from occupying or exercising any dominion over any part of Central America. It has been used in the case of Cuba as if justifying the position that, while the sovereignty of Spain will be respected, the island will not be permitted to become the possession of any other European power. It has been influential in bringing about the definite relinquishment of any supposed protectorate by Great Britain over the Mosquito Coast.

The foregoing enumeration not only shows the many instances wherein the rule in question has been affirmed and applied, but also demonstrates that the Venezuelan boundary controversy is in any view far within the scope and spirit of the rule as uniformly accepted and acted upon. A doctrine of American public law thus long and firmly established and supported could not easily be ignored in a proper case for its application, even were the considerations upon which it is founded obscure or questionable. No such objection can be made, however, to the Monroe Doctrine, understood and defined in the manner already stated. It rests, on the contrary, upon facts and principles that are both intelligible and incontrovertible. That distance and 3,000 miles of intervening ocean make any permanent political union between an European and an American state unnatural and inexpedient will hardly be denied. But physical and geographical considerations are the least of the objections to such a union. Europe, as Washington observed, has a set of primary interests which are peculiar to

They have realized and exemplified its beneficent operation by a career unexampled in point of national greatness or individual felicity. They believe it to be for the healing of all nations, and that civilization must either advance or retrograde accordingly as its supremacy is extended or curtailed. Imbued with these sentiments, the people of the United States might not impossibly be wrought up to an active propaganda in favor of a cause so highly valued both for themselves and for mankind. But the age of the Crusades has passed, and they are content with such assertion and defence of the right of popular self-government as their own security and welfare demand. It is in that view more than in any other that they believe it not to be tolerated that the political control of an American state shall be forcibly assumed by an European power.

The mischiefs apprehended from such a source are none the less real because not immediately imminent in any specific case, and are none the less to be guarded against because the combination of circumstances that will bring them upon us cannot be predicted. The civilized states of Christendom deal with each other on substantially the same principles that regulate the conduct of individuals. The greater its enlightenment, the more surely every state perceives that its permanent interests require it to be governed by the immutable principles of right and justice. Each, nevertheless, is only too liable to succumb to the temptations offered by seeming special opportunities for its own aggrandizement, and each would rashly imperil its own safety were it not to remember that for the regard and respect of other states it must be largely dependent upon its own strength and power. To-day the United States is practically sovereign on this continent, and its fiat is law upon the subjects to which it confines its interposition. Why? It is not because of the pure friendship or good will felt for it. It is not simply by reason of its high character as a civilized state, nor because wisdom and justice and equity are the invariable characteristics of the dealings of the United States. It is because, in addition to all other grounds, its infinite resources, combined with its isolated position, render it master of the situation and practically invulnerable as against any or all other powers.

All the advantages of this superiority are at once imperiled if the principle be admitted that European powers may convert American states into colonies or provinces of their own. The principle would be eagerly availed of, and every power doing so would immediately acquire a base of military operations against us. What one power was permitted to do could not be denied to another, and it is not inconceivable that the struggle now going on for the acquisition of Africa might be transferred to South America. If it were, the weaker countries would unquestionably be soon absorbed, while the ultimate result might be the partition of all South America between the various European powers. The disastrous consequences to the United States of such a condition of things are obvious. The loss of prestige, of authority, and of weight in the councils of the family of nations would be among the least of them. Our only real rivals in peace as well as enemies in war would be found located at our very doors. Thus far in our history we have been spared the burdens and evils of immense standing armies and all the other accessories of huge warlike establishments, and the exemption has largely contributed to our national greatness and wealth as well as to the happiness of every citizen. But, with the powers of Europe permanently encamped on American soil, the ideal conditions we have thus far enjoyed cannot be expected to continue. We, too, must be armed to the teeth; we, too, must convert the flower of our male population into soldiers and sailors, and, by withdrawing these citizens from the various pursuits of peaceful industry, we, too, must practically annihilate a large share of the productive energy of the nation.

How a greater calamity than this could overtake us it is difficult to see. Nor are our just apprehensions to be allayed by suggestions of the friendliness of European powers—of their good will toward us—of their disposition, should they be our neighbors, to dwell with us in peace and harmony. The people of the United States have learned in the school of experience to what extent the relations of states to each other depend not upon sentiment nor principle, but upon selfish interest. They will not soon forget that, in their hour of distress, all their anxieties and burdens were aggravated by the possibility of demonstrations against their national life on the part of powers with whom they had long maintained the most harmonious relations. They have yet in mind that France seized upon the apparent opportunity of our Civil War to set up a monarchy in the adjoining state of Mexico. They realize that had France and Great Britain held important South American possessions to work from and to benefit, the temptation to destroy the predominance of the great Republic in this hemisphere by furthering its dismemberment might have been irresistible. From that grave peril they have been saved in the past and may be saved again in the future through the operation of the sure but silent to procure a fraction of South American soil by voluntary cession.

The declaration of the Monroe message—that existing colonies or dependencies of an European power would not be interfered with by the United States—means colonies or dependencies then existing, with their limits as then existing. So it has been invariably construed, and so it must continue to be construed unless it is to be deprived of all vital force. Great Britain cannot be deemed a South American state within the purview of the Monroe Doctrine, nor, if she is appropriating Venezuelan territory, is it material that she does so by advancing the frontier of an old colony instead of by the planting of a new colony. The difference is matter of form and not of substance, and the doctrine, if pertinent in the one case, must be in the other also. It is not admitted, however, and therefore cannot be assumed, that Great Britain is in fact usurping dominion over Venezuelan territory. While Venezuela charges such usurpation, Great Britain denies it, and the United States, until the merits are authoritatively ascertained, can take sides with neither. But while this is so—while the United States may not, under existing circumstances at least, take upon itself to say which of the two parties is right and which wrong—it is certainly within its right to demand that the truth shall be ascertained. Being entitled to resent and resist any sequestration of Venezuelan soil by Great Britain, it is necessarily entitled to know whether such sequestration has occurred or is now going on. Otherwise, if the United States is without the right to know and have it determined whether there is or is not British aggression upon Venezuelan territory, its right to protest against or repel such aggression may be dismissed from consideration.

The right to act upon a fact the existence of which there is no right to have ascertained is simply illusory. It being clear, therefore, that the United States may legitimately insist upon the merits of the boundary question being determined, it is equally clear that there is but one feasible mode of determining them, viz., peaceful arbitration. Great Britain admits that there is a controversy and that arbitration should be resorted to for its adjustment. But the practical effect of this admission is completely nullified by her insistence that the submission shall cover but a part of the controversy—that, as a condition of arbitrating her right to a part of the disputed territory, the remainder shall be turned over to her. If it were possible to point to a boundary which both parties had ever force of the doctrine proclaimed by President Monroe. To abandon it, on the other hand, disregarding both the logic of the situation and the facts of our past experience, would be to renounce a policy which has proved both an easy defence against foreign aggression and a prolific source of internal progress and prosperity.

There is, then, a doctrine of American public law, well founded in principle and abundantly sanctioned by precedent, which entitles and requires the United States to treat as an injury to itself the forcible assumption by an European power of political control over an American state. The application of the doctrine to the boundary dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela remains to be made and presents no real difficulty. Though the dispute relates to a boundary line, yet, as it is between states, it necessarily imports political control to be lost by one party and gained by the other. The political control at stake, too, is of no mean importance but concerns a domain of great extent—the British claim, it will be remembered, apparently expanded in two years some 33,000 square miles—and, if it also directly involves the command of the mouth of the Orinoco, is of immense consequence in connection with the whole river navigation of the interior of South America. It has been intimated, indeed, that in respect of these South American possessions Great Britain is herself an American state like any other, so that a controversy between her and Venezuela is to be settled between themselves as if it were between Venezuela and Brazil or between Venezuela and Columbia, and does not call for or justify United States intervention. If this view be tenable at all, the logical sequence is plain.

Great Britain as a South American state is to be entirely differentiated from Great Britain generally, and, if the boundary question cannot be settled otherwise than by force, British Guiana, with her own independent resources, and not those of the British Empire, should be left to settle the matter with Venezuela—an arrangement which very possibly Venezuela might not object to. But the proposition that an European power with an American dependency is, for the purposes of the Monroe Doctrine, to be classed not as an European but as an American state will not admit of serious discussion. If it were to be adopted, the Monroe Doctrine would be too valueless to be worth asserting. Not only would every European power now having a South American colony be enabled to extend its possessions on this continent indefinitely, but any other European power might also do the same by first taking pains agreed or assumed to be such either expressly or tacitly, the demand that territory conceded by such line to British Guiana should be held not to be in dispute might rest upon a reasonable basis. But there is no such line. The territory which Great Britain insists shall be ceded to her as a condition of arbitrating her claim to other territory has never been admitted to belong to her. It has always and consistently been claimed by Venezuela.

Upon what principle—except her feebleness as a nation—is she to be denied the right of having the claim heard and passed upon by an impartial tribunal? No reason nor shadow of reason appears in all the voluminous literature of the subject. "It is to be so because I will it to be so" seems to be the only justification Great Britain offers. It is, indeed, intimated that the British claim to this particular territory rests upon an occupation which, whether acquiesced in or not, has ripened into a perfect title by long continuance. But what prescription affecting territorial rights can be said to exist as between sovereign states? Or, if there is any, what is the legitimate consequence? It is not that all arbitration should be denied, but only that the submission should embrace an additional topic, namely, the validity of the asserted prescriptive title either in point of law or in point of fact. No different result follows from the contention that as matter of principle Great Britain cannot be asked to submit and ought not to submit to arbitration her political and sovereign rights over territory. This contention, if applied to the whole or to a vital part of the possessions of a sovereign state, need not be controverted. To hold otherwise might be equivalent to holding that a sovereign state was bound to arbitrate its very existence.

But Great Britain has herself shown in various instances that the principle has no pertinency when either the interests or the territorial area involved are not of controlling magnitude and her loss of them as the result of an arbitration cannot appreciably affect her honor or her power. Thus she has arbitrated the extent of her colonial possessions twice with the United States, twice with Portugal, and once with Germany, and perhaps in other instances. By the award of the Emperor of Germany, the arbitration in the Oregon boundary case, the United States acquired San Juan and a number of smaller islands near the coast of Vancouver as a consequence of the decision that the term "the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver Island," as used in the treaty of Washington of 1846, meant the Haro channel and not the Rosario channel. Yet a leading contention of Great Britain before the arbitrator was that equity required a judgment in her favor because a decision in favor of the United States would deprive British subjects of rights of navigation of which they had had the habitual enjoyment from the time when the Rosario Strait was first explored and surveyed in 1798.

Therefore the British demand that her right to a portion of the disputed territory shall be acknowledged before she will consent to an arbitration as to the rest seems to stand upon nothing but her own ipse dixit. She says to Venezuela, in substance: "You can get none of the debatable land by force, because you are not strong enough; you can get none by treaty because I will not agree; and you can take your chance of getting a portion by arbitration only if you first agree to abandon to me such other portion as I may designate." It is not perceived how such an attitude can be defended nor how it is reconcilable with that love of justice and fair play so eminently characteristic of the English race. It in effect deprives Venezuela of her free agency and puts her under virtual duress. Territory acquired by reason of it will be as much wrested from her by the strong hand as if occupied by British troops or covered by British fleets. It seems, therefore, quite impossible that this position of Great Britain should be assented to by the United States, or that, if such position be adhered to with the result of enlarging the bounds of British Guiana, it should not be regarded as amounting, in substance, to an invasion and conquest of Venezuelan territory.

In these circumstances the duty of the President appears to him unmistakable and imperative. Great Britain's assertion of title to the disputed territory, combined with her refusal to have that title investigated, being a substantial appropriation of the territory to her own use, not to protest and give warning that the transaction will be regarded as injurious to the interests of the people of the United States, as well as oppressive in itself, would be to ignore an established policy with which the honor and welfare of this country are closely identified. While the measures necessary or proper for the vindication of that policy are to be determined by another branch of the Government, it is clearly for the Executive to leave nothing undone which may tend to render such determination unnecessary.

You are instructed, therefore, to present the foregoing views to Lord Salisbury and to reinforce them by such pertinent considerations as will doubtless occur to you. They call for a definite decision upon the point whether Great Britain will con-

It was sustained by external aid, were incidents fresh in the mind of President Monroe when he penned his celebrated message. The system of which he speaks, and of which he so resolutely deprecates the application to the American continent, was the system then adopted by certain powerful states upon the continent of Europe of combining to prevent by force of arms the adoption in other countries of political institutions which they disliked, and to uphold by external pressure those which they approved. Various portions of South America had recently declared their independence, and that independence had not been recognized by the Governments of Spain and Portugal, to which, with small exception, the whole of Central and South America were nominally subject. It was not an imaginary danger that he foresaw, if he feared that the same spirit which had dictated the French expedition into Spain might inspire the more powerful governments of Europe with the idea of imposing, by the force of European arms, upon the South American communities the form of government and the political connection which they had thrown off. In declaring that the United States would resist any such enterprise if it was contemplated, President Monroe adopted a policy which received the entire sympathy of the English Government of that date.

The dangers which were apprehended by President Monroe have no relation to the state of things in which we live at the present day. There is no danger of any Holy Alliance imposing its system upon any portion of the American continent, and there is no danger of any European state treating any part of the American continent as a fit object for European colonization. It is intelligible that Mr. Olney should invoke, in defence of the views on which he is now insisting, an authority which enjoys so high a popularity with his own fellow countrymen. But the circumstances with which President Monroe was dealing, and those to which the present American Government is addressing itself, have very few features in common. Great Britain is imposing no "system" upon Venezuela, and is not concerning herself in any way with the nature of the political institutions under which the Venezuelans may prefer to live. But the British Empire and the Republic of Venezuela are neighbors, and they have differed for some time past, and continue to differ, as to the line by which the dominions are separated. It is a controversy with which the United States have no apparent practical concern. It is difficult, indeed, to see how it can materially affect any state or community outside sent or will decline to submit the Venezuelan boundary question in its entirety to impartial arbitration. It is the earnest hope of the President that the conclusion will be on the side of arbitration, and that Great Britain will add one more to the conspicuous precedents she has already furnished in favor of that wise and just mode of adjusting international disputes. If he is to be disappointed in that hope, however—a result not to be anticipated and in his judgment calculated to greatly embarrass the future relations between this country and Great Britain—it is his wish to be made acquainted with the fact at such early date as will enable him to lay the whole subject before Congress in his next annual message.

LORD SALISBURY TO SIR JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE, NOVEMBER 26, 1895

The contentions set forth by Mr. Olney are represented by him as being an application of the political maxims which are well known in American discussion under the name of the Monroe Doctrine. As far as I am aware, this doctrine has never been before advanced on behalf of the United States in any written communication addressed to the government of another nation; but it has been generally adopted and assumed as true by many eminent writers and politicians in the United States. It is said to have largely influenced the Government of that country in the conduct of its foreign affairs; though Mr. Clayton, who was Secretary of State under President Taylor, expressly stated that that Administration had in no way adopted it. But, during the period that has elapsed since the message of President Monroe was delivered in 1823, the doctrine has undergone a very notable development, and the aspect which it now presents in the hands of Mr. Olney differs widely from its character when it first issued from the pen of its author. The two propositions which in effect President Monroe laid down were, first, that America was no longer to be looked upon as a field for European colonization; and, secondly, that Europe must not attempt to extend its political system to America, or to control the political condition of any of the American communities who had recently declared their independence.

The dangers against which President Monroe thought it right to guard were not as imaginary as they would seem at the present day. The formation of the Holy Alliance; the congresses of Laybach and Verona; the invasion of Spain by France for the purpose of forcing upon the Spanish people a form of government which seemed likely to disappear, unless those primarily interested, except perhaps other parts of Her Majesty's dominions, such as Trinidad. The disputed frontier of Venezuela has nothing to do with any of the questions dealt with by President Monroe. It is not a question of the colonization by a European power of any portion of America. It is not a question of the imposition upon the communities of South America of any system of government devised in Europe. It is simply the determination of the frontier of a British possession which belonged to the throne of England long before the Republic of Venezuela came into existence. But even if the interests of Venezuela were so far linked to those of the United States as to give to the latter a locus standi in this controversy, their Government apparently have not formed, and certainly do not express, any opinion upon the actual merits of the dispute.

The Government of the United States do not say that Great Britain, or that Venezuela, is in the right in the matters that are in issue. But they lay down that the doctrine of President Monroe, when he opposed the imposition of European systems, or the renewal of European colonization, confers upon them the right of demanding that when a European power has a frontier difference with a South American community the European power shall consent to refer that controversy to arbitration; and Mr. Olney states that unless Her Majesty's Government accede to this demand it will "greatly embarrass the future relations between Great Britain and the United States."

Whatever may be the authority of the doctrine laid down by President Monroe, there is nothing in his language to show that he ever thought of claiming this novel prerogative for the United States. It is admitted that he did not seek to assert a protectorate over Mexico or the states of Central and South America. Such a claim would have imposed upon the United States the duty of answering for the conduct of these states, and consequently the responsibility of controlling it. His sagacious foresight would have led him energetically to deprecate the addition of so serious a burden to those which the rulers of the United States have to bear. It follows of necessity that if the Government of the United States will not control the conduct of these communities neither can it undertake to protect them from the consequences attaching to any misconduct of which they may be guilty toward other nations. If they violate in any way the rights of another state, or of its subjects, it is not alleged that the Monroe Doctrine will assure them the assistance of the United States in escaping from any reparation which they may be bound by international law to give. Mr. Olney expressly disclaims such an inference from the principles he lays down.

But the claim which he founds upon them is that if any independent American state advances a demand for territory of which its neighbor claims to be the owner, and that neighbor is the colony of a European state, the United States have a right to insist that the European state shall submit the demand and its own impugned rights to arbitration.

I will not now enter into a discussion of the merits of this method of terminating international differences. It has proved itself valuable in many cases; but it is not free from defects, which often operate as a serious drawback on its value. It is not always easy to find an arbitrator who is competent and who, at the same time, is wholly free from bias; and the task of insuring compliance with the award when it is made is not exempt from difficulty. It is a mode of settlement of which the value varies much according to the nature of the controversy to which it is applied and the character of the litigants who appeal to it. Whether, in any particular case, it is a suitable method of procedure is generally a delicate and difficult question. The only parties who are competent to decide that question are the two parties whose rival contentions are in issue. The claim of a third nation, which is unaffected by the controversy, to impose this particular procedure on either of the two others cannot be reasonably justified, and has no foundation in the law of nations.

In the remarks which I have made I have argued on the theory that the Monroe Doctrine in itself is sound. I must not, however, be understood as expressing any acceptance of it on the part of Her Majesty's Government. It must always be mentioned with respect, on account of the distinguished statesman to whom it is due and the great nation who have generally adopted it. But international law is founded on the general consent of nations; and no statesman, however eminent, and no nation, however powerful, are competent to insert into the code of international law a novel principle which was never recognized before and which has not since been accepted by the government of any other country. The United States has a right, like any other nation, to interpose in any controversy by which their own interests are affected; and they are the judge whether those interests are touched, and in what measure they should be sustained. But their rights are in no way strengthened or extended by the fact that the controversy affects some territory which is called American. Mr. Olney quotes the case of the recent Chilean war, in which the United States declined to join with France and England in an effort to bring hostilities to a close, on account of the Monroe Doctrine. The United States were entirely in their right in declining to join in an attempt at pacification if they thought fit; but Mr. Olney's principle that "American questions are for American decision," even if it receive any countenance from the language of President Monroe (which it does not), cannot be sustained by any reasoning drawn from the law of nations.

The Government of the United States is not entitled to affirm as a universal proposition, with reference to a number of independent states for whose conduct it assumes no responsibility, that its interests are necessarily concerned in whatever may befall those states simply because they are situated in the Western Hemisphere. It may well be that the interests of the United States are affected by something that happens to Chile or to Peru, and that that circumstance may give them the right of interference; but such a contingency may equally happen in the case of China or Japan, and the right of interference is not more extensive or more assured in the one case than in the other.

Though the language of President Monroe is directed to the attainment of objects which most Englishmen would agree to be salutary, it is impossible to admit that they have been inscribed by any adequate authority in the code of international law; and the danger which such admission would involve is sufficiently exhibited both by the strange development which the doctrine has received at Mr. Olney's hands and the arguments by which it is supported in the dispatch under reply. In defence of it he says:

"That distance and 3,000 miles of intervening ocean make any permanent political union between a European and an American state unnatural and inexpedient will hardly be denied. But physical and geographical considerations are the least of the objections to such a union. Europe has a set of primary interests which are peculiar to herself; America is not interested in them, and ought not to be vexed or complicated with them."

And again:

"Thus far in our history we have been spared the burdens and evils of immense standing armies and all the other accessories of huge warlike establishments; and the exemption has highly contributed to our national greatness and wealth, as well as to the happiness of every citizen. But, with the powers of Europe permanently encamped on American soil, the ideal conditions we have thus far enjoyed cannot be expected to continue."

The necessary meaning of these words is that the union between Great Britain and Canada; between Great Britain and Jamaica and Trinidad; between Great Britain and British Honduras or British Guiana are "inexpedient and unnatural." President Monroe disclaims any such inference from his doctrine; but in this, as in other respects, Mr. Olney develops it. He lays down that the inexpedient and unnatural character of the union between a European and American state is so obvious that it "will hardly be denied."

Her Majesty's Government is prepared emphatically to deny it on behalf of both the British and American people who are subject to her crown. They maintain that the union between Great Britain and her territories in the Western Hemisphere is both natural and expedient. They fully concur with the view which President Monroe apparently entertained, that any disturbance of the existing territorial distribution in that hemisphere by any fresh acquisitions on the part of any European state would be a highly inexpedient change. But they are not prepared to admit that the recognition of that expediency is clothed with the sanction which belongs to a doctrine of international law. They are not prepared to admit that the interests of the United States are necessarily concerned in every frontier dispute which may arise between any two of the states who possess dominion in the Western Hemisphere, and still less can they accept the doctrine that the United States is entitled to claim that the process of arbitration shall be applied to any demand for the surrender of territory which one of those states may make against another.

The publication of the President's message led to a "war scare" in this country which lowered stocks greatly and depleted the gold reserve by $10,000,000 in three weeks, occasioning a new bond issue to replenish it.

Congress upheld the President in his course by authorizing a Venezuela boundary commission (bill passed by the House on December 18, 1895, and by the Senate on December 20). The President appointed the commission on January 1, 1896.

Through the instrumentality of the United States, aided by the investigations of the commission, a treaty was concluded between Great Britain and Venezuela on February 2, 1897, for arbitrating the dispute.

The arbitrators made their award on October 3, 1899, establishing a compromise boundary which was accepted cheerfully by Great Britain and reluctantly by Venezuela.

AFTER the great acquisition of territory from the Mexican war, a "jingo" spirit arose in the country, in the South generally, and in the North among the ambitious younger Democratic statesmen represented by such ardent spirits as Stephen A. Douglas, Senator from Illinois. The South, disappointed that arrested on the 24th, but he was at once set at liberty and proceeded to New Orleans.

The Secretary of State thereupon instituted a suit against Lopez and his associates in New Orleans. They nevertheless traveled over the country agitating for a new expedition.

David L. Yulee [Fla.] openly denounced in the Senate the action of the Executive Department:

"The President has undertaken to involve the country in the danger of a hostile collision without the authority of Congress, and, therefore, in violation of the Constitution. In support of this position I have to refer back to the ground which I took just now, that the moment a revolutionary flag has been raised in the island a civil war is begun, and that by the laws of nations the respective parties in the struggle are to be regarded by all other people as belligerent powers. I say, then, that the order given to our fleet to go upon the coast of Cuba, where this war is raging, to take part in that war by preventing reinforcements and supplies for one party and not the other, is a participation in the war. . . . The sympathies of the Government have of late appeared to lean rather to the side of despotism than to liberal progress."

Matters remained quiescent until April 25, 1851, when President Fillmore issued a proclamation against the filibusters. On August 12 Lopez landed in Cuba and was defeated, captured, and on September 1 executed. Upon news of his defeat a mob in New Orleans destroyed the presses of a Spanish newspaper of the city and several Spanish stores and restaurants, unrestrained by the police.

Senator James M. Mason [Va.], chairman of the committee on foreign relations, saw in the proposal of Great Britain and France conclusive evidence of the jealous fear of these powers that the United States would annex Cuba. While asserting that it was "our policy to let Cuba alone" and "sacredly to regard the rights of Spain," he declared: "We know that in the fulness of time the fruit will ripen and fall from the parent stem. When that time shall come its political coalition with this continent is inevitable. Interference slavery was excluded (by the State though not by the Federal Government from California, desired more territory to which it could be admitted, and "Young America," as the Douglas element in the North was called, wished that the country should take a more prominent place in world politics.

In 1849 a filibustering expedition had been organized in the United States against Spanish rule in Cuba by a certain Captain White, which was thwarted by President Taylor in his proclamation of August 11, 1849, although the leaders escaped punishment. The movement for free Cuba continued active, and preparations for a new expedition were begun under the direction of Marisco Lopez, a Cuban revolutionist, in New York, Boston, and especially New Orleans, where enlistments were openly made without any action for their repression being made by our Government. When, however, the audacious conspirators formed a junta in Washington, the national capital, "under the nose of the Government," to quote Brownson's Review, the Spanish ambassador, Calderon de la Barca, protested vigorously to the State Department; and John M. Clayton, Secretary of State, on January 22, 1850, directed the United States attorneys to take steps against these and all other violations of international obligations. The instructions, however, were so formal in tone that the attorneys did nothing, reporting that no overt acts against Cuba had transpired. The conspirators thereupon became even bolder; several hundred men flocked to New Orleans openly professing that they were enlisted in an expedition against Cuba, and in New York the Sun ran up the flag of the Cuban republic. Calderon renewed his protest early in May, and the Government this time took secret measures, sending war vessels to Cuban waters to seize the filibusters. Lopez, however, eluded these, and landed in Cuba on May 19, capturing the Spanish governor. Nevertheless two of his ships were captured, and, realizing the insecurity of his position, he sailed to the United States in his principal vessel, the Creole, landing at Key West on the 21st. By order of the Secretary of State he was by other nations may hasten this event, but the combined power of Europe cannot prevent it." He added, however: "As one of the representatives of the States I am free to declare that I know of no peril which should ensue, or which should cause us to hesitate, if Cuba were ready for annexation to-morrow."

Since filibustering had proved unsuccessful the "Young Americans" in the North, independently entirely of the South, began openly to advocate annexation of Cuba to the United States. They professed to be uninfluenced by the bearing of the question on slavery, claiming that they were impelled in their policy by the principle of "manifest destiny" alone—the ultimate extension of our Government throughout the Western Hemisphere.

In 1852 Great Britain and France proposed to the United States a tripartite convention by which "the three powers should severally and collectively disclaim now and for the future all intention to obtain possession of the island of Cuba, and should bind themselves to discountenance all attempts to that effect on the part of every power or individual whatever." Edward Everett, Secretary of State, declined to enter into the convention, and President Fillmore justified the action to Congress in his annual message in December, 1852, by saying that, in his opinion, the convention "would be of doubtful constitutionality, impolitic, and unavailing."

"I have, in common with several of my predecessors, directed the ministers of France and England to be assured that the United States entertain no designs against Cuba; but that, on the contrary, I should regard its incorporation into the Union at the present time as fraught with serious peril.

"Were this island comparatively destitute of inhabitants, or occupied by a kindred race, I should regard it, if voluntarily ceded by Spain, as a most desirable acquisition. But, under existing circumstances, I should look upon its incorporation into our Union as a very hazardous measure. It would bring into the Confederacy a population of a different national stock, speaking a different language, and not likely to harmonize with the other members. It would probably affect, in a prejudicial manner, the industrial interests of the South; and it might revive those conflicts of opinion between the different sections of the country, which lately shook the Union to its center, and which have been so happily compromised.

In his inaugural address (March 4, 1853) President Pierce referred in unmistakable terms to the desirability of annexing Cuba, saying:

"With an experience thus suggestive and cheering, the policy of my Administration will not be controlled by any timid forebodings of evil from expansion. Indeed, it is not to be disguised that our attitude as a nation and our position on the globe render the acquisition of certain possessions, not within our jurisdiction, eminently important for our protection, if not in the future essential for the preservation of the rights of commerce and the peace of the world."

Pierre Soulé, a naturalized Frenchman of New Orleans, who was strongly in favor of annexing Cuba, was sent as minister to Spain with instructions from Secretary Marcy to intimate to the Spanish Government that, while the United States would not disturb the present connection between Cuba and Spain, interference might take place were there alterations in that connection, such as the institution of changes in slavery at the behest of Great Britain and France. The power to enter into negotiations for the purchase of the island was expressly withheld for the present, because it was thought that the offer would not meet with success.

For some time past the Spanish officials in Havana had been annoying American merchants with unfair treatment of their vessels. These acts culminated on the 28th of February, 1854, when an American ship, the Black Warrior, was seized on the pretext, it was claimed, of an incorrect declaration and its cargo of cotton confiscated. On March 15 President Pierce sent a special message to Congress on the subject, stating that he had demanded of the Spanish Government "immediate indemnity for the injury."

"In view," he said, "of the position of the island of Cuba, its proximity to our coast, the relations which it must ever bear

ance with the views which the Executive organ has put forth for the last year, speaking the sentiments of the President, as I suppose. Cuba had limited the price of slaves, that her scheme of colonization would eventually emancipate all her slaves; and those presses have appealed to the people to prevent this sad progress of civilization, lest it should interfere with the slavery of our Southern States.

Now we are officially called on by the President to arrest this advancing improvement in the moral and physical condition of Cuba, by the most decisive action in the power of the nation. Sir, nearly the whole Southern press is teeming with articles such as published in the Fairfield, South Carolina, Herald, of a recent date, which I will read to the House. It is as follows:

"Cuba is overlooked, Nebraska is fought for, and what will be the result of the fight? The future alone can tell. Both of these countries are about being snatched from the South; the loss of the latter would be but a slight restriction to slavery, while the former, in the hands of emancipated blacks, or of foreign powers determined to emancipate, would be a total loss to the commerce of the world, and a death-blow to the extension of slavery."

Sir, this Administration is endeavoring to turn the energies of this nation to the overthrow of this great fundamental principle, which lies at the basis of this republic. It is an effort radically to change its essential elements; to eradicate its life-giving, its vitalizing energies. I feel it my duty to meet and expose this design at its first distinct, unmistakable enunciation. The President now proclaims that intervention against freedom—against emancipation in Cuba—is to become the watchword of this Executive and his party.

Sir, the time selected for getting up this war is important. We are conscious that France and England are said to have guaranteed to Spain the integrity of her West Indian possessions—that a war on Cuba will be a war on France and England, as well as on Spain. Those two powers are now employed in defending the national independence of Turkey. They now present a great moral spectacle to the world. The cross and the crescent are floating together, intertwining their folds in the same breeze. The Christian and the Turk stand shoulder to shoulder, conflicting with Russian despotism; and, while France and England are thus employed, we are called on to strike them in the back, and secure Cuba to ourselves, thereby aiding the advance of Russian tyranny. That is neither generous nor honorable. I am opposed to becoming an ally to

to our commerce and other interests, it is in vain to expect that a series of unfriendly acts, infringing our commercial rights, and the adoption of a policy threatening the honor and security of these States, can long consist with peaceful relations.

"In case the measures taken for an amicable adjustment of our difficulties with Spain should unfortunately fail, I shall not hesitate to use the authorities and means which Congress may grant to insure an observance of our just rights, to obtain redress for injuries received, and to vindicate the honor of our flag. In anticipation of that contingency, which I earnestly hope may not arise, I suggest to Congress the propriety of adopting such provisional measures as the exigency may seem to demand."

In the debate on the message, which ensued in the House of Representatives, Joshua R. Giddings [O.] boldly proclaimed that it was the President and not the Spanish authorities who could be rightfully accused of employing a pretext, his purpose being to make an occasion to annex Cuba. The "other interests" mentioned in the message, the Ohio abolitionist claimed, were the slave interests. "The policy threatening the honor and security of these States" was, he said, "the effort to strike off the shackles of her bondmen," which Cuba was seriously making under Spanish rule.

THE CONQUEST OF CUBA

JOSHUA R. GIDDINGS, M. C.

The President, in the last paragraph, advises a preparation for war. This, then, is the policy which we are called upon to guard against, and to involve ourselves in war, to prevent which we are to resort to arms, to the last dreadful resort of battle and deadly strife. In order to prevent the progress of civilization and freedom in Cuba we must prepare to send our countrymen to premature graves. Our freemen are therefore to die that Cuban slaves may continue to sigh and groan in chains.

The President calls for authority to resist these encroachments upon the barbarous institutions of slavery in Cuba. He no longer holds to non-intervention; that only applies to Nebraska; but in Cuba he will interfere to maintain slavery, at the point of the bayonet, at the expense of our blood, our treasure, and our honor. This course of policy is in precise accord-

Russia in that conflict. I am opposed to involving our nation in the wars of Europe. This is a time when we ought to study peace, and, so far as able, take advantage of those commercial benefits which European hostilities will place in our hands; and I shall be astonished if the commercial influence of New York and New England is not turned to the maintenance of peace at such a crisis as the present. Their interests, as well as those of humanity, require it.

Nor will a war for the conquest of Cuba prove any child's play. The combined navies of England and of France will present to us a force not to be despised. They will surround Cuba with a wall of iron and a sheet of flame. They may bring the war into this American Africa, and rear the standard of freedom on our own soil, while our army shall be fighting for slavery in Cuba. Sir, when that contest shall come, if ever it do come, gentlemen from the South may bear in mind that their slaves will feel the emotions of manhood stirring them to action; they will contend for the rights which God has bestowed upon them. And when the storm of war shall rage, and masters shall tremble as they behold their dwellings in flames, we of the North may not "laugh at your calamity, nor mock when your fear cometh"; but we will tender to those slaves their God-given right to liberty, as the terms of peace which we shall then be authorized to grant.

I mention these things that Southern men may understand that we have examined the subject and counted the cost. If they push the present weak and almost irresponsible Executive into a war to maintain Cuban slavery, they should bear in mind that there is a Power above us that may direct that war to the emancipation of slavery in our own States. Nor would such a result prove any unusual interposition of God's providence.

I would call the attention of all concerned to the policy heretofore adopted by the officers of Cuba, under the direction of the Spanish government. I refer to the declared intention to emancipate all their slaves and put arms in their hands, so soon as a hostile army of force shall land upon their soil. The policy of such a course cannot be doubted. It would not only protect the island, but would render the real estate more valuable than both land and slaves now are. Those emancipated slaves, when contending for their homes and families, their lives and liberties, would constitute a force both savage and powerful.

Thus, sir, I can easily imagine that this war which the President invokes may prove the overthrow of slavery in Cuba as well as in our own land. Such results would best accord with the feelings, the desires of the free States, and of the whole Christian world, as well as with the spirit of the age in which we live. I may find myself in error, but I feel deeply conscious that, if such a war should result from these efforts of the slave power, that institution will be consumed by the flame which itself will have kindled. So confident am I on this point that, were I to disregard the suffering and misery with which such a war must be attended, I would not interpose an objection to the course which the President has marked out in the message before us.

Why, sir, it is but a few years since we were plunged into a war with Mexico, for the openly avowed object of extending slavery. More than $200,000,000 were expended, and more than eighty thousand human victims sacrificed, with the expectation that slavery would be rendered more potent. And now behold, we have a free State on the Pacific. Civilization has been promoted, free institutions extended, and there is very little probability that the bounds of slavery will in any degree be enlarged by that vast expenditure of blood and treasure. Our Western Ophir is pouring its golden streams into the free States, while the inhabitants of the slave States are able to participate but sparingly in its advantages. Similar results, I trust, will follow any disturbance of the peaceful relations between us and Spain.

The President's message was referred in the House to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, two members of which, Thomas L. Clingman [N. C.] and Judge John Perkins [La.], were in favor of appropriating $10,000,000 and employing the army and navy and 50,000 volunteers to annex Cuba forcibly, Clingman declaring that war was desirable as the only means to prevent the dissolution of the Union or a civil war for its maintenance. However, the President got wind of their intention, and he and William L. Marcy, Secretary of State, and Jefferson Davis, Secretary of War, persuaded the two Representatives to abandon their wild proposition before it became public.

The charge made by Giddings that the Administration was opposed to emancipation in Cuba was publicly justified on April 3, 1854, when new instructions were given to Minister Soulé empowering him to enter into and prepare Northern sentiment for those great events with which the future teems; we might more fully understand the hesitancy and doubt of some of our Southern friends, if such doubt and hesitancy really exist. When Cuba is admitted into the Union—as in the course of thick coming events she is bound to be admitted—and when the South turns to the great constitutional party of the North, already committed to that great act for aid and for counsel, let us not be compelled to find the seats in Congress, now occupied by staunch friends of the rights of the States, filled by Abolitionists and Northern Whigs elected to the national legislature by the refusal of the South in the present issue to recognize a great principle upon which, in all time, the friends of the Union might stand and defy the worst combinations of Northern fanaticism."

The suggestion of the Union was heartily adopted by many Southern papers. The Richmond Enquirer said:

"Now that Congress is delivered of the Nebraska bill, the country will expect prompt action in regard to our difficulties with Spain. . . . The only possible way in which the South can indemnify itself for its concessions to the anti-slavery fanaticism is by the acquisition of slave territory . . . and this can be done only by the annexation of Cuba. . . . The intrigues of Great Britain for the abolition of slavery in that island are pursued with a zeal and energy that cannot fail of success unless the United States interfere to prevent the consummation. . . . With Cuba in the possession of a hostile interest Southern slavery would be exposed to an assault which it could neither resist nor endure. With Cuba as a member of a great Southern confederacy slavery might bid defiance to its enemies."

The suggestion that Great Britain was casting covetous glances upon the "Pearl of the Antilles" was used by the Administration to arouse the patriotic spirit of the entire country, North as well as South, and secure its support. At the same time the old and serviceable bugaboo of the "horrors of San Domingo" was held up before the eyes of the South, always apprehensive of danger to its peculiar institution.

On the same day that the editorial appeared in the negotiations for the purchase of Cuban independence, the reason stated for this being the introduction of a new system of apprentice negro labor. This apprentice system, it was claimed by the Administration, would lead to the "Africanization" of the island, and so menace the slave system of our Southern States.

This reason was also assigned by John Slidell [La.] for a motion which he made in the Senate on May 1 to charge the Committee on Foreign Affairs to consider the suspension of the neutrality laws during the period when Congress was not in session, the intention being, as Senator Slidell frankly stated, to cause Spain either to abandon the apprentice system or to incur the liability of war with the United States.

The Administration was driven at this time to throw out some inducements to the South to support its Nebraska policy, the Southern Senators and Representatives having become lukewarm in regard to it, seeing that, contrary to the assurances of Senator Douglas, the father of the Nebraska bill, the North was arrayed almost solidly against it.

Accordingly President Pierce and his advisers determined to join Cuban annexation to the Nebraska policy. Territorial expansion had given distinction to previous Administrations, so why not to this? The North might be somewhat diverted from its intense opposition to the domestic question of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise by the patriotic prospect of extending the national domain, and the South certainly ought to rally vigorously to the support of the repeal when the hope was held out to it of a reward for such assistance in the form of an acquisition of territory where, unlike Kansas-Nebraska, slavery already existed and was greatly profitable.

On May 16, 1854, the organ of the Administration at Washington, the Union, printed the following inspired editorial:

"If the principles of this bill ended with Nebraska and Kansas; if they did not mean to apply to all future acquisitions; if they did not rally men of all sections of the Union,

GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

Washington Union, Stephen R. Mallory [Fla.] introduced in the Senate a resolution declaring that recent acts of the Spanish authorities in Cuba were "calculated to excite the just apprehension of the Government of the United States of a settled design to throw Cuba ultimately into the hands of its negro population, and to revive there, within a few hours' sail of our shores, the scenes of San Domingo's revolution, a result which the United States will deem alike inconsistent with their progress, their prosperity, and the civilization of the age."

On May 24 Judah P. Benjamin [La.] presented to the Senate resolutions of the legislature of his State concerning this "Africanization" of Cuba, which declared that "the time has arrived when the Federal Government should adopt most decisive and energetic measures to thwart and defeat a policy conceived in hatred to this republic and calculated to retard its progress and prosperity." The resolutions were opposed by John M. Clayton [Del.] and William H. Seward [N. Y.].

THE AFRICANIZATION OF CUBA

SENATE, MAY 24, 1854

SENATOR CLAYTON.—Do I understand the honorable Senator to say that he will be prepared, on some future occasion, to show us that the Spanish government has a deliberate design to emancipate the slaves in Cuba, for the purpose of preventing us from either purchasing or taking the island by violence?

SENATOR BENJAMIN.—I do not pretend to say that I shall be able to make a mathematical demonstration of a proposition of that kind; but I think I shall be able to adduce such facts and such evidence as will satisfy every unprejudiced mind, so far as it can be satisfied on a political subject of this kind, that such is the intention of that government.

SENATOR CLAYTON.—That it is their intention to emancipate those slaves now, at this time?

SENATOR BENJAMIN.—At the earliest possible moment, and now that the measures which have been taken are aimed at that very object, or, in other words, that the design is now in process of execution.

SENATOR CLAYTON.—I must express my perfect conviction that the honorable Senator will never be able to make out the facts he has stated. I have no belief in them whatever; and the more I look into the matter, the more I inquire in regard to it, the more perfectly am I satisfied that it is not true that the Spanish government intends to destroy this island, except in this contingency: They will act precisely as you, sir, would act, or any other man might act, without being censured so much, who should find that a piratical vessel was about to seize his ship and crew. You might blow up your powder magazine in such a case as that, without incurring the censure of the world. That is all, in my opinion, which the Spanish government contemplates. If they find that, from any quarter of this Union, there is a piratical expedition set on foot, with a view to take the island from them, and that there is a certainty that the island will be taken from their possession and custody by that means, they will blow up their powder magazine.

The Spanish government has given us notice of that for many years back. They have declared over and over again, more than ten years ago, to the various gentlemen who occupied stations at the head of the State Department, that if such a thing as that should be done they would ruin the island, rather than permit us to take it in that manner. But I deny, from the evidence before me, that the honorable Senator can produce any proof whatever to show that the Spanish government, in the present condition of affairs, intends to emancipate the slaves in Cuba, or, to use the honorable Senator's own language, that such a scheme as that is in process of execution.

MR. BENJAMIN.—Those of us who are aware of the system by which the island of Cuba is now governed can, by no possibility, entertain a doubt of the scheme which has been deliberately formed, and which, I repeat, is now in process of execution upon the island.

According to a recent proclamation, every slave in the possession of an individual who cannot show a registered title to him, is to be made free now upon the spot. If I am not misinformed, nearly one-fourth of those who are really slaves upon the island will be made free under the operation of this proclamation. There, sir, is the very first step toward what the legislature of Louisiana has termed the Africanization of the island of Cuba. This is the last piece of information that has come to us from that island.

My colleague [Senator Slidell], in a statement which he made a short time ago, that attracted so much attention in the country, demonstrated to the Senate that the intention of the British government—and it has been fully shown in its correspondence and negotiations with the Spanish government—is to induce the latter government to consider the blacks and whites upon the island as one common population, to be taken care of and protected by one common set of regulations applicable to both classes of the population.

I shall not go further into this subject now, sir; but I refer to these facts for the purpose of showing that this is not an idle apprehension, that it is not one without foundation; and when the discussion comes up I think we shall be able to show the Senator such facts and such proofs as will shake even his well-formed conviction to the contrary.

SENATOR CLAYTON.—The negroes brought from Africa are detected by the very means to which my honorable friend has alluded—by the registries of the true slaves, the real native-born slaves, on every estate. The police officers visit the estate, and, by calling the roll, and examining the negroes, detect whether there are any recent importations. If so, they declare them free, and they are bound to declare them free under the treaties which Spain has made with foreign governments. Then they apprentice these slaves for one year, merely for the purpose of enabling these miserable, utterly ignorant creatures to live.

But, sir, my honorable friend, in the indulgence of his imagination, tells us that he thinks these negroes will be enlisted, and form a black corps of soldiers for the purpose of preventing any attack made on the island, or any insurrection in the island. They are wild negroes from Africa who have not been in the country a year. Would they not make a splendid regiment! I should like to know how you or anybody else would proceed to drill them and make them stand up in a fight.

SENATOR SEWARD.—Why should Spain, with $1,000,000 income from Cuba, desire to renounce it? Why should she bury in the ocean her colony in America, the last relic of the new world given to her by Columbus? Her exigencies are as great now as in former times. Then, it is supposed that the British government is concerned in this movement. Sir, I entertain no doubt that it may be safely said that if Great Britain occupies any position in regard to this question now, it is a position which inclines her to prevent the extremities which are dreaded by the honorable Senators from Louisiana. Engaged in a war¹ which is almost certain to become a Continental war in ¹The Crimean.

Europe, Great Britain is now under bonds to keep the peace with our Government on this question. I see no reason, therefore, to impair the confidence of the commercial part of the community, and spread over them the dread of evils which may never come.

In the meantime a filibustering expedition against Cuba had been organized under the leadership of Gen. John A. Quitman, who had in 1851, while Governor of Mississippi, openly advocated the establishment of a Southern Confederacy.

On the 31st of May the President, at the instigation of Secretary Marcy, issued a proclamation against this expedition, in which he stated that "it is the duty of the constituted authority of the United States to hold and maintain the control of the great question of peace or war, and not to suffer the same to be lawlessly complicated under any pretence whatever." Quitman was arrested on the 31st day of July and released upon bail that he would observe the neutrality laws of the United States. That his action, however, in organizing the expedition was approved by the party in power is indicated by the fact that he was elected to the next Congress and put at the head of the very committee, that on military affairs, where he would be able to make his plans for the forcible annexation of Cuba most effective.

THE OSTEND MANIFESTO

Congress adjourned August 7, 1854. On the 16th Secretary Marcy instructed James Buchanan, John Y. Mason, August Belmont, and Pierre Soulé, the ministers respectively to Great Britain, France, The Hague, and Spain, to meet in order to arrange a plan for the purchase of Cuba. They did so on October 15, at Ostend, and three days later at Aix-la-Chapelle, where, on October 18, they issued what is called the "Ostend Manifesto."

In this document they stated the advantages to the United States and Spain in the purchase of the island, and declared that failure of the project would be due to the jealous interference of other powers. The interest of the United States was said to be that of self-preservation, the elimination of a constant menace to its peace, and the interest of Spain was indicated by the intimation that, if it did not sell Cuba now, the United States, at the next insurrection in the island, would intervene in behalf of the Cuban patriots and wrest it from Spanish possession.

Secretary Marcy refused to endorse the Manifesto. On the 13th of November he wrote to Soulé stating that the threat to Spain was insincere, since the United States was not at the time menaced by the condition of Cuba. Thereupon Soulé tendered his resignation, which was accepted.

President Pierce in his annual message to Congress on December 4, 1854, ignoring the project of purchasing Cuba, simply stated that the relations with Spain were in the state in which they had been at the last session, and expressed the expectation that a new ministry which had been formed in that country would give a more favorable reception than had previously been accorded to our statement of grievances.

On the same day Augustus E. Sillers [Md.] moved in the House of Representatives that the President give information concerning the Ostend conference. The motion came up for discussion on the following day, when Thomas H. Bayly [Va.], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, asked that the resolution be referred to the committee. In the debate which ensued the main issue of the unprecedented nature of the conference was sidetracked for the irrelevant although timely one (owing to the Know-Nothing agitation) of sending foreign-born ministers to foreign courts.¹

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which failed to report it, or indeed any measure on Cuba. Thus from time to time the matter slumbered, although the Cuban question was discussed.

In his annual message December 6, 1858, President Buchanan informed Congress that new negotiations had been opened with Spain for the purchase of Cuba with every prospect of success and that it was therefore necessary for the national legislature to appropriate a sum sufficient to make a payment on account to the Spanish Government upon the signing of the treaty and before its ratification by the United States Senate. On January 10, 1859, John Slidell [La.] introduced a bill in the Senate appropriating $30,000,000 for this purpose, and it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. On January 15 a caucus of the Democratic Senators declared in favor of supporting the purchase.

The Senate on January 18 requested the President to lay before it the correspondence between the two Governments in regard to the treaty. The President, in a special message on January 21, answered briefly that no such correspondence existed and that the Senate must trust to his discretion in the matter.

On January 24 the Committee on Foreign Affairs, through Senator Slidell, recommended the adoption of his bill. In his report the Senator declared that "the ultimate acquisition of Cuba may be considered a fixed purpose of the United States."

William H. Seward [N. Y.], in behalf of himself and Solomon Foot [Vt.], members of the committee, presented a minority report to the effect that the question should be postponed to the next session of Congress, when the President should report the condition of the treasury and of the army and navy, in order that Congress might be enabled to judge whether "it will be necessary to adopt any extraordinary measures to maintain the rights and promote the interests of the United States connected with their relations to Spain." It also authorized the President to convene Congress in extra session if the negotiations with Spain warranted this.

A debate followed the presentation of the minority report, in which Senators Seward and John P. Hale [N. H.] supported the report, and James A. Bayard, Jr. [Del.] and Robert Toombs [Ga.] opposed it, in behalf of the majority report.

involves now a pledge, a guaranty, virtually a grant, or appropriation, of so many more millions of dollars as the President of the United States, without any recourse to the Senate or to Congress, and consulting only his own mere ambition, caprice, or pleasure, shall agree to give for that island; and this last amount is altogether unlimited.

The bill contains no limitations, and the President recommends no limitation. It is a bill, then, for just so many millions as the President shall choose to write in the treaty. What will be the number of those millions? The report of the majority of the committee says that it will probably be $125,000,000. This calculation is based upon the fact that Spain refused $100,000,000 ten years ago, and that Cuba has increased in value $25,000,000, according to the estimate of the majority of the committee. This estimate is inconclusive, and, therefore, unsatisfactory. The amount which Spain will ask, if we suppose her to accede to this treaty, will be all that she can get, and the amount which the President will give, if it be his purpose to acquire the island of Cuba at all events and under all hazards, will be the least that Spain will consent to take.

This great increase of the public debt we are asked to make at the very hour when, in compliance with the Executive recommendation, we are proposing to authorize him to build the Pacific railroad at a cost of not less than $125,000,000 more; and, simultaneously with this, in the same message, we are also asked to authorize the President to move the army into Mexico, which can cost nothing less than $100,000,000 more; and, at the same time, in pursuance of recommendations of the same weight and authority, we are asked to authorize him to employ the army and the navy against just so many Spanish-American states on this continent as he shall choose, which can require nothing less than $100,000,000 more; so, without any financial system at all, we are to have a great debt created by this Congress of the United States, on the recommendation and application of the President to strengthen the arm of the Executive, while weakening the power and the constitutional force of the Senate and the House of Representatives, a debt of $500,000,000.

I have said that the bill has also a political aspect. It proposes to bring into the United States a foreign country, seven hundred miles long and seventy miles wide, containing one million five hundred thousand human beings—a population different entirely from the citizens of the United States; different in language, different in race, different in habits, different in

POLITICAL NECESSITY OF ACQUIRING CUBA

SENATOR SEWARD.—Mr. President the bills which engage the attention of Congress generally originate either in the Senate or in the House of Representatives. But this measure is ushered into our presence by a message from the executive palace. It is, therefore, in its origin an executive measure. Its nature corresponds to its parentage. It proposes to relax constitutional and legislative restraints upon the executive power, and to transfer control over the treasury, together with the power of negotiation in foreign affairs, from Congress and from the Senate to the President of the United States. It is not an isolated executive measure of this kind, but it is one of a series of such measures which the President of the United States has introduced at the present session in the same way. One of this series proposes that Congress shall authorize the President to move the army and the navy of the United States into adjacent states of the republic of Mexico and establish a protectorate there. Another asks our consent to invest the President of the United States with the power to make war in his own discretion and at his own pleasure against all, or nearly all, the Spanish-American states on this continent.

A measure thus disparaging to the intelligence, the virtue, and the independence of the national legislature, a measure so dangerous to the civil and religious liberties of the American people, it must be expected, will receive at the hands of Congress a careful scrutiny. It is not my purpose at this time to bestow that scrutiny, in its full extent, upon the bill which has been reported in accordance with the recommendation of the President of the United States; but I do intend to indicate some of the considerations which have brought me to the conviction that this bill, under no circumstances, ought to receive the favor of Congress.

The bill has a financial aspect. It has also a broad political character. In regard to the financial aspect, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the bill proposes to appropriate now, at this time, out of the treasury of the United States, $30,000,000, to be placed under the control of the President of the United States, to be paid by him to Spain, whenever she shall have consented to accept any treaty which he may make with her, for the cession of Cuba to the United States, without waiting for a ratification of that treaty by the Senate of the United States. This appropriation of $30,000,000 necessarily manners, different in customs, and radically different in religion; a population that will, practically, forever hold the power to exclude all American immigration, at least to exclude it as effectually as the old states of Europe excluded our migration there, and as effectually as our old-established States practically exclude immigration from outside of their borders. This population, then, is to be the ruling population of that island. What rights will citizens of the United States enjoy there? The one million five hundred thousand souls are divided: one-half whites, two hundred and fifty thousand free blacks, and four hundred thousand slaves. What institutions of justice, of freedom, of religion, and public worship will obtain or remain there.

I have already shown that the consent of the Senate to the passage of this bill will operate as a constraint upon the Senate to ratify whatever treaty the President shall make hereafter. If this be true (and no one, I think, can controvert it), then I am asked to resign a constitutional, senatorial power, to the President of the United States and to shift from my own shoulders to his a constitutional responsibility.

To do this is a derogation of the independence of the constitutional power of the Senate of the United States, and a practical subversion of the constitutional check which requires that every treaty shall receive the votes of two-thirds of this body, or be absolutely void. It practically delegates to a bare majority of the Senate and to a majority of the House of Representatives the treaty-making power of this great empire.

Sir, if there ever was an occasion on which I should adhere tenaciously to this right and insist upon retaining this power, it would be in such a case as this. I want to see the treaty which shall bring the island of Cuba into the United States. I want to know the status which that country is to occupy. Is it to be a territory of subjects, of political slaves? a province, governed by armies and navies, as Spain now governs it? I may ask the President of the United States when he has executed the treaty. Is it to be a State? I may ask the President of the United States when he has executed the treaty. Who are to be the electors of the State? What is to be the status of the whole population? Are they to enjoy universal suffrage? What is to be the status of the free-negro population? What is to be the status of the slave population? We, who have disputed so earnestly, often so vehemently, year after year, year in and year out, over the question whether the institution of slavery shall be introduced into the Territory of Kansas, are expected by the President, in his simplicity, to allow him to determine for the North and for the South, for the free States and for the slave States, at his own absolute pleasure, the terms and conditions upon which Cuba shall be annexed to the United States and incorporated into the Union. I say nothing of the present incumbent of the executive office. I say that men never chose, nor did God ever send on earth, a magistrate to whom I would confide this great question, having a constitutional right to decide it myself.

I need not say, sir, that all our treaties of annexation contain stipulations guaranteeing rights to the countries annexed, to be incorporated into the Union, and determining the future political rights, power, and authority of the inhabitants of those countries. This bill, then, is in derogation of the power of the Senate to determine by treaty for itself what the safety, honor, and welfare of the country demand in regard to the political organization and government of the island of Cuba, if it shall be acquired.

Sir, I have always received as a political maxim the declarations made by our predecessors in regard to the acquisition of Cuba. Every rock and every grain of sand in that island were drifted and washed out from American soil by the floods of the Mississippi, and the other estuaries of the Gulf of Mexico. The island has seemed to me, just as our predecessors have said, to gravitate back again to the parent continent from which it sprang. I have supposed that political necessities would determine that ultimate conclusion; and I know that to political necessities all actions of governments must bend, and all sentiments of nations must accommodate themselves. I have nevertheless, been taught, with the same maxim, this other rule, that the acquisition of Cuba is a question of time, of necessity, and of opportunity. Our forefathers said, all our predecessors have said, that when the juncture shall arise that there should be just that necessary decline of the political European power on the continent, and just that development of American power here, which makes Spain unable to keep and ourselves able freely to obtain, the island, then it would be hopeless and idle to refuse to receive Cuba, even if it were undesirable. They have said more, and I subscribe to it, that we may safely hold our souls in patience so long as Spain can keep it, and no other and stronger European power can, or dare, take it from her. What I have to say now is, that the time and opportunity do not now serve, in my judgment, any more than they served for the last sixty years. We may be nearer, as, indeed, I doubt not we are, to the acquisition of Cuba; but we have not arrived at the point at which the acquisition must necessarily be made, or can be made, human progress, are deeply involved in the acquisition of Cuba by the United States, even the chance of an advancement toward that acquisition I should be willing to encourage when it came from any source entitled to decent respect. Now, sir, it may be that this bill, when it passes, will not enable us to acquire Cuba; but, in the judgment of the Executive, such a recommendation has been made. I can see no injury to the country if we pass the bill and fail to attain the object; but it is an object of importance to the country, and the ultimate benefit of it will fully sanction us, in my judgment, in the passage of the bill.

SENATOR TOOMBS.—Mr. President, the speech of the honorable Senator from New York is remarkable, certainly, for two things: The first is personal to himself; and I am very happy to congratulate him and the country that at last he has concluded that economy is an element in national policy, which, heretofore, he seems generally to have ignored. The next important and remarkable feature in the speech of the Senator is, that he comes to no conclusion upon the main question. He throws out a number of objections to the proposed mode of action; but he declines, or he fails to express, any opinion upon the merits of this great question of national policy now about to be inaugurated.

The Senator intimates, in the first place, that if it is not a violation of the Constitution, it is surrendering the constitutional rights of this body. In what respect? The question of the right of the Government of the United States to acquire territory by purchase, or by war, or in any other mode it may see proper, according to the law of nations is, I presume, no longer open to observation. It has been settled by the concurrent judgment of all parties, and by a construction of the Constitution now no longer open to dispute. Then, if the right to acquire a country by purchase is a conceded point in our public policy, it is not in derogation of any of the rights of the Senate of the United States that we should appropriate this money. We propose to appropriate money by law, as we have done frequently before. I know there is a constitutional inhibition against the President, or anybody else, using money, unless it be appropriated by law; but, inasmuch as this is a constitutional object, we propose to do that very thing. Conceding that the policy of acquiring Cuba by purchase is a wise policy, the question is submitted to the Congress of the United States, both the Senate and House of Representatives, whether, if it be a wise and proper object, deserving of appropriations of the public consistently with the conditions of peace, prudence, justice, and the national honor.

But there are circumstances about this bill which satisfy my mind that it is not expected, that it is not intended, that Cuba shall be acquired in consequence of this proceeding; but that some other advantage, some domestic and local benefit, will be secured to the President of the United States by provoking a debate on this subject in Congress. Sir, I do not so much undervalue the intelligence of the American people as to apprehend any such result. The proposition seems to be an empty one, an idle one, a ludicrous one; and, if it were not for violating the respect due to the President of the United States and the majority of the committee who sanction it, I should say a ridiculous one. There is a play which we have sometimes seen at the theater, in which the heroine is an honest housewife who has a propensity for buying things at auction. One day she bought a huge door-plate sold at an auction of a neighbor's furniture, on which was inscribed in large letters the name of "Thompson," spelled with a "p," although her own name, as well as her husband's, was Toodle. When the indignant Mr. Toodle called her to account for the expense, "why," she said, "how do you know, my dear, that we shall not one day have a child, and that that child may not be a daughter, and that that daughter may not be married to somebody, and, just as likely as not, that somebody will be a man named 'Thompson,' and his name may be spelled with a 'p' [laughter], so it will then just fit exactly. I could not help buying it, because it was so cheap, and it will be so handy, you know, to have it in the house." That, sir, is exactly the value of this great presidential demonstration, made, I think, to retrieve the sinking and wasting fortunes of an administration that has disappointed its own immoderate desires not more than the less sanguine expectations of the American people.

SENATOR BAYARD.—Mr. President, there may be many things which the honorable Senator from New York may consider unattainable, wild, or extravagant that may yet be perfectly practicable; and so, too, it may be that there may be many objects which the honorable Senator may consider attainable, and which yet may turn out not to be within his reach. The question is as to the propriety of passing a bill, in accordance with the recommendation of the Executive, which is founded upon the probability, under that recommendation, of the acquisition of Cuba by the United States. Believing, myself, that the future interests, not only of this country, but of civilization and of money, we shall enable the President of the United States to inaugurate it by this appropriation.

As to our revenue system, I consider it equal to the wants of the country. The question is not with this republic now, where are we to get money from? but our financial system for the last fifteen or twenty years has been an effort how not to raise it. Even when you have drawn tariff bills with the express view of putting down surpluses, of reducing the revenue, of getting less of it than an ordinary system would bring, you have failed in the effort. Most of the nations of the world have been driven to extraordinary shifts, certainly in war and often in peace, to know how to raise the wind—in what manner to raise money enough to carry on their governments. The man who could invent a new tax, even in England, has been awarded great financial talent.

But in this country the whole ingenuity and talent of all sides, especially of gentlemen holding the political opinions of that Senator, have been devoted to the problem how not to raise money enough. Such is the wealth of the country, such are its vast productions, that the question is not one of raising enough for the economical wants of the Government, or even for the extravagant wants of the Government; but the question with that Senator and his friends is how to raise revenue so as to benefit particular branches of industry at the expense of other branches of industry. We should have no trouble at all about raising revenue, if that was the object; we should have no difficulty about knowing what rate of taxation would produce a sufficient amount for us, or would bring in a greater amount or a lesser amount than was necessary; but we have complicated it by schemes to lay taxation in such a way as to benefit particular interests, so that persons come to Congress and seek by legislation to obtain benefits in their own private pursuits. That is the difficulty we have.

The Senator seems to object to this acquisition with reference to its political aspects. I do not see that they are changed at all by this measure. Admit that there is force in the idea of the Senator from New York that he wants to know the status of the seven hundred and fifty thousand white people, the two hundred and fifty thousand free negroes, and the four hundred thousand slaves in Cuba, he will still have that question before him when the treaty shall be made and come up here for ratification. This bill does not propose to affect it at all. It will stand then where it would stand if you made the treaty without the bill. When we acquire the island of Cuba, the annexation of which I look upon as important to the country, I am content that my own countrymen shall settle the status of all the people there according to the Constitution of the United States.

But I will remark to the honorable Senator that I consider that question as already settled; I have no difficulties upon it. I consider that it has been settled by the American people; a settlement with which I am content; which I do not believe he will be able to shake; which I believe will stand unshaken when he and I shall have passed away from the stage; that will outlive him and outlive the country itself. It is that, while the territory stands as a dependency of this republic, it shall be open to settlement by all the people of the republic, North and South, East and West, with ample constitutional protection to all property held in any of the States; and when it takes its position among the free and independent States of this Union, it will then settle for itself what shall be the status of all colors and of all races within its borders. That is the principle on which I think this question has already been settled by the verdict of the American people, and I am content to stand on that principle; and hence I feel no difficulty about the acquisition.

Now, sir, is this acquisition desirable? Is it a matter on which we ought to risk so much money as $30,000,000 for the chance of opening more favorable negotiations? I think it is. I know of no portion of the earth that is now so important to the United States of America as the island of Cuba is. We speak of the trade of India; and some of the friends of a Pacific railroad tell us that, when that railroad shall be constructed, it will bring the trade of Asia to our continent, and that we shall get at least the profits of the transportation of the wealth of the Indies. Sir, this wealth is at our feet; but they know it not.

If you could fill up the ocean, and lay a perfectly level railroad to-day from San Francisco to Shanghai, it would be no benefit, because you can now bring products from Shanghai to New York for ten dollars a ton when freights are low, and for twenty dollars a ton at the customary freights. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Henry Wilson] fully and satisfactorily demonstrated the other day, it would be impossible to carry freight over a railroad to the Pacific. I say then, that such a road cannot advance us in obtaining the control of the trade in those products; but we have all the wealth which ever came from the East Indies to-day in the West Indies, and the only question of foreign policy which is worthy of the consideration of American statesmen is the tropical empire lying tors. It is too feeble a tenure. If I did, I have shown by my votes that I have not feared them. Whenever any State, Minnesota or Oregon, or any other came, no matter where from, if she came on principles which were sufficient in my judgment to justify her admission into this great family of nations, I have never refused her the right hand of fellowship. I did not inquire whether you had seventeen or eighteen free States. If you had fifty it would not alter my vote. The idea of getting one slave State would have no effect on me. But Cuba has fine ports, and with her acquisition, we can make first the Gulf of Mexico, and then the Caribbean sea, a mare clausum. Probably younger men than you or I will live to see the day when no flag shall float there except by permission of the United States of America. That is my policy. I rose more with a view to declare my policy for the future, that development, that progress throughout the tropics was the true, fixed, unalterable policy of the nation, no matter what may be the consequences with reference to European powers.

SENATOR HALE.—Mr. President, I hope to be relieved from the censure which the honorable Senator from Georgia has made on the Senator from New York, and that is that he has not expressed plainly his views on the main proposition. I am opposed to it utterly, totally, and entirely. I remember, sir, for it is some years since this matter of acquisition has been talked of in this country, that it was first inaugurated under the genius of what was called "manifest destiny"; but I see that manifest destiny has been ridden to death; we have got rid of it, and now succeeds to "manifest destiny," "political necessity." I want to examine that a little. I do not know but what it is necessary that this should come under the auspices of "political necessity"; because I believe the doctors who taught in the school of "manifest destiny" only contend that manifest destiny extended over the whole continent, and now we are to leave the continent and go to sea; we must have a new era and we are to take "political necessity"; and I suppose that is the reason of the change. I am opposed to them both for this reason. Although it was the mission of "manifest destiny" to take in the whole continent, he never seemed to remember that there was a north side of it. He was always traveling South. [Laughter.] So wanting in fidelity to his mission was "manifest destiny," that was to overrun this whole continent, so engrossed was he in looking South, that while his mission has been proclaimed, and he was attending to Southern interests, the Administration actually gave way—with a mere dash of at our feet, and it ought to be declared to be our settled policy—not by force, not by violence, not by depriving the rightful possessors of their present possessions—to be the American policy to unite, as fast as it can be fairly and honestly done, all the tropics under our flag.

We have now the command of one of the great elements of human commerce—cotton. We have now the command of the bread of the world. We have their bread and their clothing. Give us Cuba, give us the West Indies, and we shall command all the other wants of the human race; we shall control their commerce in everything; we shall control their tonnage, and it will be of more value even to the Northern people than to the South. It will bring a competitor in tropical fruits and sugar to a portion of the Southern States. Cuba is exactly in the condition the most favorable possible to break off all commercial restrictions for the benefit of New England and the entire North. She does not grow beef except to a very small extent, and pork not at all; she has no manufactures; she has no iron. She raises everything that the North wants, and she would be the best customer in the world for every article of their industry. There is no production in New England that cannot find a market in Cuba. There is just the point for an exchange of commodities from which the most beneficial commerce the world ever saw will result. Therefore, I say, the manufacturing States, the grain-growing States, have the greatest interest in this acquisition. They can get there sugar and coffee and West Indian fruits, which they can sell to all the world, and increase their exports. They can exchange products with Cuba without duty, with entire internal free trade, and there will be built up a home market for their manufactures, such a market as can be found in no other habitable part of the globe. Here is a natural exchange of products, arising from locality and climate and soil. It will be nature's commerce; beneficent, prosperous, beneficial to all engaged in it. It does not need laws; it does not need restrictions; it requires no ingenuity to show that that commerce will be a beneficial one to all concerned in it, especially to the Northern and Middle States; it will not benefit the South to the same extent.

Some may think that we go for it because by this means we shall have one more slave State in the Union. I know that the Senator from New York at the last session alluded to the comparative number of slaveholding and non-slaveholding States; but I never considered that my rights lay there; I never considered that I held my rights of property by the votes of Sena-the pen—that magnificent empire from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific ocean, and from 49° to 54° 40' north latitude.

Whenever we have had to deal with "manifest destiny" or "political necessity" in any treaty relating to our Northern boundary, it has been to cut off; and, if we could not sell out, we gave away, while we have been continually traveling south for acquisitions. This may be all accidental; probably it is; but, if you ever read Pickwick, sir, you remember that, as Sam Weller says, it was a most astonishing coincidence. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I dissent from that whole policy which says it is American policy to be continually annexing foreign nations to us. I am for improving what we have got; I am for developing our own resources; and I am for applying the means that we have to the improvement of what we have got. I should like to know where the constitutional power comes from. It is said there is no power to build a railroad to the Pacific ocean unless it be a war measure. I am utterly opposed to that whole doctrine, that we have no power to make a railroad from here to the Pacific ocean unless it can be demonstrated that it is absolutely necessary and indispensable as one of the means of carrying on war. Sir, the Government of the United States have power to make peace as well as to make war; and if, as the proclamations of war usually say, the purpose of entering into a war is to procure an honorable peace, the country ought to have some energy to do something to foster and nourish and develop its interests in peace as well as in war. But, sir, this modern doctrine that you can expend anything and everything for war measures, and nothing for peace, I utterly dissent from. Here you may spend $150,000,000, if it is necessary, for purposes of war; but if you are asked for fifty cents for any of the great purposes of peace, of commerce, of the arts, this gigantic Government is seized with paralysis, and cannot move a finger for any of the purposes of peace, or any of its arts, or any of its interests; but it is omnipotent for all the purposes of war.

WILLIAM M. GWIN (Cal.)—As the gentleman is on the subject of the Pacific railroad, I wish he would give way and let us take up that bill and go on with it. [Laughter.] It is a better subject than this, a great deal. [Laughter.]

SENATOR HALE.—I can only say to my friend from California, as the Archbishop said to Gil Blas, I wish you all manner of prosperity, and more taste than to interrupt me again [laughter]; but I will give way.

By the obstructive tactics of the Republican Senators the bill was not brought forward for a vote until late in the session. On February 21 Senator Slidell succeeded in getting the measure squarely before the Senate. On that very day newspapers reached Washington with the report that Spain had rejected with scorn the proposition of the United States to purchase Cuba, and "was disposed to demand due satisfaction for such an insult." William H. Seward read this report in the Senate, but Slidell still pushed the measure. Anthony Kennedy [Md.] then declared (on February 25) that the purpose of the promoters of the bill must be to excite Spain to war, in which Cuba would be the booty of the United States. This purpose was frankly admitted on the same date by Stephen R. Mallory [Fla.] and Albert G. Brown [Miss.]. Senator Mallory said that if Spain continued stubborn it "should be given openly to understand that the United States would do as Frederick the Great had done with Silesia—that is, first take Cuba and then talk about it." Senator Brown said:

I am for the acquisition of Cuba, and I want to advertise to all the world that we mean to have it—peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must. I am willing to pay for it, or I am willing to fight for it. I would advertise to the world that we mean to have it; and I look upon this bill as nothing more than a mere advertisement that the United States desire Cuba, and mean to have it.

The Republican Senators having used every parliamentary device to prevent a vote on the bill, which had now become the pet measure of the Administration, Robert Toombs [Ga.] called them cowards, mentioning William H. Seward [N. Y.] in particular. To this charge Senator Seward replied on February 25, casting back the charge upon his opponents and denouncing the President as the most arrant and despicable poltroon of them all.

The session of February 25 was prolonged into the following day. It was moved to table the bill, and the motion was lost by 30 nays to 18 yeas. Encouraged by this vote, Senator Slidell announced that the bill would be pushed to a finish, and moved to adjourn; his motion was carried. On the following day, after conference with the leaders of his party, he reconsidered his determination and, saying that the vote to table had shown that the sentiment of the Senate was in favor of the "principle of the bill," he announced that, out of consideration for the other appropriation bills which were being held up by the fight over this one, the friends of the measure had decided to postpone it until the following session of Congress.

Owing to the impending Civil War the measure was not acted upon at the following session.

THE Cuban patriots had extorted the promise of reforms from the Spanish Government by a rebellion extending from 1868 to 1878. Spain agreed to allow Cuban representation in the Cortes (Spanish parliament), and the Cuban Liberal party was formed to secure fulfilment of the pledge. In 1880 the Cortes abolished slavery in the island. The government, however, continued oppressive in other respects, such as taxation, favoritism, and plunder in official administration, etc., and a new and formidable revolt was inaugurated in 1895 under Generals Gomez, Maceo, and Garcia. Spain sent General Martinez Campos to subdue the insurrection. He was unsuccessful, the insurgents finally, in February, 1896, hemming the Spanish forces in Havana. Accordingly, in that month, the Spanish Government replaced General Campos by General Weyler, a soldier of more aggressive and ruthless temper. By his adoption of reconcentration, the policy of compelling the Cuban natives to come in from the fields and herd together in cities under the control of Spanish troops, the insurgents were deprived of their former ever available sources of supply and harborage. This order caused great distress among the "reconcentrados," who were reduced to a pitiful degree of starvation, and in their enfeebled and crowded condition were decimated by disease. So earnest was the protest of the American people against Weyler that he was recalled toward the close of 1897, and General Blanco sent in his stead.

While Weyler was still in power President Cleveland, in his annual message of December 7, 1896, thus referred to the Cuban situation.

THE INSURRECTION IN CUBA

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND

The insurrection in Cuba still continues with all its perplexities. It is difficult to perceive that any progress has thus far been made toward the pacification of the island. If Spain still holds Habana and the seaports and all the considerable towns, the insurgents still roam at will over at least two-thirds of the inland country. If Spain has not yet reestablished her authority, neither have the insurgents yet made good their title to be regarded as an independent state. The entire country is either given over to anarchy or is subject to the military occupation of one or the other party.

In pursuance of general orders Spanish garrisons are now being withdrawn from plantations and the rural population required to concentrate itself in the towns. The sure result would seem to be that the industrial value of the island is fast diminishing, and that unless there is a speedy and radical change in existing conditions it will soon disappear altogether.

The spectacle of the utter ruin of an adjoining country, by nature one of the most fertile and charming on the globe, would engage the serious attention of the Government and people of the United States in any circumstances. In point of fact, they have a concern with it which is by no means of a wholly sentimental or philanthropic character. It lies so near to us as to be hardly separated from our territory. Our actual pecuniary interest in it is second only to that of the people and government of Spain. It is reasonably estimated that at least from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 of American capital are invested in plantations and in railroad, mining, and other business enterprises on the island. The volume of trade between the United States and Cuba, which, in 1889, amounted to about $64,000,000, rose in 1893 to about $103,000,000. Besides this large pecuniary stake in the fortunes of Cuba, the United States finds itself inextricably involved in the present contest in other ways both vexatious and costly.

Many Cubans reside in this country and indirectly promote finally, that, all other methods failing, the existing internecine strife in Cuba should be terminated by our intervention, even at the cost of a war between the United States and Spain—a war which its advocates confidently prophesy could be neither large in its proportions nor doubtful in its issue.

The correctness of this forecast need be neither affirmed nor denied. The United States has nevertheless a character to maintain as a nation, which plainly dictates that right and not might should be the rule of its conduct. Further, though the United States is not a nation to which peace is a necessity, it is, in truth, the most pacific of powers, and desires nothing so much as to live in amity with all the world. Its own ample and diversified domains satisfy all possible longings for territory, preclude all dreams of conquest, and prevent any casting of covetous eyes upon neighboring regions, however attractive. That our conduct toward Spain and her dominions has constituted no exception to this national disposition is made manifest by the course of our Government, not only thus far during the present insurrection, but during the ten years that followed the rising at Yara in 1868. No other great power, it may safely be said, under circumstances of similar perplexity, would have manifested the same restraint and the same patient endurance.

It is in the assumed temper and disposition of the Spanish government to remedy Cuban grievances, fortified by indications of influential public opinion in Spain, that this Government has hoped to discover the most promising and effective means of composing the present strife, with honor and advantage to Spain and with the achievement of all the reasonable objects of the insurrection.

It would seem that if Spain should offer to Cuba genuine autonomy—a measure of home rule which, while preserving the sovereignty of Spain, would satisfy all rational requirements of her Spanish subjects—there should be no just reason why the pacification of the island might not be effected on that basis. It has been objected, on the one side, that Spain should not promise autonomy until her insurgent subjects lay down their arms; on the other side, that promised autonomy, however liberal, is insufficient, because without assurance of the promise being fulfilled.

Realizing that suspicions and precautions on the part of the weaker of two combatants are always natural and not always unjustifiable—being sincerely desirous in the interest of both as well as on its own account that the Cuban problem the insurrection through the press, by public meetings, by the purchase and shipment of arms, by the raising of funds, and by other means, which the spirit of our institutions and the tenor of our laws do not permit to be made the subject of criminal prosecutions. Some of them, though Cubans at heart and in all their feelings and interests, have taken out papers as naturalized citizens of the United States, a proceeding resorted to with a view to possible protection by this Government, and not unnaturally regarded with much indignation by the country of their origin. The insurgents are undoubtedly encouraged and supported by the widespread sympathy the people of this country always and instinctively feel for every struggle for better and freer government, and which, in the case of the more adventurous and restless elements of our population, leads in only too many instances to active and personal participation in the contest. The result is that this Government is constantly called upon to protect American citizens, to claim damages for injuries to persons and property, now estimated at many millions of dollars, and to ask explanations and apologies for the acts of Spanish officials, whose zeal for the repression of rebellion sometimes blinds them to the immunities belonging to the unoffending citizens of a friendly power. It follows from the same causes that the United States is compelled actively to police a long line of seacoast against unlawful expeditions, the escape of which the utmost vigilance will not always suffice to prevent.

These inevitable entanglements of the United States with the rebellion in Cuba, the large American property interests affected, and considerations of philanthropy and humanity in general, have led to a vehement demand in various quarters for some sort of positive intervention on the part of the United States. It was at first proposed that belligerent rights should be accorded to the insurgents—a proposition no longer urged because untimely and in practical operation clearly perilous and injurious to our own interests. It has since been and is now sometimes contended that the independence of the insurgents should be recognized. But, imperfect and restricted as the Spanish government of the island may be, no other exists there—unless the will of the military officer in temporary command of a particular district can be dignified as a species of government. It is now also suggested that the United States should buy the island—a suggestion possibly worthy of consideration if there were any evidence of a desire or willingness on the part of Spain to entertain such a proposal. It is urged, should be solved with the least possible delay—it was intimated by this Government to the government of Spain some months ago that, if a satisfactory measure of home rule were tendered the Cuban insurgents, and would be accepted by them upon a guaranty of its execution, the United States would endeavor to find a way not objectionable to Spain of furnishing such guaranty. While no definite response to this intimation has yet been received from the Spanish government, it is believed to be not altogether unwelcome, while no reason is perceived why it should not be approved by the insurgents. The friendly offices of the United States will always be at the disposal of either party.

Whatever circumstances may arise, our policy and our interests would constrain us to object to the acquisition of the island or an interference with its control by any other power.

It should be added that it can not be reasonably assumed that the hitherto expectant attitude of the United States will be indefinitely maintained. While we are anxious to accord all due respect to the sovereignty of Spain, we can not view the pending conflict in all its features and properly apprehend our inevitably close relations to it and its possible results without considering that, by the course of events, we may be drawn into such an unusual and unprecedented condition as will fix a limit to our patient waiting for Spain to end the contest, either alone and in her own way or with our friendly coöperation.

When the inability of Spain to deal successfully with the insurgents has become manifest and it is demonstrated that her sovereignty is extinct in Cuba for all purposes of its rightful existence, and when a hopeless struggle for its reestablishment has degenerated into a strife which means nothing more than the useless sacrifice of human life and the utter destruction of the very subject-matter of the conflict, a situation will be presented in which our obligations to the sovereignty of Spain will be superseded by higher obligations, which we can hardly hesitate to recognize and discharge. Deferring the choice of ways and methods until the time for action arrives, we should make them depend upon the precise conditions then existing; and they should not be determined upon without giving careful heed to every consideration involving our honor and interest or the international duty we owe to Spain. Until we face the contingencies suggested, or the situation is by other incidents imperatively changed, we should continue in the line of conduct heretofore pursued, thus in all circumstances exhibiting our obedience to the requirements of public law and our regard for the duty enjoined upon us by the position we occupy in the family of nations.

On December 9, 1896, three joint resolutions in reference to Cuba were introduced in the Senate.

J. Donald Cameron (Pennsylvania) presented the following:

Resolved, That the independence of the republic of Cuba be, and the same is hereby, acknowledged by the United States of America.

Resolved, That the United States should use its friendly offices with the government of Spain to bring to a close the war between Spain and Cuba.

Roger Q. Mills (Texas) presented a resolution directing the President to take possession of Cuba and establish a protectorate there until the inhabitants had organized a self-protecting government.

Wilkinson Call (Florida) presented a resolution recognizing the Republic of Cuba.

The first two resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the third was tabled at the mover's request.

On December 10 Shelby M. Cullom (Illinois) introduced in the Senate the following joint resolution:

Resolved, That the extinction of Spanish title and the termination of Spanish control of the islands at the gateways of the Gulf of Mexico are necessary to the welfare of those islands and to the people of the United States.

CUBAN INDEPENDENCE

SENATE, DECEMBER 10, 1896-JANUARY 26, 1897

Senator Cullom supported his resolution.

The decision of the questions arising and to arise, and the determination of the policy to be pursued by this Government in the near days of the future, will command the exhibition of high patriotism, not less than of wise action, upon our part. We are already placed in such position that some certain course of action must be adopted. Whatever that course may be, it to declare a new and advanced watchword for the civilized world. If we fail to keep up with the march of sentiment and to mold into effective law such salutary principles as we solemnly believe are just and right, and demanded by the progress of the world, we shall neglect a high duty and privilege and omit a sublime opportunity.

If we wait for precedent we shall wait forever. If a precedent is needed we shall make one.

We violated every precedent by the declaration of our own independence on July 4, 1776. When we announced the Monroe doctrine in 1823, it was in defiance of precedent, and was the determination of a rule which has become a law and will never be gainsaid.

We now have reached the time to take another step in advance.

We have already proclaimed that the United States will have something to say regarding matters affecting the American continent, and we should now announce that the speedy termination of Spanish control of the islands at the gateway of the Mexican Gulf is necessary alike to the welfare of those islands and to the people of the United States.

Cuba to-day is lost to Spain. The public proclamation of Spanish defeat may not have been officially and definitely announced, but in truth and fact the submission of Cuba will never again be yielded as of old. The tribute of twenty-five to forty million dollars annually, so long exacted, will never again replenish the treasury of Spain. The struggles of 1895 and 1896 may sadly cripple Cuba, but they will ruin Spain. Cuba, with its wonderful soil and climate, and its unparalleled capabilities, will regain in material wealth and growth under benign influences far more than she has lost. The blood of her people spilled upon her soil will yield a growth of independent citizenship consecrated to liberty. This age is not an age of retrogression. The world of to-day is not wedded to barbarism in order to perpetuate tyranny or relieve tottering dynasties.

Shall it be that the nation where the Inquisition found a congenial home and where the so-called Holy Brotherhood was established for the crushing out of life and liberty and where manhood and womanhood were made the playthings of brutal might—shall it be that the incoming century will chronicle a longer continuance of such power almost within sight of the unfurled Stars and Stripes?

The American people are coming to the consideration of the must be such as shall give proper recognition to the rights, under existing conditions, belonging respectively to Spain and to Cuba. It must also recognize the rights and prerogatives of the world at large—of the nations and the people who stand aloof and watch with deepest interest this struggle for independence and for liberty against absolutism. And not the least of the responsibilities imposed upon us as a nation is the conservation of our own rights and interests. In fact, this latter is the determining factor which must control our course.

While I am not disposed to criticize President Cleveland, I may properly say that I had hoped he would find occasion to give more positive or emphatic expression of the true American continental policy, which ought to be invoked in all cases where the liberty and independence of any of the peoples of the American continent are involved. And, further, I think we ought never to hesitate or delay when the lines of this policy run parallel and coincident with those of common humanity.

If this position shall strike the mind as being too much in advance of the conservatism which has heretofore obtained in all the schools of diplomacy, I may say that that advance is what the world is waiting for. Must the opening of the twentieth century find free America still bound and held by canons dictated for the perpetuation of monarchical power? Under that antiquated conservatism there never would have been erected on the earth the nation which we love and to the establishment of which our fathers consecrated their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor.

The conservatism which adheres to the precedents born in ancient monasteries and clings to an iron-bound monarchism never built a public schoolhouse nor lived in a free land. Humanity and advancement travel together, and dwell only in the climate of republics.

All the diplomacy of all the ages never found a way by which slavery could be dethroned. It required the humanity of Lincoln to break the chains, and the progress of the Republic to open the prison walls to liberty and make glad a waiting world.

The United States must to-day give vitality to her sympathy for the oppressed and the weak. I desire to urge and to claim a policy and the adoption of a doctrine for our nation in advance of that which has heretofore been sanctioned. The United States, by virtue of our history, of our origin, our growth, and our proud and proper place in the world, is the chosen country to put a new chapter into the code of international statutes and

Cuban situation as they already have in certain other cases, as a great political question, a continental question, if you please. And being a political continental question, it will be decided ultimately by the continent whose interests are most clearly involved. Geographically considered, Cuba cannot belong to Spain. Cuba is in American waters and politically it is entitled to statehood in the Continent of American Republics.

Has the United States no interest in our own trade and commerce with an island from which we receive fully 90 per cent. of the vast sugar product and much the larger part of all her other productions? The interests of the United States, counting all things passing between the two countries, reach perhaps $100,000,000 annually, and already this trade has been practically wiped out. The Cuban exports of sugar alone have fallen during the current year—1896—from above a million tons to less than a hundred thousand. The tobacco trade is dead. Neither will revive until war stops and the Spaniards get out of Cuba. That is the only solution of the trade problem.

It is about time that this free country ceased to be a police establishment for the aiding of the most outrageous warfare against a struggling people. The Spanish Government three weeks ago bought and shipped for General Weyler numbers of mules and horses raised in this country and purchased in Missouri and other Western States. Under present stringent rules as applied by our Government, every Federal official is a spy to inform against any attempt to convey arms or clothing or supplies to General Gomez or General Maceo, or the Cuban army. Men are now under arrest in the United States for attempting to succor their friends and relatives in Cuba. Has Spain any sympathy for or friendship with this country? Americans have been imprisoned and punished in Cuba for even expressing sorrow for the poor young medical students who were cruelly shot and murdered in Habana a few years ago. There is not a family of any standing in Cuba which has not lost one or more of its members by arbitrary arrest and sunrise murder by armed troops, who marched their victims to the place of blood and shot them in the back.

In the present war, which has lasted about twenty-one months, Spain has wasted over a hundred millions, and has put into the field possibly 200,000 men and boys. Spain is beggared to-day, and unless she can continue her grasp upon Cuba she will show to the world the end of the worst-governed country known in two thousand years.

I believe it to be the duty of the United States to use the great power attaching to the nation to declare and to maintain, as a prerogative of right, belonging generally to republicanism, and specifically to this Republic, that no charnel house of ruin shall be continued in the West Indian waters, whose waves break at our very front gate, any longer than the time it shall require to break it up. I put it on that ground, and on the ground of humanity as well, because the world knows that no humanity is manifested there on the part of the Spanish army. And if the duty of suppressing this damning blot and erasing it forever from sight shall fall alone upon the United States, so be it. Have we fallen so low as to have forgotten the sacrifices which men of genius and character and honor made in behalf of this country in its days of trouble? Have we forgotten and enshrouded the glorious memory of Lafayette? Have we turned to the wall the pictures of Pulaski, of Steuben, of De Kalb, and others long since in glory? These men cast their lives and their fortunes at our feet that we might succeed. But we shall not stand alone in the warfare which may follow in behalf of common humanity. Nation after nation will make joint cause with us in such a struggle, and when we have succeeded and shall have made into law the principle, and made into history the fact, every other country worth naming will regret its mistake in not participating in the humane work.

The effort cannot fail. We shall not wage any warfare for the acquisition of territory for ourselves. We shall not claim Cuba as a reward for saving her from the slaughter, but we will not see that fair island turned again to the mercies of wild beasts and vultures of war whose only stimulus is gain. Cuba libre—free Cuba—is the reward, and what a glorious reward will that be! Every citizen of the United States will feel that his birthright as an American freeman will mean something. Every lover of liberty the world over will exult in the progress and advancement of man. The breadth and stature of individual Americanism will be enlarged and ennobled. Society will feel that its doors need not be closed against wrong and oppression, for there will be none who dare molest and make afraid. A settlement is to be had. A settlement must be made. The account has been open and running long enough—yes, far too long. To its settlement we may properly invite the coöperation of all the republics of the American Continent. But the end of the devastation must be determined. The United States must furnish the occasion, if it does not otherwise arise.

If other means fail we may consider the propriety of a fair purchase of Cuba. That method has had its share of considera-

By recognizing the only power that over two-thirds of that island can protect the American citizen and the property of the citizen of the United States found there.

What better argument for the passage of this resolution is there than the fact that Spain is impotent to enforce the rights of American citizens in the territory of Cuba? We may demand of Spain indemnity; we may insist that she shall give the protection needed; but how can she do it when she is compelled to withdraw her forces and to maintain them in the garrisons and the cities of the Gulf?

Mr. President, the first duty of this country is to protect its citizens. How was it in the case of the Virginias? What did the Government of Great Britain do? They demanded at the muzzle of the cannon that there should be delivered to them the subjects of Queen Victoria who had been captured, while our own people were left to be the victims of arbitrary power. And so history has come on down. The reproach does not belong to this Administration alone that we have not protected and are not protecting the citizens of the United States and the property of the citizens of the United States. This same proposition of the President was made during the administration of President Grant—I say it with no kind of reproach—but the same proposition of delay, delay until some contingency existed in which the power of the Spanish Government was entirely exhausted. And here, now, after the lapse of twenty years, after a three years' war, after the maintenance of the organized government, we are still told that we must still remain quiet; that we must not acknowledge that which is a fact—the power of those people to exert government over two-thirds of that island, and protect the property of American citizens there, and the lives of American citizens there.

Mr. President, I can see no reason whatever for failing to make promptly this recognition of an existing fact, the independence of Cuba, and giving to it as a government the same rights that are accorded to Spain in the ports and jurisdiction of the United States.

If you do not choose you need not amend your neutrality laws. Cuba does not need anything but the privilege to enter into the ports of the United States and purchase arms and munitions of war. She needs no organized forces from here. She is able to maintain herself, and if she were not that is not our concern.

I maintain that wherever a people have organized a revolution beyond that of a riot, an insurrection, and have organized tion under previous administrations. It is not that we want the territory, but we mean that the trouble shall meet a just settlement and conclusion. Let the end come, and come quickly. Let the bloodshed cease, and let freedom and humanity be glorified.

I cannot more appropriately close these remarks than by giving the beautiful apostrophe to our Republic and its mission, delivered at Gettysburg in 1869 by an American poet, Bayard Taylor:

"Her once war-wasted arm,
Put forth to shield a sister land from harm,
Ere the last blood on her own blade had dried,
Shall still be stretched to succor and to guide,
Beyond our borders, answering each need,
With counsel and with deed—
Along our Eastern and our Western wave,
Still strong to smite, still beautiful to save."

At the mover's request the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Senator Call then brought forward his resolution and spoke in favor of its adoption.

Mr. President, what reason can be given for not taking some action recognizing the fact that here are a people who have established a government for themselves? Who has a right to say that, because it is or is not a civil government, but a military government, it shall not be recognized?

In what part of the public law of nations is the proposition contained that a people may not establish a military government? What is Russia; what is Germany; what are all the autocratic governments of the world but governments resting upon military power—upon force? And why should we consider the question whether or not those people proceed by civil processes? But they do. They have an organized government; and the question for us is, How shall we exert the power that is in our hands to perform the legitimate duties of government in the protection of our own citizens and our commercial rights and interests in another country? Hundreds of American citizens have been languishing for months and months in the jails and castles of Cuba, and have been transported to Ceuta—American citizens entitled to the protection of this Government. Taking possession of Cuba will not relieve those American citizens, nor will the declaration of this Government that we recognize the independence of Cuba. That is a different subject. But how shall we prevent the destruction of American commercial rights?

a government which shows its power of maintaining itself by asserting its dominion and control of any considerable portion of the territory of a state for any considerable period of time, they have a right to recognition as a government whether they shall ultimately succeed or not.

With what power can a government treat for the protection of the property and life of its citizens or subjects unless it be with that power which can protect them, which has subverted the legitimate and regular authority? If this be not true, it follows that they must remain unprotected, with nothing but the right of indemnity or damages against perhaps an irresponsible and failing power. How will Spain with her diminished resources ever be able to indemnify the people of the United States for the $50,000,000 of money invested in the estates and plantations of Cuba? How will Spain indemnify the people of the United States for the citizens of the United States transported to Ceuta and there for life sentenced to penal labor and confinement?

Mr. President, there seems to me to be no two sides to the question of the duty of the Government of the United States to recognize the independence of the Island of Cuba and its government, and to accord to them all the rights that belong to an independent nation in the ports and jurisdiction of the United States. It is not a question for us to consider whether or not that will lead to war. I do not believe it will. It is a recognized right of nations to do this. There is no right on the part of Spain and no legitimate cause of offence. Really it is to her interest that the Government of the United States should take this action, and that in some form the war should be terminated without further ruin and further destruction of property, and without further excitement of the people of the United States by the continued imprisonment of American citizens without sufficient cause.

On December 21 the Committee on Foreign Relations through Senator Cameron reported a joint resolution acknowledging the independence of Cuba.

On the same day David B. Hill (New York) introduced a joint resolution according belligerent rights to both parties in the Cuban war and pledging the United States to observe strict neutrality between them.

Horace Chilton (Texas) then moved an amendment of the same effect to the Cameron resolution recognizing the independence of Cuba.

On January 7, 1897, Roger Q. Mills (Texas) moved the following joint resolution:

Resolved, That the expediency of recognizing the independence of a foreign government belongs to Congress, and when Congress shall so determine the Executive should act in harmony with the legislative department of the Government.

SEC. 2. That the independence of the Republic of Cuba ought to be, and hereby is, recognized, and the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated for salary and expenses of a minister to that government whenever such minister shall be appointed by the President.

The Mills resolution was reported on January 11. Senator Mills supported it.

Mr. President, on the 18th day of December last the Committee on Foreign Relations agreed to report to the Senate of the United States a joint resolution recognizing the independence of the Republic of Cuba. On the morning of the 19th of December a statement was given to the public press by authority of the Secretary of State [Richard Olney] challenging the authority of the Congress of the United States to deal with that question. He stated that in order to allay misapprehension and injurious results that might follow at home and abroad he thought it his duty to announce to the world that the President had the "exclusive" right to deal with the question of the recognition of a foreign state, and that if both Houses of Congress should pass a joint resolution recognizing the independence of a foreign state, and it should be vetoed by the President and then be passed by a two-thirds majority over the President's veto, the law would be inoperative and of no effect.

I propose to meet that contention. It is an extraordinary contention, and this is the second time in the history of the Republic that it has been presented. When it was first presented it met with a signal rebuke by the Congress of the United States, and I doubt not it will meet with the same rebuke now. Where the distinguished Secretary obtains his authority I know not. The Congress of the United States and the executive department are both the creations of the Constitution. Whatever authority the President and the Secretary of State have comes from the words of that great charter, either by an express provision or by a just and necessary implication from an express provision.

from Habana without going out and making a raid and running back again for shelter; and yet the President thinks that because the Cubans do not come out and give pitched battle to the Spaniards they are not worthy of recognition! The Cubans fight in their own way. The Cubans do not fight without arms and without munitions of war to enable the Spaniards to take them all and shoot them to death. They fight so as to break down the power of Spain; they fight in the only way they can fight; and they fight to the death. The same criticism, however, might have been made by the President if he had lived two thousand years ago. He might have said that Rome had no government because Fabius would not fight Hannibal in open battle when Hannibal was encamped around the walls of Rome for seventeen years. The historian says Fabius baffled Hannibal by refusing to fight until Rome got ready to give battle in her own way; and when she did it was in Africa, where she overturned the government of Carthage and destroyed Hannibal and his army.

Now, we are told that Cuba is not to be recognized because she does not go out without arms in her hands, when she has only ten or fifteen or twenty thousand to fight one hundred or two hundred thousand; and the President says—and I suppose he is a great military genius—if they will do that the whole thing can be settled right off, and we should have peace in our neighboring nation. Yes, they could; but how is Cuba to obtain arms? Cuba is surrounded by a chain of fire, surrounded by Spanish gunboats. She can obtain munitions of war only by occasionally passing by the gunboats and running in and slipping in the munitions, which are obtained by the friends of Cuba in the United States; but the President of the United States has so administered the neutrality laws of this Government as to make his administration a devoted friend of Spain. The Spaniards compliment and praise him. I do not envy the President while he enjoys their encomiums. I do not envy him the tributes he receives from Castelar and Weyler, men who curse and denounce the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and the people of the United States, while they laud the President with praises for his course.

The neutrality laws of the United States bind the Administration only to prevent the sailing of armed expeditions, and over and over again has it been ruled that the sailing of a vessel with arms and munitions of war is no violation of the neutrality laws of the United States, nor is it a violation of the neutrality laws of other countries. We have the neutrality

The Constitution of the United States gives the President the power to appoint an ambassador to a foreign government, but the foreign government must exist before the President can appoint an ambassador or a minister. The Constitution gives the President power to appoint to an office, but the office must be created before the President can appoint, and the power to create an office in this Government is vested in the legislative department of the Government, and so far as the relations of the people of the United States are concerned the power to create a foreign government rests with the Congress of the United States, for the power to recognize its existence is the power to create our relations with it.

James Monroe, President of the United States, in 1822 did not recognize the independence of the South American states until he was fully authorized by the Congress to do it. On the 2d day of May, 1826, John Quincy Adams, his successor in the presidential chair, carrying into effect the same provision of the statute of May 4, 1822, recognized Peru as an independent nation.

In all these instances the President cooperated with Congress, believing that Congress could rightfully pass upon the expediency and policy of recognizing the independence of a foreign state, and when Congress had passed upon that as a fact then it was his duty to accept that fact as conclusive, and to carry it into execution by appointing and receiving the necessary ambassadors and by making treaties with those governments.

Here I leave this question and take up the question that follows. Congress having the power to recognize a foreign state, should it now recognize the existence of the Republic of Cuba? Why not? Cuba has a government; she has a president; she has a legislative assembly; she has courts; she has officers collecting the revenue; and I see by a statement just made by a gentleman who is soon to be a member of this body, already elected, who has been to Cuba, that the Cuban Republic even compels Spain to pay taxes to that government, and that even General Weyler has to pay his share of such taxation. Nothing purchased in the island outside of Habana enters that city which does not pay taxes to the republic before it enters the Spanish lines. Here is a government in full operation, levying taxes, administering the laws, raising and supporting armies, fighting battles, and still the President says it is not ready for recognition. He tells us that it occupies two-thirds of the territory of the island—if he had said nine-tenths he would have been more accurate. The armed power of Spain cannot get 25 miles laws passed in the administration of President Monroe; and not only has it been held that arms and munitions could be shipped, but it has been held that an armed ship may be sent to insurgents lawfully by the laws of nations, only it has to run the peril of being captured by the enemy. Whenever the insurgents in Cuba come to the United States to buy arms and munitions with which to defend their liberties and to save themselves from destruction, they have to apply to the customs officer when their boat is loaded. The customs officer telegraphs to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the telegrams to the Secretary of the Treasury are made public. He telegraphs orders from the Treasury to the customs officer, "Let the ship go, on her stating that she is going from a certain port to a certain port." That information is given to Spain by the public press, and Spain's gunboats can go to that port or seize the vessel on the way.

Is that fair and just? Would it be fair and just with any people of the earth outside of this hemisphere? President Washington in his Farewell Address to the people of the United States cautioned them against favoritism to governments, cautioned them against partialities. Neutrality means impartiality; means that all shall be treated alike; and yet the whole course of the policy of the present Administration in this Cuban struggle has been to strengthen the power of Spain and hasten the hour of the destruction of the insurrection in Cuba. The President says in his message that the question of granting them belligerent rights is now no longer urged. Where did the distinguished Chief Magistrate of the nation get that remarkable information? He did not get it from Congress. Congress passed a law or a concurrent resolution, which is the expression of its opinion, and it is upon the statute book yet. If it were no longer urged somebody would offer a resolution to repeal it on the ground that we had made a mistake; but instead of retracing our steps of last year Congress is proposing to advance. Nor did the President get this remarkable information from the people of the United States. They believe in a government of the people founded on the consent of the governed. They are opposed to monarchy; they have no sympathy with Spain. Ninety-nine out of every hundred patriots in the United States deeply and profoundly sympathize with the insurrection in Cuba.

It may be possible that the boards of trade, the stock exchanges, and the commercial clubs of the great exporting cities on the Atlantic seaboard and in the North and West have had access to his ears and given him that information.

I have received communications from some of the distinguished commercial gentlemen in the United States, criticising me for the part I have taken. They say: "Business has just begun to revive, and now you are going on tearing it all to pieces again; you want to bring on war. What have we got to do with Cuba? We are exporting and importing to Cuba; we are making money. Let us alone." It is this mercantile spirit in this country that is fighting against its honor. The President says we ought to do the right thing; not to use might, but to use right; and he speaks in his message of what we owe to Spain.

Do we owe no duty to the poor, struggling people whom Spain is butchering every hour? We have said for one hundred years, and we say it to-day, and the President repeats it in this very message, that we will let no other power interfere in Cuba. We will not let them go and assume a protectorate over that island. We have shut them out from all houses of refuge; we have condemned them to slavery and to the despotism of the assassin who occupies the throne of Spain. We have done it; and we repeat it day by day, and yet shall we sit still in the Senate and in the House of Representatives and in the Executive chair of this nation and talk about our duty to Spain? We owe no duties to a despot, except the duties that we have covenanted in treaties that we have made with her, and which she has persistently refused to execute.

We owe a duty to the people of Cuba. We said in the very beginning of our history that Cuba should remain under the dominion of Spain. We said no other European government should acquire it. We said France should not have Louisiana, and we compelled her to sell it to us. We took the same ground with reference to Florida in 1811. We were then in a condition of quasi war with England and France. It was apprehended by our people that Great Britain was trying to get possession of Florida. On the 3d of January, 1811, Mr. Madison sent a message to Congress in which he said the country east of the Perdido River was so intimately connected with the security and tranquillity of the United States that he asked Congress to say by a declaration "that the United States could not see, without serious inquietude, that country pass from the hands of Spain into that of any other foreign power." Congress passed the act, and authorized him to take forcible possession of the territory, which he did, and occupied it with the army, notwithstanding Spain was the proprietor of the territory; and from that day on to the day when the gallant Colonel Monroe, as ment do? Some more words, words, words. They say, "He has been tried according to treaty. He has been tried by the civil courts. There is nothing to do now except to stand by and see an American shot to death for nothing." I say, Oh to God that we had one hour of Franklin Pierce, William L. Marcy, and Commander Ingraham! I say it is the duty of the Government of the United States to see that her citizen has a fair trial upon the merits of the accusation made against him, and to take some part in that controversy herself to see whether or not he is punished justly; and I care nothing about the verdicts of the courts of Spain or the courts of any other country on earth. If the citizen of the United States, in the judgment of his own Government, has violated no law, if he does not merit the punishment prescribed by a foreign government, I would make the atmosphere around Madrid smell of sulphur for a month. [Applause in the galleries.]

Premier Castelar has complimented the President. He talks about the crazy Senate and people of the United States. He talks about the greatness and glory of the President of the United States. I do not envy the President that man's compliment. His hands are besmeared with the blood of fifty-seven innocent American citizens who were executed while he was chief executive of Spain, murdered without trial. God grant that the day may come sometime when this great nation with all its power may once more be relieved from the shackles of the mercantile spirit of this country, when it may stand out in the face of the earth and assert and maintain the rights of its people everywhere, granting the rights of all other people honestly and religiously, observing them everywhere, and compelling every government on the earth to respect the rights of its citizens.

Mr. President, I feel that the people of the United States are in honor bound to interfere for the deliverance of those people; that they are in honor bound to protect our own people on that island and to see that when they are in possession of their rights not a hair on their heads shall fall to the ground. Whether the Congress of the United States or the President shall go forward to the discharge of their high duty, so long as I remain in this body as a representative of the people of Texas I will speak their views in favor of the discharge of every obligation of this Government and in favor of rescuing those poor people from the dungeon into which we have committed them. [Applause in the galleries.]

President of the United States, threw the gauntlet of the young Republic at the feet of the Holy Alliance and dared them to lift it have we said that this hemisphere was not to be dominated by European influence.

Mr. President, we owe something to our own people in conjunction with the debt we owe to the poor, oppressed people of Cuba. If I had the place which the President has I would call upon the Congress of the United States to give me the power to take the armed fleets of this Government to Habana, and I would there protect the people of the United States or I would reduce those fortresses to a mass of mortar and ruin. [Applause in the galleries.]

An American newspaper correspondent, Govin, without a penknife, with a certificate in his pocket showing that he is a newspaper correspondent, with a certificate showing that he takes no part in the armed insurrection on the island, is taken out, strung up between two trees, and a squadron of cavalry rides by—at a dash—a gallant dash—and hews his flesh from his bones with machetes? Then what do we do? What does this great Republic do? She writes a note, and that note calls upon another officer to write another note, and, as poor Sanguilly said, it is words, words, words. Lying in prison in violation of the provisions of the treaty of 1877 for a year, and now condemned to perpetual imprisonment! Words! Why can not we demand of Spain that the perpetrators of this vile deed under Spain shall be punished? Why call upon Spain for words?

By military order when Sanguilly was captured he was condemned, I believe, to be shot or to be transported for life to the penal colony in Africa. The sentence was one or the other. Our Government called the attention of the Spanish Government to the fact that by treaty he must be tried by the civil courts. The civil courts in Cuba! They have had the laws of the machete since 1825. Cuba has no courts but the courts that are decreed from the mouth of the captain-general. "Well," Spain said, "if that will relieve you, all right." The judgment of the court at Madrid is set aside. The prisoner is ordered back to trial in Cuba by the civil courts, and a civil court is the creature of Weyler, and when the time comes for the trial he takes out the only witness who can prove that the man was a non-combatant, the only witness who can prove his innocence, and boldly shoots him to death, and imprisons the attorney who defends him—and then brings the prisoner up for trial and, without any evidence, repeats the same condemnation. Then, what does our Govern-

120 GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

On January 13 Augustus O. Bacon (Georgia) supported Senator Mills' resolution. His speech was of great value outside of its relation to Cuba, because of its clear analysis of the related constitutional powers of Congress and the President. As this analysis is however only incidental to the Cuban situation, it is here omitted.

Senator Bacon began by referring to a resolution which he had introduced in December, and which was now before the Judiciary Committee:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the question of the recognition by this Government of any people as a free and independent nation is one exclusively for the determination of Congress in its capacity as the lawmaking power;

Resolved further, That this prerogative of sovereign power does not appertain to the executive department of the Government, except in so far as the President is, under the Constitution, by the exercise of the veto, made a part of the lawmaking power of the Government.

Senator Bacon supported his resolution as follows:

Recognition makes the independence of the new nation a part of the law of this land. It becomes law binding upon the citizen, the official, and the Government; law recognized and administered by our courts; law under which in our own courts title to property is vested and divested; law which can be made the test of alleged crime; law which no judge of our courts could wantonly and capriciously ignore and refuse to administer without subjecting himself to impeachment and removal from office.

The declaration of a simple fact as a fact cannot accomplish such result. The mere declaration of a fact as such cannot coerce the action of a whole people and command the judgments and determine the decrees of courts as to property and personal liberty and life. Only law can do this, and only Congress can by the exercise of this power of recognition of the independence of a nation declare this law.

Those who claim that this power rests exclusively in the Executive must follow their argument to its final results, and they cannot escape the conclusion that if this contention is correct no monarch in the day of arbitrary and unlimited rule ever wielded more absolute and unquestioned power than does the President of the United States in this regard. I will add that there is not on earth to-day a constitutional monarch who personally wields such power; not one.

The great struggle of centuries has been to free the people from the domination of one-man power. The culmination and triumph in that struggle was typified in the formation of this Government. So long as the executive head is confined in the exercise of power to these bounds set for him by the organic law there can be no one-man domination.

To guard and fortify against the growth of power centered in one man, which all experience had shown to be aggressive and dangerous, the legislative is, under the Constitution, made the highest branch of this Government. While it is in no manner answerable to either of the other branches of government, on the contrary, all officers of all other branches of the Government are answerable to Congress as to a tribunal of final power. The great governmental functions, the exercise of the great powers of the sovereignty of the Government, have been committed to it by the Constitution with the particular design and intent that they shall not be exercised by the Executive; that, at great cost of blood and treasure, wrested as they had been from the grasp of kings, these great powers should never be again within the control of any one man.

The fundamental purpose was to elevate the people rather than to exalt any man who of necessity should be set up to rule. The supreme design was that their commands should be executed by him, rather than that they should be subjected to his will, "to the end that this may be a government of laws and not of men."

On January 25-26 David Turpie (Indiana) spoke to the Cameron resolution recognizing the independence of Cuba.

Mr. President, I favor first a recognition of the independence of the Cuban Republic. I believe that would be the most patriotic, the most thoroughly American method of disposing of this question; and if economy is to be considered it is also the most facile and least expensive method of terminating this condition. I believe next in the declaration of belligerency, placing the combatants upon equal footing; that it is due from the United States, having regard to its history, its rank and station among the family of nations, to acknowledge the great right of revoluloss of life and treasure and increased injury to American interests, besides throwing enhanced burdens of neutrality upon this Government. In 1878 peace was brought about by the truce of Zanjón, obtained by negotiations between the Spanish commander, Martínez de Campos, and the insurgent leaders.

The present insurrection broke out in February, 1895. The revolt and the efforts to subdue it carried destruction to every quarter of the island, developing wide proportions and defying the efforts of Spain for its suppression. The civilized code of war has been disregarded, no less so by the Spaniards than by the Cubans.

The offer made by my predecessor in April, 1896, tendering the friendly offices of this Government failed. Any mediation on our part was not accepted. In brief, the answer read: "There is no effectual way to pacify Cuba unless it begins with the actual submission of the rebels to the mother country."

The cruel policy of concentration was initiated February 16, 1896. It has utterly failed as a war measure. It was not civilized warfare. It was extermination.

Against this abuse of the rights of war I have felt constrained on repeated occasions to enter the firm and earnest protest of this Government.

The instruction given to our new minister to Spain [Gen. Stewart L. Woodford] before his departure for his post directed him to impress upon that government the sincere wish of the United States to lend its aid toward the ending of the war in Cuba by reaching a peaceful and lasting result, just and honorable alike to Spain and to the Cuban people. It was stated that our Government was constrained seriously to inquire if the time was not ripe when Spain of her own volition, moved by her own interests and every sentiment of humanity, should put a stop to this destructive war and make proposals of settlement, honorable to herself and just to her Cuban colony. It was urged that as a neighboring nation, with large interests in Cuba, we could be required to wait only a reasonable time for the mother country to establish its authority and restore peace and order within the borders of the island; that we could not contemplate an indefinite period for the accomplishment of this result.

No solution was proposed to which the slightest idea of humiliation to Spain could attach, and indeed precise proposals were withheld to avoid embarrassment to that government. All that was asked or expected was that some safe way might be speedily provided and permanent peace restored. Between the departure of General Woodford, the new envoy, and his ar-tion and self-government in any people upon any island of this hemisphere or in any part of the continent.

I believe in recognition because recognition is reinforcement. It is reinforcement to the side and cause of freedom in this hemisphere. If the Cuban patriots succeed we may then claim that we were friends of that republic, friends in need, friends in the hour and day of danger. If failure befall them, which may God avert, our action will lose nothing of grace or grandeur, and we shall have kept faith with that generous, quenchless spirit of liberty which has placed our own feet in so large room and in the way of such a high career that we cannot forbear, we cannot be silent; we must cry out, in the words of Lincoln, the great emancipator, "I wish that all men everywhere might be free!"

None of the Cuban resolutions came to a vote in the Senate during this session.

Four resolutions to recognize the independence of Cuba were presented in the House, and all were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which made no report upon them.

On December 6, 1897, President McKinley thus referred to the Cuban situation in his first annual message.

"FORCIBLE ANNEXATION WOULD BE CRIMINAL AGGRESSION"

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY'S MESSAGE ON CUBA

The prospect from time to time that the weakness of Spain's hold upon the island and the political vicissitudes and embarrassments of the home government might lead to the transfer of Cuba to a Continental power called forth, between 1823 and 1860, various emphatic declarations of the policy of the United States to permit no disturbance of Cuba's connection with Spain unless in the direction of independence or acquisition by us through purchase; nor has there been any change of this declared policy since upon the part of the Government.

The revolution which began in 1868 lasted for ten years, despite the strenuous efforts of the successive peninsular governments to suppress it. Then, as now, the Government of the United States testified its grave concern and offered its aid to put an end to bloodshed in Cuba. The overtures made by General Grant were refused and the war dragged on, entailing great rival in Spain the statesman who had shaped the policy of his country [Señor Cánovas] fell by the hand of an assassin, and although the cabinet of the late premier still held office and received from our envoy the proposals he bore, that cabinet gave place within a few days thereafter to a new administration, under the leadership of Sagasta.

The reply to our note was received on the 23d day of October, 1897. It is in the direction of a better understanding. It appreciates the friendly purposes of this Government. It admits that our country is deeply affected by the war in Cuba and that its desires for peace are just. It declares that the present Spanish Government is bound by every consideration to a change of policy that should satisfy the United States and pacify Cuba within a reasonable time. To this end Spain has decided to put into effect the political reforms heretofore advocated by the present premier without halting for any consideration in the path which in its judgment leads to peace. The military operations, it is said, will continue, but will be humane and conducted with all regard for private rights, being accompanied by political action leading to the autonomy of Cuba while guarding Spanish sovereignty. This, it is claimed, will result in investing Cuba with a distinct personality, the island to be governed by an executive and by a local council or chamber, reserving to Spain the control of the foreign relations, the army and navy, and the judicial administration. To accomplish this the present Government proposes to modify existing legislation by decree, leaving the Spanish Cortes, with the aid of Cuban senators and deputies, to solve the economic problem and properly distribute the existing debt.

In the absence of a declaration of the measures that this Government proposes to take in carrying out its proffer of good offices, it suggests that Spain be left free to conduct military operations and grant political reforms, while the United States for its part shall enforce its neutral obligations and cut off the assistance which it is asserted the insurgents receive from this country. The supposition of an indefinite prolongation of the war is denied. It is asserted that the western provinces are already well-nigh reclaimed, that the planting of cane and tobacco therein has been resumed, and that by force of arms and new and ample reforms very early and complete pacification is hoped for.

Discussion of the question of the international duties and responsibilities of the United States as Spain understands them is presented, with an apparent disposition to charge us with failure in this regard. This charge is without any basis in fact. It could not have been made if Spain had been cognizant of the constant efforts this Government has made at the cost of millions and by the employment of the administrative machinery of the nation at command to perform its full duty according to the law of nations. That it has successfully prevented the departure of a single military expedition or armed vessel from our shores in violation of our laws would seem to be a sufficient answer.

Firm in the conviction of a wholly performed obligation, due response to this charge has been made in diplomatic course.

Throughout all these horrors and dangers to our own peace this Government has never in any way abrogated its sovereign prerogative of reserving to itself the determination of its policy and course according to its own high sense of right and in consonance with the dearest interests and convictions of our own people should the prolongation of the strife so demand.

Of the untried measures there remain only: Recognition of the insurgents as belligerents; recognition of the independence of Cuba; neutral intervention to end the war by imposing a rational compromise between the contestants, and intervention in favor of one or the other party. I speak not of forcible annexation, for that cannot be thought of. That by our code of morality would be criminal aggression.

Recognition of the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents has often been canvassed as a possible, if not inevitable, step both in regard to the previous ten years' struggle and during the present war. I am not unmindful that the two Houses of Congress in the spring of 1896 expressed the opinion by concurrent resolution that a condition of public war existed requiring or justifying the recognition of a state of belligerency in Cuba, and during the extra session the Senate voted a joint resolution of like import, which, however, was not brought to a vote in the House of Representatives. In the presence of these significant expressions of the sentiment of the legislative branch it behooves the Executive to consider soberly the conditions under which so important a measure must needs rest for justification. It is to be seriously considered whether the Cuban insurrection possesses beyond dispute the attributes of statehood which alone can demand the recognition of belligerency in its favor. Possession, in short, of the essential qualifications of sovereignty by the insurgents and the conduct of the war by them according to the received code of war are no less important factors toward the determination of the problem of belligerency than are the sible. Should that step hereafter be deemed wise as a measure of right and duty the Executive will take it.

Intervention upon humanitarian grounds has been frequently suggested, and has not failed to receive my most anxious and earnest consideration. But should such a step be now taken when it is apparent that a hopeful change has supervened in the policy of Spain toward Cuba? The policy of cruel rapine and extermination that so long shocked the universal sentiment of humanity has been reversed. Under the new military commander a broad clemency is proffered. Measures have already been set on foot to relieve the horrors of starvation.

Decrees in application of the foreshadowed reforms have already been promulgated. All civil and electoral rights of peninsular Spaniards are, in virtue of existing constitutional authority, forthwith extended to colonial Spaniards. A scheme of autonomy has been proclaimed by decree, to become effective upon ratification by the Cortes. It creates a Cuban parliament which, with the insular executive, can consider and vote upon all subjects affecting local order and interests, possessing unlimited powers save as to matters of state, war, and the navy, as to which the governor-general acts by his own authority as the delegate of the central government. This parliament has the right to propose to the central government, through the governor-general, modifications of the national charter and to invite new projects of law or executive measures in the interest of the colony.

It is honestly due to Spain and to our friendly relations with Spain that she should be given a reasonable chance to realize her expectations and to prove the asserted efficacy of the new order of things to which she stands irrevocably committed. She has recalled the commander whose brutal orders inflamed the American mind and shocked the civilized world, and has modified the horrible order of concentration.

The near future will demonstrate whether the indispensable condition of a righteous peace, just alike to the Cubans and to Spain, as well as equitable to all our interests, so intimately involved in the welfare of Cuba, is likely to be attained. If not, the exigency of further and other action by the United States will remain to be taken. When that time comes that action will be determined in the line of indisputable right and duty. It will be faced, without misgiving or hesitancy, in the light of the obligation this Government owes to itself, to the people who have confided to it the protection of their interests and honor, and to humanity.

influences and consequences of the struggle upon the internal polity of the recognizing state.

Turning to the practical aspects of a recognition of belligerency and reviewing its inconveniences and positive dangers, still further pertinent considerations appear. In the code of nations there is no such thing as a naked recognition of belligerency unaccompanied by the assumption of international neutrality. Such recognition without more will not confer upon either party to a domestic conflict a status not theretofore actually possessed or affect the relation of either party to other states. The act of recognition usually takes the form of a solemn proclamation of neutrality which recites the de facto condition of belligerency as its motive. It announces a domestic law of neutrality in the declaring state. It assumes the international obligations of a neutral in the presence of a public state of war. It warns all citizens and others within the jurisdiction of the proclamaunt that they violate those rigorous obligations at their own peril and cannot expect to be shielded from the consequences. The right of visit and search on the seas and seizure of vessels and cargoes and contraband of war and good prize under admiralty law must, under international law, be admitted as a legitimate consequence of a proclamation of belligerency. While according the equal belligerent rights defined by public law to each party in our ports, disfavor would be imposed on both which, while nominally equal, would weigh heavily in behalf of Spain herself. Possessing a navy and controlling the ports of Cuba her maritime rights could be asserted not only for the military investment of the island, but up to the margin of our own territorial waters, and a condition of things would exist for which the Cubans within their own domain could not hope to create a parallel; while its creation through aid or sympathy from within our domain would be even more impossible than now, with the additional obligations of international neutrality we would perforce assume.

The enforcement of this enlarged and onerous code of neutrality would only be influential within our own jurisdiction by land and sea and applicable by our own instrumentalities. It could impart to the United States no jurisdiction between Spain and the insurgents. It would give the United States no right of intervention to enforce the conduct of the strife within the paramount authority of Spain according to the international code of war.

For these reasons I regard the recognition of the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents as now unwise and therefore inadmis-

128 GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

Sure of the right, keeping free from all offence ourselves, actuated only by upright and patriotic considerations, moved neither by passion nor selfishness, the Government will continue its watchful care over the rights and property of American citizens and will abate none of its efforts to bring about by peaceful agencies a peace which shall be honorable and enduring. If it shall hereafter appear to be a duty imposed by our obligations to ourselves, to civilization, and humanity to intervene with force, it shall be without fault on our part and only because the necessity for such action will be so clear as to command the support and approval of the civilized world.

On February 15, 1898, the American warship Maine, while in the harbor of Havana, was sunk by an explosion.¹

On April 11 the President sent a special message to Congress on Cuba.

INTERVENTION IN CUBA

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY

The war in Cuba is of such a nature that short of subjugation or extermination a final military victory for either side seems impracticable.

Realizing this, it appeared to be my duty, in a spirit of true friendliness, no less to Spain than to the Cubans, who have so much to lose by the prolongation of the struggle, to seek to bring about an immediate termination of the war. To this end I submitted, on the 27th ultimo, as a result of much representation and correspondence, through the United States minister at Madrid, propositions to the Spanish Government looking to an armistice until October 1 for the negotiation of peace with the good offices of the President.

In addition, I asked the immediate revocation of the order of reconcentration, so as to permit the people to return to their farms and the needy to be relieved with provisions and supplies from the United States, cooperating with the Spanish authorities, so as to afford full relief.

The reply of the Spanish cabinet was received on the night of the 31st ultimo. It offered, as the means to bring about peace in Cuba, to confide the preparations thereof to the insular parliament, inasmuch as the concurrence of that body would be necessary to reach a final result, it being, however, understood that the powers reserved by the constitution to the central government are not lessened or diminished. As the Cuban parliament does not meet until the 4th of May next, the Spanish Government would not object, for its part, to accept at once a suspension of hostilities if asked for by the insurgents from the general-in-chief, to whom it would pertain, in such case, to determine the duration and conditions of the armistice.

Nor from the standpoint of expediency do I think it would be wise or prudent for this Government to recognize at the present time the independence of the so-called Cuban Republic. Such recognition is not necessary in order to enable the United States to intervene and pacify the island. To commit this country now to the recognition of any particular government in Cuba might subject us to embarrassing conditions of international obligation toward the organization so recognized. In case of intervention our conduct would be subject to the approval or disapproval of such government. We would be required to submit to its direction and to assume to it the mere relation of a friendly ally.

When it shall appear hereafter that there is within the island a government capable of performing the duties and discharging the functions of a separate nation, and having, as a matter of fact, the proper forms and attributes of nationality, such government can be promptly and readily recognized and the relations and interests of the United States with such nation adjusted.

There remain the alternative forms of intervention to end the war, either as an impartial neutral by imposing a rational compromise between the contestants, or as the active ally of the one party or the other.

As to the first, it is not to be forgotten that during the last few months the relation of the United States has virtually been one of friendly intervention in many ways, each not of itself conclusive, but all tending to the exertion of a potential influence toward an ultimate pacific result, just and honorable to all interests concerned. The spirit of all our acts hitherto has been an earnest, unselfish desire for peace and prosperity in Cuba, untarnished by differences between us and Spain, and unstained by the blood of American citizens.

The forcible intervention of the United States as a neutral to stop the war, according to the large dictates of humanity and following many historical precedents where neighboring states have interfered to check the hopeless sacrifices of life by internecine conflicts beyond their borders, is justifiable on rational grounds. It involves, however, hostile constraint upon both the parties to the contest as well to enforce a truce as to guide the eventual settlement.

The grounds for such intervention may be briefly summarized as follows:

First. In the cause of humanity and to put an end to the barbarities, bloodshed, starvation, and horrible miseries now existing there, and which the parties to the conflict are either unable or unwilling to stop or mitigate. It is no answer to say this is all in another country, belonging to another nation, and is therefore none of our business. It is specially our duty, for it is right at our door.

Second. We owe it to our citizens in Cuba to afford them that protection and indemnity for life and property which no government there can or will afford, and to that end to terminate the conditions that deprive them of legal protection.

Third. The right to intervene may be justified by the very serious injury to the commerce, trade, and business of our people and by the wanton destruction of property and devastation of the island.

Fourth, and which is of the utmost importance. The present condition of affairs in Cuba is a constant menace to our peace, and entails upon this Government an enormous expense. With such a conflict waged for years in an island so near us and with which our people have such trade and business relations—when the lives and liberty of our citizens are in constant danger and their property destroyed and themselves ruined—where our trading vessels are liable to seizure and are seized at our very door by warships of a foreign nation, the expeditions of filibustering that we are powerless to prevent altogether, and the irritating questions and entanglements thus arising—all these and others that I need not mention, with the resulting strained relations, are a constant menace to our peace, and compel us to keep on a semiwar footing with a nation with which we are at peace.

These elements of danger and disorder already pointed out have been strikingly illustrated by a tragic event which has deeply and justly moved the American people. I have already transmitted to Congress the report of the naval court of inquiry on the destruction of the battleship Maine in the harbor of Havana during the night of the 15th of February. The destruction of that noble vessel has filled the national heart with inexpressible horror. Two hundred and fifty-eight brave sailors and marines and two officers of our navy, reposing in the fancied security of a friendly harbor, have been hurled to death, grief and want brought to their homes, and sorrow to the nation.

The naval court of inquiry, which, it is needless to say, commands the unqualified confidence of the Government, was unanimous in its conclusion that the destruction of the Maine was caused by an exterior explosion, that of a submarine mine. It did not assume to place the responsibility. That remains to be fixed.

In any event the destruction of the Maine, by whatever exterior cause, is a patent and impressive proof of a state of things in Cuba that is intolerable. That condition is thus shown to be such that the Spanish Government cannot assure safety and security to a vessel of the American navy in the harbor of Havana on a mission of peace, and rightfully there.

Further referring in this connection to recent diplomatic correspondence, a dispatch from our minister to Spain, of the 26th ultimo, contained the statement that the Spanish minister for foreign affairs assured him positively that Spain will do all that the highest honor and justice require in the matter of the Maine. The reply above referred to of the 31st ultimo also contained an expression of the readiness of Spain to submit to an arbitration all the differences which can arise in this matter.

The long trial has proved that the object for which Spain has waged the war cannot be attained. The fire of insurrection may flame or may smolder with varying seasons, but it has not been, and it is plain that it cannot be, extinguished by present methods.

The only hope of relief and repose from a condition which can no longer be endured is the enforced pacification of Cuba. In the name of humanity, in the name of civilization, in behalf of endangered American interests which give us the right and the duty to speak and to act, the war in Cuba must stop.

In view of these facts and of these considerations, I ask the Congress to authorize and empower the President to take measures to secure a full and final termination of hostilities between the Government of Spain and the people of Cuba, and to secure in the island the establishment of a stable government, capable of maintaining order and observing its international obligations, insuring peace and tranquillity and the security of its citizens as well as our own, and to use the military and naval forces of the United States as may be necessary for these purposes.

And in the interest of humanity and to aid in preserving the lives of the starving people of the island I recommend that the distribution of food and supplies be continued, and that an ap proprietion be made out of the public treasury to supplement the charity of our citizens.

The issue is now with the Congress. It is a solemn responsibility. I have exhausted every effort to relieve the intolerable condition of affairs which is at our doors. Prepared to execute every obligation imposed upon me by the Constitution and the law, I await your action.

Yesterday, and since the preparation of the foregoing message, official information was received by me that the latest decree of the Queen Regent of Spain directs General Blanco, in order to prepare and facilitate peace, to proclaim a suspension of hostilities, the duration and details of which have not yet been communicated to me.

This fact with every other pertinent consideration will, I am sure, have your just and careful attention in the solemn deliberations upon which you are about to enter.

If this measure attains a successful result, then our aspirations as a Christian, peace-loving people will be realized. If it fails, it will be only another justification for our contemplated action.

service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

The minority of the committee presented the following views:

The undersigned members of said committee cordially concur in the report made upon the Cuban resolutions, but we favor the immediate recognition of the Republic of Cuba, as organized in that island, as a free, independent, and sovereign power among the nations of the world.

DAVID TURPIE.
R. Q. MILLS.
JNO. W. DANIEL.
J. B. FORAKER.

The amendment reported by the minority of the committee was to amend the first paragraph by inserting, in line 4, after the word “independent,” the following:

And that the Government of the United States hereby recognizes the Republic of Cuba as the true and lawful government of that island.

Senator Foraker supported the minority resolution. He first spoke of the points on which the entire committee were agreed.

I desire first to speak of the difference between the Executive and the committee, as shown by these recommendations, as to the form and character of intervention. The committee differed with the President in the first place because, in the judgment of the committee, the time had come when no further negotiations were in order. In the language of the President employed in this message, the time for action, in the judgment of the committee, had come, and the committee felt that while they had the matter under consideration they would provide for action, immediate and specific, and, as they believed, in character and keeping with the desires of the American people in respect to this matter.

In the second place, Mr. President, the committee, or at least some members of the committee, had grave doubts as to the

CUBAN INDEPENDENCE

SENATE, APRIL 13-16, 1898

On April 13, 1898, Cushman K. Davis (Minnesota), chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, presented to the Senate a joint resolution for the recognition of the independence of the people of Cuba, demanding that the Government of Spain relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba, and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters, and directing the President of the United States to use the land and naval forces of the United States to carry these resolutions into effect.

To this committee had been referred a number of resolutions and two presidential messages on the subject, the latter being of March 28 and April 11, 1898. The committee submitted with its resolution a long argumentative report, the substance of which will be found in the speeches advocating its adoption.

The committee recommended the adoption of the following resolution:

Whereas the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the island of Cuba, so near our own borders, have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization, culminating, as they have, in the destruction of a United States battleship, with 266 of its officers and crew, while on a friendly visit in the harbor of Havana, and cannot longer be endured, as has been set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of April 11, 1898, upon which the action of Congress was invited: Therefore,

Resolved, First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual right of Congress to confer upon the Chief Executive of the nation the conditional exercise of the war-making power. Congress alone is invested with the war-making power. The proposition of the President was that he should take effective steps, such, of course, as he might deem effective, and that if he should fail to secure a cessation of hostilities in Cuba, then and in that event he was authorized to employ the army and the navy of the United States. In other words, make war in the condition or contingency that his negotiations should fail. I for one at least think the committee generally doubted the legality of that proposition.

Then, Mr. President, as to the establishment of a stable government by the President of the United States in the island of Cuba, the committee were of the opinion that there might possibly be grave doubts as to the right of Congress to empower the President of the United States or for the Congress itself to create and establish a stable government in the island of Cuba for the benefit of the Cuban people.

However that may be, after the committee had declared that the people of the island of Cuba are and of right ought to be free and independent, the proposition that the President of the United States or the Congress of the United States or any other exterior power should establish for that independent people a government stable or otherwise was inconsistent.

If a people be free and independent, as we have in this first proposition declared that the people of the island of Cuba are, they, and they alone, have power to establish their government. Independence and sovereignty go hand in hand, and any people who have independence have the capacity and the right to exercise sovereignty, and it is a denial of independence to say in the next breath after you have declared it that we will undertake, or we do hereby reserve the right and power, to establish for that independent people a government such as in our judgment and opinion may be stable.

Whether or not a people who have revolted and rebelled against a sovereign power and are striving for independence are entitled to be recognized as an independent state is always a question of fact as well as a question of law. Before you can tell what law is applicable to any particular case you must ascertain what the facts are. What are the facts with respect to Cuba? Fortunately in answering that question I need not long or tediously detain the Senate. Not only from the newspapers and other sources of information, but from presidential messages, from the last one received, and especially and particularly from the very able report of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, we have been fully advised.

Mr. President, it is now plain to all the world, plain to Spain herself, for she has been for months, and is now by every steamer, recalling her troops from there, that she is no longer attended in her efforts to subdue that island by any reasonable expectation or hope of ultimate success. That being the case, such being the facts, what is the law of the case? I read from Hall on International Law. It is a standard and a modern authority. It has been written in the light not only of ancient, but of modern precedents.

Hall tells us that whenever the struggle on the part of the former sovereign becomes "so inadequate as to offer no reasonable ground for supposing that success may ultimately be obtained, it is not enough to keep alive the rights of the state, and so to prevent foreign countries from falling under an obligation to recognize as a state the community claiming to have become one."

I need not read other authorities, but I challenge any Senator who may enter into this discussion to find an authority inconsistent with the declaration which I have read, who is accepted as a standard authority among those who are competent to judge of international-law writers.

That is the rule; whenever the struggle on the part of the sovereign to recover lost authority, lost sovereignty, has ceased to be attended with a reasonable hope or expectation of success, then other countries have a right to recognize the independence of the opposing people. If I have been talking to any purpose I have made it plain by the statement of facts I have given that no longer are the struggles of Spain in the island of Cuba attended with any reasonable hope or expectation of success. That being true, Mr. President, according to the principles of international law we have a right, as the committee have reported, and it is our duty to recognize the independence of the people of Cuba.

But suppose something is lacking in the Cuban case to justify us in claiming that they are absolutely free and independent, will not that which may be lacking, whatever it may be, be supplied when the United States of America intervenes, as we propose to do by this same resolution? Intervention goes here, according to this resolution, as it does naturally, hand in hand with independence. When this demand, which we all agree is to be made, that Spain shall withdraw is made upon her, that minute she must either abdicate, which would leave the island free ment has a right to go to the ballot box and be heard in determining what the government shall be as to the personnel of its officials. The house of representatives, elected by the people in this manner, selects the president and vice-president and the cabinet; and what character of government have they selected? Let me call your attention for a moment to the character of these officials.

I have heard that government referred to here as though it were made up of a lot of inconsequential nobodies. I say, without attempting to disparage anybody, the president and vice-president of the Cuban Republic, for intellectual strength and power and vigor, for high character, for unquestioned ability, for statesmanship, will compare favorably with the President and Vice-President of the United States of America. Than Bartolome Masó there is no more accomplished gentleman, probably, on the Western Hemisphere; a man of large means, a man of large experience in public affairs, a man who—and I mention this to show his character—when the war broke out called in all his creditors and paid every one of them in cash the full sum owing, then turned over the keys to his tenants and departed for the field. He is now president of that republic, after having served two years as vice-president under Cisneros, recently elected as such by the general assembly chosen by popular vote.

With this distinguished president is associated in office as vice-president Dr. Domingo Méndez Capote, who was professor of law in the Havana University for years before called to this position.

Mr. President, what has this Cuban Government done? It has been stated here that it is a paper government. That is true: it is a most excellent paper government, but it is a most excellent actual government as well. There is in the island of Cuba, instituted by this paper government, a postal system which is carrying the mails to-day throughout the island into every fortified city, as well as throughout the territorial parts of the island. You can go to New York and deposit with the junta a letter addressed to anybody, in any place in Cuba, with a Cuban postage stamp attached, and it will find its destination just as surely as a letter deposited in a United States post-office will reach its destination within our territory. They not only have a postal system, but they have a fiscal system—a fiscal system which has provided tax collectors for the government throughout all that island. Each and every man is required to pay precisely alike, and when the subtreasurer of that government, appointed at New York, was before the committee a few and independent to the satisfaction, I imagine, of the most hostile mind to the recognition of independence, or else, if she does not abdicate, she must then give battle—declare war; and what American can doubt, or does doubt, the ultimate result of war, if we are so unfortunate as to have war?

Will it not result in the absolute freedom and independence of the people of the Island of Cuba? Unquestionably so; for we expect to prosecute a war to triumphant success, if we are driven into one.

So, therefore, I say, upon authority, in strict consonance with the rules and principles of international law, it is the duty of the Government of the United States, as well as the right and privilege of this Government, now, at this very moment, when we pass a resolution to intervene, to recognize the independence of the people of that island.

Mr. President, I now wish to speak of the resolution which the minority of the committee favor. The minority of the committee are not satisfied simply to recognize the independence of the people of that island. We want to recognize also, and we appeal to Senators in this Chamber to stand by us in that proposition, the government set up by the insurgents, referred to by the President in his message as the "so-called" Cuban Republic.

We think this government ought to be recognized in the first place, because if the people of Cuba are free and independent, as we have agreed unanimously in the committee they are, who made them free and independent? Did they become free and independent acting as a mob? exerting themselves in a state of anarchy? without any political organization? No! Such wonderful achievements as stand to their credit we all knew could not have been accomplished without concert of action, without political organization, and they had it in the Republic of Cuba. That was their civil government, to which the military force commanded by Gomez is subordinate.

Mr. President, there are a great many other reasons why we should recognize that government.

We ought to be willing to recognize it because of its form and character. It is a republican form of government. It is a government based on a written constitution, in which the several departments of the government are established and the powers of the various departments and officials are prescribed. It has a legislative, an executive, and a judicial department. The legislative branch of the government is elected by popular vote. In Cuba, under this constitution, they have universal suffrage. Every man or woman who owes allegiance to the Cuban Govern-days ago he showed us in his books where more than $470,000 collected by these tax collectors throughout that island had been transmitted to him as revenues of that government, every dollar of which had been collected by the officials of the Republic of Cuba, and for every dollar of which an official receipt had been given.

They have, in addition to their postal and fiscal system, a school system more creditable than any established by Spain in any place in the world. They have a compulsory system of education. Every child between certain ages is required to attend school. They have a public printing press at their capital (of which I shall speak in a moment), where, by the government, school books are printed, and by the government distributed to the scholars throughout the island. All are educated according to a system of the government, a system established and conducted by the government and the representatives of the government.

Ah, but, some one says, it has no fixed capital.

The Cubans do have a fixed capital. It is located at Cubitas. It has to be at times somewhat peripatetic, going from this to that place, but never removing any very great distance. They have public offices, the presidential office, the office for each of the secretaries. In those offices the business of the republic is conducted. There, in those offices, the archives of the nation are preserved, and I can say here, in passing, that in the office of our own Secretary of State are the official communications of the officials of the Republic of Cuba, and they are as creditable as any that have come from any country on the globe—communications of marked ability.

But, Mr. President, there are other reasons why that government, which I have undertaken to show does in fact exist, should be recognized. We should recognize it, if for nothing else, as a war measure. I do not doubt that intervention by the United States will mean war with Spain. We are bound to assume that it will. That being the case, we should, hand in hand with intervention, adopt this other resolution, recognizing not only the people, but the government also as independent, to the end that we may strengthen those who are our natural allies and who can do more for us than anybody else.

Gomez has now in the field, as I said a while ago, some 35,000 or 40,000 men. He would have many thousands more if he had guns and ammunition for them. The very moment the United States intervenes and recognizes the independence of that republic Gomez can swell that army from 35,000 or 40,000 to 50, 000, 60,000, 80,000, 100,000 men, and all we will have to do is to put guns and ammunition in their hands and they will speedily evict the Spanish battalions from the island of Cuba. If we will only with our navy blockade the harbors, so that they can take no more provisions in, the Cubans will speedily put an end to the war, and there will be no necessity for this Government to expose our troops to the ravages of yellow fever and the other difficulties and disadvantages that would attend a campaign in that island in the rainy season.

But, Mr. President, there is another reason still why this proposition should be incorporated into these resolutions. It is the reason why, in the original draft of the resolutions, I incorporated it. I put in there, and propose to put it back in there if I can, a declaration that the Republic of Cuba should be at once recognized by the Government of the United States because of the legal effect that would result if we did not do that. I hold that it is well settled as a principle of international law that if one country absorb another it takes not only the legal rights and advantages of that country, but it takes also the obligations of that country. We have all been told by the newspapers and otherwise—I have never seen any contradiction of it, and therefore I have assumed that it is true—that the revenues of Cuba have been, by solemn enactment of the Spanish Government, pledged to the payment of the principal and interest of $400,000,000 of Spanish-Cuban 4 per cent. bonds.

Mr. President, what will be the consequence to this Government if we go down into that island treating them as in a state of anarchy, turning our back on Gomez and his government, denying that there is any government, banishing Spain from the island, taking possession of the territory, and appropriating the revenues either to ourselves or to "a stable" government that the United States of America through the President is to establish in that island? What would be the consequence? We would take the rights and privileges and advantages attaching to the territory, and we would take the debts fastened on it also, just as if you buy a piece of property that is mortgaged, you take it subject to the mortgage and must pay the mortgage or lose your property. That is the legal proposition that I assert. I am not going to stop here to read authorities, but I will do so if it should be challenged.

STEPHEN B. ELKINS [W. Va.].—If Gomez takes the island what will become of the mortgage?

SENATOR FORAKER.—It does not make any difference to us what happens if Gomez takes it; but I will tell you what will situation where they can set up their government, and all we do in going there is to recognize the existence of that government and act with our natural allies.

Ah, but says somebody, when you go there, if you recognize the existence of that government, you are compelled to report to Gomez, and there will be a question at once between General Miles and General Gomez as to who should command. If there be any government in the island of Cuba to-day it is either the Spanish Government or it is the Republic of Cuba, and when General Miles goes to Cuba I would rather have him report to General Gomez than to General Blanco.

Mr. President, I have not at any time had any trouble in my mind about independence and intervention, but I have had this kind of a trouble in my mind: The trouble has been whether it should be independence and intervention or independence and a declaration of war outright. I think, logically speaking, it ought to be a declaration of war, and I would be standing here arguing for such a declaration if I were not of the opinion that armed intervention will give us an opportunity to suitably punish Spain for the destruction of the Maine and 266 of our officers and sailors. [Applause in the galleries.]

We have been told, Mr. President, that the board of inquiry appointed by our Government by its report has estopped us from such a declaration. I dispute it. It is true that the board of inquiry found that they could not tell what person or persons were responsible for that disaster, but the context shows that in that connection they had reference only to the question what person or persons pressed the button that sent the electric current on its fateful mission; and that, Mr. President, is immaterial in the light of the other facts unequivocally found by that board of inquiry.

No, it is an absolute absurdity, it seems to me, for us to imagine that the submarine mine that destroyed the battleship Maine was anything else than a governmental implement and agency of war. Suppose, for illustration, instead of that ship being destroyed by a submarine mine, as she was, she had been sunk by a shot fired from Morro Castle, under the guns of which she was buoyed. Would any Senator in such instance imagine that there could be any question about that piece of artillery being a governmental agency and implement of war? Would anybody stand up and question that it was a governmental agency under the control of government officials, and that the Spanish Government could be held liable by us for the result of the discharge of that gun as a hostile act of war?

happen. If Gomez takes the island by revolution the whole obligation is wiped out, for those who successfully revolutionize start anew, as revolutionists have started anew from the beginning of the world, except only as to obligations which they themselves might create.

SENATOR ELKINS.—If we should take the island by war, would not those obligations be wiped out as well?

SENATOR FORAKER.—I cannot discuss every kind of a question that a Senator by an interrogatory may seek to put before me, especially not when in the very next breath he will refuse, or, at least, evade, to say whether he wants this Government to acquire that island by conquest or not.

I say here, as a principle of international law, if the United States Government goes down there and drives Spain out and puts somebody else in, forming "a stable government" of her making, that "stable government" will become responsible, and the United States of America will become responsible. The United States of America steps in behind four hundred million of Spanish-Cuban 4 per cent. bonds. You do not admit the proposition. It is possible that it is open to some debate. I will concede for the sake of the argument it is. But who holds these $400,000,000 of bonds? I understand they are held largely in Germany, largely in France, and largely in the United States.

Does anybody imagine, Mr. President, if we should go into Cuba and there establish a stable government for which we would be responsible, that the present Emperor of Germany would hesitate one moment to say to the people of the United States, "You have taken by conquest the revenues that Spain had a right to pledge and did pledge to pay the principal and interest of bonds due to my subjects, and I will now look to you?" Does anybody doubt that he would do it?

Treating it as a practical question, do you suppose that the rulers of Germany, France, and other countries whose subjects are interested as holders of these bonds would hesitate to call us to account? I do not hesitate to say they would, and then we would have other and far more serious complications. I want to avoid them.

If we recognize the independence of the Republic of Cuba that liability is avoided. We absolutely estop everybody from making such a demand upon us; we take no responsibility. Those people, according to our resolutions, have already accomplished their independence without any help from this country, but rather in spite of all this country has done to patrol our coasts in the interests of Spain. They are already in a

Mr. President, the gun was not any more a governmental agency than this mine was. The gun was not any more under the control of the government than this mine was. The gun was not any more subject to governmental control and to be discharged by governmental agencies than was this mine.

But, if it had been the case of a discharge from a gun, what would Spain have done? Why, the whole world would have recognized that we were bound to assume that it was an act of war. Spain would have recognized it. How could she have escaped from the consequences? Only in one way, and then she would have remained liable for all damages that occurred. She could have escaped from the conclusion that it was an act of war by immediately disavowing and immediately establishing by incontrovertible proof that it was an accident, if such a thing were possible.

Mr. President, the same rule that would apply in the case of the gun does apply, and did apply, in this instance. And, Mr. President, the significant thing is that Spain admitted by her conduct that it applied. What did Spain do? Instantly she disavowed, just as she would have done in the case of the gun, and instantly sought to establish her innocence by proving that it was an accident.

No wonder, Mr. President, that she seized upon the theory that it was an accident when our own Government was everywhere proclaiming that it was an accident. She sought to establish that it was an accident; she pitched her defence on that proposition; she took her testimony; she made an official report. It is before the Senate. She finds in that report that the Maine was destroyed, not by an external agency, but by an accident, by the explosion of one of her magazines.

Mr. President, that report is a lie to the living and a libel upon the dead. It is on its face absolutely and conclusively false. There is one circumstance that will forever keep it branded as such—the present condition of the keel plates absolutely wrecks and destroys her whole defence as completely as the Maine was destroyed by her submarine mine. What is the result? The result of it is that Spain stands to-day convicted by her own effort at defence, convicted in the presence of the nations of the earth, of that hideous and cowardly crime.

What is our duty in view of it? Mr. President, we owe it to the brave men dead to vindicate their reputations from the brutal charge that they died of their own negligence. We owe it, Mr. President, to the splendid record of the American navy to preserve it from the tarnish that is sought to be put upon it. We owe it, Mr. President, to our own good name among the nations of the earth that the perpetrators of such a cruel outrage shall not go unwhipped of justice.

It is not morality, it is not Christianity, it is not religion, it is not common decency, it is not common sense, but only a maudlin sentimentality to talk in the presence of such circumstances and facts about the horrors of war. War is horrible, always to be deplored, and ever to be avoided if it can be avoided consistently with the dignity and the honor and the good name of the nation. But, Mr. President, much as war is to be deplored, it is a thousand times better to have it in a case like this than to be written down before all the nations of the earth as pusillanimous—as wanting in pluck and courage.

Yes, Mr. President, business interests may be interfered with, loss of life may occur, all apprehended evils may result, but, no matter what the cost, in the presence of this great commanding duty we must go forward. The time, I repeat, for diplomacy has passed. The time for action has come. Let the doubting, the hesitating, the opposing go to the rear, while the virile, strong-minded, patriotic, liberty-loving masses of the American people, coming from all the sections and all pursuits and avocations of life, rally as one man around our gallant army and navy, and, taking the flag of our country, carry it on to triumphant victory. [Applause in the galleries.]

A victory, Mr. President, for civilization over barbarism; a victory for the right and capacity of man to govern himself; a victory for the Western Hemisphere; a victory for Cuba; a victory for freedom and liberty and independence; a victory worthy of the descendants of the heroic men who achieved our own independence, and worthy of the successors of those heroic men who have since preserved and perpetuated our priceless heritage. [Applause in the galleries.]

EUGENE HALE [Me.].—I offer as a substitute for the pending resolution what I send to the desk, which I ask may be printed and go over with the joint resolution. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

The President is authorized, directed, and empowered to intervene at once to restore peace on the island of Cuba, and secure to the people thereof a firm, stable, and independent government of their own, and is authorized to use the army and naval forces of the United States to secure this end.

HENRY CABOT LODGE [Mass.].—Mr. President, I think there is one point on which all men in this country are agreed to-day,

WAR OF CUBAN INDEPENDENCE 147

We heard but yesterday in the Foreign Relations Committee the advice of General Fitzhugh Lee, who has conferred such honor upon the United States by the manner in which he has represented this country at Havana, and his advice is that we should not recognize the insurgent government.

Therefore, Mr. President, without arguing that point further, I beg to say that I stand with the majority of the committee and with the President of the United States in opposing the recognition of the insurgent government at this time. It can be done, if necessary, at any moment. The President has nothing to do but to ask Mr. Palma to the White House, and the Cuban republic stands up erect and recognized. We may safely trust that power to the President.

I said, sir, that the President has asked us for intervention. The committee have given it to him. It was not the form of resolution which I personally preferred. I voted for another in the committee. But, Mr. President, what I desired more than any special form of resolution was the unity of action of the Government of the United States in the crisis to which we have arrived. Therefore I voted to bring these resolutions into the Senate; voted to do it with all the other members of the committee. Nor do I think, Mr. President, that there is much use in differing about the words in which we order intervention. We have been wandering too long as a country amid the delusions and snares of diplomacy. Let us now come into the clear light of day and look facts squarely in the face.

When we authorize the President to intervene and use the army and navy of the United States, whether we do it in the language of the message, or in the language of the House of Representatives or in the language of the Senate resolution, we create a state of war. Let us not deceive ourselves at this solemn hour. Forms of words are of but little moment in a crisis like this. It is the great central fact that concerns the people to-day. The President has asked us to mail his arm to strike with the army and the navy of the United States; to authorize him to go down into Cuba and enforce the pacification of the island. He has asked us to authorize him to set up a government there which shall be a stable government, and a government "capable of observing international obligations." I quote the President's own words.

What kind of government can alone observe international obligations? Only an independent government, Mr. President. Therefore the President of the United States asks us to authorize him to use the army and the navy to stop the fighting in Cuba no matter how they may differ on one proposition or another, and that agreement is that this situation must end. We can not go on indefinitely with this strain, this suspense, and this uncertainty, this tottering upon the verge of war. It is killing to business.

It is ruinous to our people in a thousand ways. It is discreditable to our Government and our country. If we are not to take action in regard to Cuba in order to bring this situation to an end, then let us stand up in the face of the world and say that we wash our hands of the whole affair; let us say that we will not intervene to save the starving, to put an end to hostilities, and that we will turn the case of the Maine over to a referee. If we are not prepared to do that, then let us act the other way. But, whatever happens, let us end this state of unendurable suspense. That, I believe, Mr. President, is the one great desire of the entire country.

The President has submitted this momentous question to the Congress of the United States. In his hands are placed by the Constitution all the diplomatic functions of the Government. He alone can address foreign powers; he alone can carry on correspondence through his ministers and officers. Congress has no diplomatic functions whatever. The President has told us that diplomacy is exhausted, and he has handed the case over to us. What power have we got? We have but one, Mr. President. The Constitution gives to Congress—I mean to both Houses constituting the entire Congress—but one power in relation to foreign countries—the last great weapon in the armory of nations—the war power. And now, Mr. President, when the President comes to Congress and invokes our aid in a controversy with a foreign country and asks us to give him power to intervene, I desire that that great power of war should be given to him in that way.

I am against a declaration of war, but I favor giving the President the power to intervene. I am against recognizing the government of the insurgent republic because the President of the United States, in his high responsibility, has advised Congress strongly against it. I will not myself part from that unity which I consider so much more important than aught else, and differ on that point.

I do not care to argue here the question of recognizing or not recognizing the government of the insurgents. Powerful arguments can be made both ways. We have heard one in the message of the President; we have heard another to-day from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Foraker] on the other side.

and establish an independent government in that island. How can there be an independent government in Cuba while Spain is there? It is an impossibility. The recommendations of the message mean that Spain must leave that island, and I for one think that if that is the purpose of the message, as it clearly is, there is no harm and much good in telling the truth. If we intervene, we do not go there to take Gomez by the throat and make him stop fighting. We go there to put Spain out of that island, for in no other way can we create a government capable of observing its international obligations.

They say we can not go to war about the Maine. Perhaps not. We are told that it is an incident. So be it. It is the outgrowth of the conditions in Cuba; it is the outgrowth of that Spanish rule; it is the outcome of that Spanish war, and it calls upon us to end the causes that made it possible. The men who were hurled from the sleep of life into the sleep of death call upon us from their graves to root out forever the causes which made their slaughter possible.

We are told that we must not go to war on the narrow ground of revenge. Revenge is an ugly word, although Bacon tells us that it is nothing but wild justice. No, not revenge; but we must have reparation for the Maine. We can not, as a nation, belittle that case or refuse to demand a great and shining atonement for our dead sailors. If we allow that to drop aside, to pass away into an endless tangle of negotiation and law and discussion, we are lost to all sense of brotherhood; we are lost to all love of kith and kin; our uniform will no longer be an honor and a protection; it will be a disgrace and danger to wear it.

Your men on your ships are sullen to-day because they think that the Government is not behind them. There are mutterings among the men who wear your uniform because they think you have not striven to redress the awful slaughter of their comrades. You must maintain the honor of the uniform and of the flag under which the men died. Surely, there never was a more righteous cause than this for any nation to ask for justice. That gigantic murder, the last spasm of a corrupt and dying society, which carried down our ship and our men, cries aloud for justice.

Mr. President, I care but little what form of words we adopt. I am ready to yield my opinions to those about me in Congress. Still more ready am I to defer to the wishes of the Executive, who stands, and must stand, at our head; but I want now to arm that Executive with powers which shall enable him in the good providence of God to bring peace to Cuba and exact justice for the Maine. [Applause in the galleries.]

On April 14 George F. Hoar (Massachusetts) spoke to the resolution.

Born and bred in a cold latitude, I would rather approach this grave occasion in the spirit of that captain who led the company of the people of my own birthplace to the bridge in the morning of the Revolution, when he said, "I went into that battle with the same seriousness and the same sense of responsibility to God with which I am accustomed to go to church." If, in the providence of God, this country is called upon to do a great act of international justice, let us do it in the spirit of justice, and not in the spirit of vengeance.

The other day one Senator cited us, as if he liked it, the utterance of the Scripture, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. The Saviour cited it only to disapprove it and to give us a new commandment and a better doctrine.

I am not one of those, either, if any there be, who would seek to divide and not to unite the people of this country. If we are to enter upon a course of action where we receive the sympathy of the civilized world, let us not begin by reviling each other.

Mr. President, I regret, speaking for myself, that any Senator feels it to be his duty to indulge in harsh criticism of the President of the United States. What the President of the United States does in diplomacy the people of the United States do. There is no other means of knowing the opinion, purpose, conduct, character of the American people under our Constitution, so far as that is expressed in our diplomatic and international action, than by studying and seeing what the accredited agent of the American people, the Executive, has done, just as there is no mode of determining what the American people do or mean to do or desire to do in legislation but by the legislative enactments passed through their constitutional agencies.

What the President of the United States did the United States did in the face of mankind, and what the President of the United States refrained from doing the American people refrained from doing in the face of all mankind. For one, I approve him alike in what he has done and said and in what he has refrained from doing and saying. I like the President's holding back and striving with all his power for a peaceful in this country or elsewhere, are times of debts and jobs and disordered currency and popular discontent. The periods that have followed the great wars are the worst periods in history. If we enter upon this war we are to subject our ships to many disasters like that of the Maine and our soldiers to pestilence and yellow fever. The destruction in the soldier who survives of the capacity for the rest of his life for the works of peace is a not insignificant result even of the best and most necessary war, to say nothing of the increase of the debt and of the pension list.

On the other hand, I have no patience and I have no respect for those critics who find in the conduct and action of many of my associates and friends on this floor what they are pleased to term a spirit of jingoism. The spirit which has inspired, without an exception, the impassioned and zealous speeches to which we have listened is the spirit of an honorable indignation at a great wrong and an honorable resentment for a great insult, and I believe these gentlemen who think, as I do, that the time has come when the armed forces of this nation are to be summoned to assert themselves have been guided certainly by quite as patriotic a spirit as I claim to be guided by myself, whether I agree with them in all their conclusions as to the detail of action or not.

But I was saying, Mr. President, that I like and thank President McKinley that he has, as far as he could and as long as he could, held back the impetuosity of the American people. President McKinley and those who love him and stand by him need not be at all disturbed lest his fame may suffer in the eyes of humanity and the eyes of posterity by the caution and wisdom with which he has proceeded. The great events in our civic history and the great names in our civic history are those which are connected with the sublime self-restraint with which the American people has contained itself in the presence of great wrongs and of great provocations. It is true, also, that these civic glories have more than once crowned the brows of great soldiers and warriors.

Have we forgotten that the same kind of speeches which the Senator from Washington permitted himself to utter—have we forgotten that the same kind of oburgation and contumely was hurled at the head of George Washington at the time of Jay's treaty, when he held back the indignant people of the Republic from entering upon another war with England? The fame of Washington is represented and typified by the loftiest of monumental structures as it rises in its severe and solution of this business. I like his holding out for peace so long as there remained a hope that peace could be had with honor.

Mr. President, do gentlemen, when they criticize this brave American soldier's love of peace—and every brave American soldier from the beginning of our history has been a lover of peace—reflect what war is and who it is that suffers by it? The persons who suffer by modern wars are not the men who provoke them or the men who are guilty of the causes to which they owe their origin. Every modern war is an additional burden on the poor man, the laboring man, the plain man, while the glory is reaped by a few officers and the profits by a few stock jobbers and contractors.

It is not even the guilty Spaniard who is primarily to suffer by the terrible punishment which we are expected to inflict upon Spain. It is not the Weylers or even the Sagastas or the Blancos. It is the poor peasant whose first-born is to be drafted into the military service, never to return or to return a wreck. It is the widow whose stay is to be taken from her, who is to get no share of the glory, but only the full of the suffering. This war, if it be to come upon us, is to add a new and terrible burden, even if it be confined within the limits to which we hope it may be confined, to the already overburdened and suffering peasantry of Europe. The results of a great war are due to the policy of the king and the noble and the tyrant, not the policy of the people.

Every child upon the continent of Europe to-day was born with a mortgage of $350 about his little neck and an armed soldier riding upon his back. So, while I agree, as will be seen before I finish, that war may be necessary, and it may be necessary now, yet I can not myself agree with my honorable friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Money] when he said so lightly that he thought it was a good plan to have a war once in a while, that it prevented the dry rot of prolonged peace. A nation is made up of human homes, and the glory of a nation and the value of its possessions are in its humble homes. I do not agree with the Senator who thinks that a home is made better by the loss of its boys or the crippling for life of its head.

I do not like what follows war. I do not like the piling up in this country of thousands upon thousands of millions more of our public debt. I have not read history like the Senator from Mississippi in a way to lead me to think that war is ever a purifying process. The seasons which follow great wars, either stainless beauty over the streets of the capital. Where, Mr. President, are the graves of his critics?

Mr. President, I am old enough to remember some of the tempests of popular excitement in Congress and out. I think there are Senators here who remember the cry of "On to Richmond! On to Richmond! On to Richmond!" and the denunciation by honorable and zealous patriots of what they described as the cowardice and treachery of Abraham Lincoln. I think people like to remember Abraham Lincoln's counsels in those days, and those of us who sit on this side of the Chamber wish we could forget Bull Run.

You remember, Mr. President, the sublime patience with which we waited after the French invasion of Mexico until the time at last came, and Mr. Seward spake and the Frenchman got out. You remember, my colleague [Senator Lodge] cited it yesterday, the impatience of some good men at our dealing with the Trent affair, and my colleague cited the lines of Mr. James Russell Lowell:

Elf I turn mad dogs loose, John,
On your front parlor stairs,
Would it jest meet your views, John,
To wait an' sue their heirs!

I wish to remind my honorable colleague, with whom I suppose I am so fortunate as to agree as to everything of substance relating to this political crisis, that we did not take the advice of Mr. James Russell Lowell on that occasion. We took the advice of Abraham Lincoln, and William H. Seward, and Charles Sumner, and John Andrew, and, on the whole, we came out about as well.

Mr. President, some of us remember President Grant's dealings with the same sort of conditions that we have had to deal with in the island of Cuba in the last two years. I came first into public life just as that matter was going on. We did not throw law books at each other's heads in those days in the House of Representatives, but there was quite as much angry speech for the President as we have heard in either House of Congress within a few days. But the great fame of Ulysses Grant shines in the sky like a star, and the conduct of that affair is one of the brightest and strongest of his claims to the gratitude and affection of the American people.

I think it is perhaps because I am getting old and thin blooded and losing my pluck in these matters. But, somehow or other, I like, when I read the history of the Republic, to read the story of these sublime self-restraints, for which those men who hate popular government think a great and free people are incapable.

Do you remember how we submitted year after year to the fitting out in England of the warships which drove our commerce from the seas till, at last, one morning, Mr. Adams, having discovered that the rams were about to go out from Laird's shipyard, wrote a letter to Lord John Russell expostulating? Lord Russell replied that he had consulted Her Majesty's ministers and really they did not think they could do anything about it. Mr. Adams, when the time came, replied in a single sentence, which, to my taste, is the most sublime utterance in American literature: "It is superfluous to observe to your lordship that this is war." And the rams were stopped in an hour.

I also agree with the President of the United States in his refusal to recognize belligerency up to this time. I do not agree with my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. Foraker], who thought the result of that was that we policed our shores in the interest of Spain. That recognition of belligerency, in my opinion, would have simply given Spain the right to search our ships; would have released her from responsibility for actions like the destruction of the Maine, unless they could be traced affirmatively and clearly to her, and would have done the insurgents no sort of good whatever.

Mr. President, what has been the result, what is the result to-day, of the conduct of this matter by President McKinley so far? I have not time to go, as I should like, into a full discussion of this matter, but I wish to read one testimonial only.

I read, Mr. President, from the New York Sun of April 5. "The delay thus far," says this organ of the cause of liberty in Cuba, "has served the cause of the right. It has given time for military and naval preparation for decisive action. It has consolidated public opinion and put the nation behind the President in his constitutional capacity of commander-in-chief of the land and sea forces of the United States. It has permitted the escape of some of the vapor that precedes deliberate and calm action in an affair of momentous importance. It has likewise enabled the President to exhaust, as it was his duty to employ and exhaust, the resources of diplomacy in order to bring about, if possible, an honorable and satisfactory settlement without resort to arms."

There is another result which has come from this diplomatic action and this striving to keep in the paths of peace. We have, what we never have had in any international conflict of every European government that has got a colony in another continent or in an island adjacent to another continent. We do not need to be departing from the rules of international law. What we have in hand we shall know how to do lawfully and effectively.

Another thing. Senators talk about recognizing the insurgent republic. Is that insurgent republic the people of Cuba? The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Foraker] and, I believe, the committee in their report, both state the number of the people of Cuba who sympathize with the insurgent government. The committee states it as a third of the people of the island, and the Senator from Ohio stated it at 400,000. Now, although we may all sympathize, as we all do sympathize, with the gallantry of those insurgents, with the courage and leadership of Gomez, with the endurance and the devotion which are willing to give life and everything which makes life dear for the liberty of Cuba, by what right can you stand in the face of the nations of the earth and say that you will recognize as the lawful government of Cuba a community which the Senator from Ohio, in some sense the organ of the committee, and the chairman of the committee in his report tell us amounts to but a third of the inhabitants of that island?

Mr. President, there is another matter in which I do not agree with the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. Foraker]. I do not believe that the man who enters a house to put out a fire becomes legally responsible for every mortgage on the house, and I do not believe that a policeman who enters a disorderly house to subdue a riot or a fight, even if he has to take the proprietor into custody, becomes liable for every debt which the proprietor may have incurred. I do not think if we take Spain into custody, if we put her off the island of Cuba neck and heels, that we are in the least responsible for any mortgages she may have undertaken to put on the island.

WILLIAM E. MASON [Ill].—I wish to ask the Senator, after a man who enters a burning house has extinguished the fire, if he sets up ownership and says he will decide who shall run the house thereafter, whether he does not then incur responsibility?

SENATOR HOAR.—Nobody proposes to set up ownership and to prescribe who shall run that house hereafter.

Mr. President, I expect to vote for the House resolutions, unless I should have an opportunity to vote for the resolution of the honorable Senator from Colorado [Henry M. Teller]. That leads to war. There is no doubt about it. It will lead to the most honorable single war in all history, unless we except before, largely the sympathy of all foreign nations and almost wholly the sympathy of that nation on earth which is alike the freest, the most powerful, and the most nearly allied to us by language, history, and blood.

I also desire to express my full and hearty concurrence with the President of the United States when he advises against the recognition of the insurgent government, if it be a government, now. Consul-General Lee says he has never thought the insurgents had anything but the skeleton of a government. I will not repeat the citations from international law and from the utterances of our statesmen and department of foreign affairs throughout the whole of the other Spanish conflicts in the Spanish-American countries which I have had occasion long ago to cite.

I affirm that to recognize that people now can not be done without disowning our whole history, without declaring that England was right and that we were wrong in the great controversy as to her conduct in the time of the rebellion, where there were eleven States, with a constitution, with courts, confederated into a republic; and yet we claimed, and England yielded, that she had no right to recognize their independence. We can not recognize that independency, as I say, without flying in the face of our whole diplomatic history. Before this discussion is over it may be desirable to return to that particular point again.

Gentlemen cite the precedent of France in the time of our Revolution. France did not pretend or claim that that recognition of the independence of the United States was anything but an act of war. She was hardly at peace with England. Before she had been driven off the continent of North America by the genius of Chatham and the military prowess of James Wolfe, and she had sat, sulky and angry, biding her time during twelve years of hollow and treacherous truce, and when the time came France hastened to throw her weight into our scale.

Mr. President, we want to gain and we want to keep in this struggle into which we are about to enter the sympathy of the civilized world, and we can only keep it by maintaining the pathway marked out for us by the law of nations. If we depart in dealing with Spain from the accepted traditions and rules of international law, especially if we depart from those rules which we have affirmed over and over again during our own history, we can not blame them if they shall sympathize with Spain for departing from them also. If we put the issue on any doubtful ground, we make the cause of Spain the cause was entered upon by brave people in the assertion of their own liberty. It leads to war. It is a war in which there does not enter the slightest thought or desire of foreign conquest or of national gain or advantage.

I have not heard throughout this whole discussion in Senate or House an expression of a desire to subjugate and occupy Cuba for the purposes of our own country. There is nothing of that kind suggested. It is disclaimed by the President, disclaimed by the committee, disclaimed by everybody, so far as I am aware. It is entered into for the single and sole reason that three or four hundred thousand human beings, within 90 miles of our shores, have been subjected to the policy intended, or at any rate having the effect, deliberately to starve them to death—men, women, and children; old men, mothers, and infants.

If there have been any hasty or unwise utterances of impatience in such a cause as that, and I think there have been, they have been honest, brave, humane utterances. But, when I enter upon this war, I want to enter upon it with a united American people—President and Senate and House, and navy and army, and Democrat and Republican, all joining hands and all marching one way. I want to enter upon it with the sanction of international law, with the sympathy of all humane and liberty-loving nations, with the approval of our own consciences, and with a certainty of the applauding judgment of history.

I confess I do not like to think of the genius of America angry, snarling, shouting, screaming, kicking, clawing with her nails. I like rather to think of her in her august and serene beauty, inspired by a sentiment even toward her enemies not of hate, but of love, perhaps a little pale in the cheek and a dangerous light in her eye, but with a smile on her lips, as sure, determined, unerring, invincible as was the Archangel Michael when he struck down and trampled upon the Demon of Darkness. [Applause in the galleries.]

Charles W. Fairbanks (Indiana) declared that the seemingly opposing views of Senators on the question were practically the same.

One contention is that we shall first recognize the independence of the present Cuban Republic and then intervene with force to sustain it; while the opposite contention is that we shall intervene with force and then acknowledge the independence of the present republic, if, when in possession of adequate information, its recognition is proper; and if it is not a proper government to recognize, then that we shall recognize some republic which the patriots of Cuba may deliberately form. Such is the divergency of our views, though we are seeking to attain the same end.

Is there subtlety enough here to measure the difference in our obligations—our international liabilities under these two methods? Mr. President, I am free to confess that I am unable to see why our ultimate responsibility would not be the same in the one case as in the other. The final end is the same, though the processes are slightly different. It seems to me that the substance of our act must control, and not the mere form. Haste, sir, in this vital matter is not of the essence of the situation; correct conclusions, sound and stable results, should be our sole and only aim.

But, Mr. President, no liability will rest upon us whichever method we pursue. Spain has, by her course, which it is unnecessary to review in this connection, forfeited her right to further dominion over Cuba or its revenues. If the revenues were ever pledged to the satisfaction of a series of Spanish bonds, such pledge was necessarily subject to the forfeiture of the island for the violation of those humane principles and precepts which are observed by the civilized nations of the earth.

Sir, the rights of humanity are superior to the rights of bondholders. We violate neither the law of nations nor incur the burdens which rest upon Spain by our act of recognition either before or after intervention. If our act is warranted by the considerations of humanity, no bondholder can be heard to complain.

When the bonds were taken under a specific pledge, they were taken upon the implied understanding that the pledgee would observe its international obligations according to the standard of civilized nations. The bondholder was presumed to know that a violation of those obligations would work a forfeiture of the estate and the dispossession of the sovereignty of the obligor. The bonds, sir, were taken subject to a condition, and that condition was the proper observance and practice of the rules of humanity, the faithful discharge of international duties. The condition, sir, has been broken.

All efforts at amicable solution have failed, and all that remains is to invoke the mighty power of this Government in behalf of enduring peace and imperiled humanity. We shall now have the satisfaction of knowing that, come what may in the lottery of war, we have left undone nothing which could turn to them the cold shoulder now, will we not inspire them with suspicion? They are a suspicious people: They could not have lived under Spanish dominion and been intelligent and not suspicious.

They have been fooled and betrayed for many years by Spain. They have not been accustomed to deal with manly, upright, straightforward, and candid folk who said "enemy" when they meant enemy and said "friend" when they meant friend; and if, after all of our professions which have gone to them upon the voice of the winds from the firesides of the United States, they should see that when the supreme moment came we voted down the recognition of the republic which had been copied in part from us, that we rebuked the ideas of independence through presidential message and through congressional speech, will they not feel, and justly feel, that they have grounds to suspect their alleged new-found friends?

As a matter of war, recognition is essential. If an American army should go to Cuba, Gomez will be ready to welcome them, and there will be no American soldier who would not be pleased to coördinate with him in campaigns and to receive his suggestions with respect to them. The distinguished consul-general of the United States [Gen. Fitzhugh Lee], who has so ably performed his part in Cuba as to win golden opinions from all sorts of people, has testified before our committee, and he testified as a soldier educated at West Point, a man of large experience, who has taken part in Indian wars upon the Western plains and who was major-general of cavalry in the Army of Northern Virginia. He said that Gomez has taken the only method to beat Spain which an accomplished and able general could have taken; and are we to say at the very moment when we need his services, at the very moment when he has reached the point of recognition, at the very moment when you are asking the United States to go with him and fight the same enemy, that you will turn the cold shoulder to the general-in-chief whose cause is at last the groundwork of your whole action?

Mr. President, we should recognize the Republic of Cuba to avoid international complications, fiscal, diplomatic, and diverging in all directions. I will not say that I am of opinion that the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. Foraker] is correct in stating as a fact that if the United States should go to Cuba without recognizing the republic it would thereby and thereupon make itself liable for any part of the Spanish obligations which have entailed upon Cuba a mortgage of some kind or other as collateral security. But it would leave a question be done consistently with honor to secure a pacific settlement. The Spanish flag must be withdrawn and cease forever to contaminate the air of this hemisphere. To the high and holy cause of humanity and the vindication of our national honor we dedicate the lives and fortune of the Republic.

John W. Daniel (Virginia) spoke on April 15.

Mr. President, there are three sources under our Government thus depicted with a pencil of light from which recognition may be derived. The one is through the action of the Executive in an appropriate case presented to him. The second is in the action of the Executive and the Senate by treaty in an appropriate case presented to them. The third is by vote of the Senate and House of Representatives under the veto power of the Executive and under the constitutional prerogative to pass laws. We invoke the most august of all these powers to recognize the independence of the republic of Cuba. It is the Senate and the House and the Executive acting as one.

Not only will the recognition of the Cuban republic clarify a muddy situation. It ought to be predicated, however, upon the germinal, bed-rock ground of right. If they are a free and independent state, that state must have the inalienable right to determine its own form of government; and the determination by a free and independent people of who their executive is and of who their authority is is a conclusive determination binding by international law upon all other governments in the world. Would we permit in this country any nation on the earth to determine who were our Congress and who our President? When the nations of the earth recognized either the people in their scattered and individual capacity or the nation in its unity or the country in its integrity as free and independent, the rest went as matter of logical and necessary consequence. I would say that it went to-day as a matter of logical and necessary consequence if I did not see the strange spectacle on this floor of men proclaiming the one and stating doctrines in the same resolution or in speeches in support of it which imply the other.

Mr. President, I believe that the recognition of the Cuban republic is at this juncture necessary and expedient to the United States as a peace measure and as a war measure. If the army of Gomez and the people whose homes and firesides have furnished it are made at once the comrades in arms, the friends, the allies, the recognized freemen like those of the United States, they will owe to us an everlasting obligation. But if we should in our path which might be the source of much international trouble. I believe that the correct doctrine is that a war for independence waged by Cuba, or a war made necessary on the part of the United States for its own peace and safety, would not in any event which is likely to happen entail upon the United States any responsibility for any part of either the Cuban or Spanish debt.

At the same time I can not blind my eyes either to the thoughts or to the plans and schemes of other people. I do know as well as I know anything of which I have no physical demonstration that there are those who fancy that the United States will make itself liable, by pursuing the course recommended in these resolutions, for a whole or a part of the Cuban debt imposed on her by Spain. I say, sir, it is the part of prudence, of forehandedness, of foresight to avoid every question that can be anticipated and to solve every difficulty that may be presented at the first moment when it is realized to exist; and that in order to avoid this complication, in order to silence the suggestion of such a question, in order to destroy the germs of what may become a very fatal financial disease, I would here and now recognize the Cuban Republic as a free and independent nation, and let her profile stand out against the sky separate from the domination or the establishment of the United States.

What cause is it, Mr. President, that this solid, unanimous, native-born population of Cuba stands for? It is for a cause well known in English history. It is a cause which has made the most glorious character and evolved the most glorious principles of Anglo-Saxon freedom and independence. It is the cause for which the brave English people, tied to the traditions of monarchy and loving their sovereign, followed the Ironsides of Cromwell, drove out the Parliament, and laid the head of Charles, the King, upon the block.

It is the cause of just taxation. It is the cause, Mr. President, which made America a free and independent republic. It is the cause which threw the tea into Boston harbor. It is the cause that makes the name of Concord and Lexington ring throughout the world. It is a cause which, for the time being, died on the brow of Bunker Hill when Warren fell, but which will live forever on Bunker Hill and through all America as long as American hearts are true to the proud and germinal traditions of the English-speaking race.

It is the cause for which the august Chief-Justice, John Marshall, of the United States fleshed his maiden sword at the Great Bridge near Norfolk. It is the cause for which James Monroe bled in the streets of Trenton. It is the cause for which Otis and Adams and Hancock and Henry spoke. It is the cause which of all causes America has ever held, and which she to-day holds, most dear—the cause ever hallowed by the name and leadership of Washington. And that cause upon the island of Cuba has a flag to represent it. It has soldiers to fight for it. It has patriots to bleed, to die, for it, and it has a unanimous population ready to starve and to perish rather than that cause shall fall.

And yet we are told that with a population, white and black, unanimous for a cause, with a population that has cherished that cause for thirty years, with a population which has done acts of heroism for that cause which have commanded the admiration of the world, we can look out toward the island of Cuba, we can see in its harbor the wreck of the American battleship Maine, we can see the yellow flag of Spain floating over Morro Castle, we can see the hospital and the dungeon, we can bend in the misery and pity of tears over 200,000 women and children dying, and yet the great United States of America can see nowhere the heroic Cuban army and soldiery who stand for the great cause of liberty and independence!

Mr. President, I will not be driven by committees, I will not be driven by Presidents; I had rather be a political Cuban reconcentrado upon the island of Cuba than be an American Senator and not proclaim the independence and freedom of the brave young Cuban Republic. I would proclaim it with a thought and a prayer in my heart, the one the sententious utterance of Thomas Jefferson, who, in a few words, has summed up all free constitutions, who, in a sentence, has written all declarations of independence, who has proclaimed to the world that "liberty is the gift of God." And as the United States makes that declaration for poor Cuba as she recognizes the youngest heir in the files of time that comes to its God-given inheritance, my heart would lift to heaven with the aspiration of Abraham Lincoln, "I would that all men everywhere might be free." [Applause in the galleries.]

Henry M. Teller (Colorado) spoke on the report of the committee.

Mr. President, I am loath to criticize a committee. I believe that this report, written with great vigor and with great intelligence and indicative of great learning, would have justified the a condition of affairs exists there that we are in duty bound to remove the cause of complaint.

Mr. President, I want the Senate, before we conclude this debate, to say to the world in the most emphatic manner possible that we do not intend in any way or manner to derive benefit from this intervention. Spain is too weak and too poor to pay indemnity. I want the Senate to say that we do not intend to take that island; that whatever we may do as to some other islands, as to this island, the great bone of contention, we do not intend to take it from the legally constituted authorities of the island as now established.

At the proper time, if no one else does so, I propose to offer some amendment to the joint resolution that shall make it clear to the world that it shall not be said by any European government, when we go out to make battle for the liberty and freedom of Cuban patriots, that we are doing it for the purpose of aggrandizement for ourselves or the increasing of our territorial holdings.

If war comes I would make it so severe that the flag of Spain would be driven from every holding of hers on the face of the earth except the little country she occupies in Europe, and I would say to the allied powers, if they raised a question of intervention on our part, "We will fight the world in arms in defence of the right of the American people to control the affairs in the Western Hemisphere as they think they ought to be controlled." All you need to do is to say it, say it with our Anglo-Saxon vigor, say it with American pluck back of it, say it with 75,000,000 of united people, with the greatest wealth in the world back of them, and the world will stand and consider and they will not put their hand upon us. [Applause from the galleries.]

The resolutions came to a vote in the Senate on April 16. David Turpie (Indiana), following the suggestion of Senator Teller, moved to amend the first resolution so as to read:

That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent, and that the Government of the United States hereby recognizes the Republic of Cuba as the true and lawful government of that island.¹

committee in saying, in view of what we have declared, "Congress should recognize the independence of the Republic of Cuba." I believe that that was the first intention of the committee, and that is all I think perhaps I ought to say with reference to it, except that I regret the committee did not come here with a resolution in accordance with the declaration they made of the state of facts which we all know exists.

Now, I wish to take a moment, and only a moment, for I do not intend to detain the Senate at any length with my remarks, to call attention first to the joint resolution reported by the committee:

That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

That is a proposition to which I agree. They can not be free and independent without an organization. With all deference to the committee, when they come here and talk to me about the independence of the people of Cuba they stultify themselves and, in fact, declare if independence exists there at all there must be a government, for it can only exist under an organized government of some character or kind.

As I said before, if the facts are as stated in the joint resolution, the joint resolution as reported should be amended as proposed by the minority, and we should insert, after the word "independent," "and that the Government of the United States hereby recognizes the Republic of Cuba as the true and lawful government of that island." I shall vote for the minority amendment. I shall vote for it with the feeling that it will afford relief to the Cubans and that it will save us from much embarrassment in our dealing with this question.

I do not deny the right of the Government of the United States to intervene there with or without reference to the Republic of Cuba, if it exists. As long as Spain denies that it exists and continues her controversy and contest, the Government of the United States may, in the interest of humanity or in the interest of her own people, intervene; but we must intervene, if intervene we do, with a declaration to the world that we are not making, under the pretence of intervention, a war of conquest, that we are not after the island. For the outrage committed upon us, if Spain blew up our ship, we may go to war; we may declare that a state of war exists. That is the first movement. But intervention is not to save our rights or redress our wrongs. Intervention is justified only when such

This was agreed to by a vote of 515 to 37. Senator Davis then moved to add a fourth resolution:

That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

This was agreed to without dissent. The resolutions as amended were passed by a vote of 67 to 21.

Senator Davis then began to move the substitution, seriatim, of these resolutions for resolutions which had just come to the Senate after passage by the House. Upon objection by several Senators that this procedure was not according to parliamentary usage, nor courteous to the House, which had the right to concur in the Senate's intention before this was definitely resolved upon, Senator Davis withdrew his motion.

CUBAN INDEPENDENCE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 13-17, 1898

On April 13 Robert Adams, Jr. (Pennsylvania), of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which had been referred numerous resolutions on the subject of Cuban independence, presented to the House the following joint resolution as the report of the majority of the committee:

Whereas, the Government of Spain for three years past has been waging war on the island of Cuba against a revolution by the inhabitants thereof, without making any substantial progress toward the suppression of said revolution, and has conducted the warfare in a manner contrary to the laws of nations, by methods inhuman and uncivilized, causing the death by starvation of more than 200,000 innocent non-combatants, the victims being for the most part helpless women and children, inflicting intolerable injury to the commercial interests of the United States, involving the destruction of the lives and property of many of our citizens, entailing the expenditure of millions of money in patrolling our coasts and policing the high seas in order to maintain our neutrality, and

Whereas this long series of losses, injuries, and burdens for which Spain is responsible has culminated in the destruction of the United States battleship Maine in the harbor of Havana and in the death of 260 of our seamen;

Resolved, That the President is hereby authorized and directed to intervene at once to stop the war in Cuba, to the end and with the purpose of securing permanent peace and order there and establishing by the free action of the people thereof a stable and independent government of their own in the island of Cuba. And the President is hereby authorized and empowered to use the land and naval forces of the United States to execute the purpose of this resolution.

The minority resolutions were then read:

Section 1. That the United States Government hereby recognizes the independence of the Republic of Cuba.

[Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Sec. 2. That, moved thereto by many considerations of humanity, of interest, and of provocation, among which are the deliberate mooring of our battleship, the Maine, over a submarine mine and its destruction in the harbor of Havana, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to employ immediately the land and naval forces of the United States in aiding the Republic of Cuba to maintain the independence hereby recognized.

[Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Sec. 3. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to extend immediate relief to the starving people of Cuba.

After some determined opposition Hugh A. Dinsmore (Arkansas) succeeded in presenting the report of the minority on its resolutions. This speech is notable for an attack on President McKinley.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Grosvenor], being the friend of the President and supposed to voice his sentiments, says that the President of the United States is in favor of the independence of Cuba. Did he demand of Spain the independence of Cuba? Oh, no; we were made to believe so, but he did not. His minister told the Spanish Cabinet that the President did not demand independence. His Attorney-General,¹ it seems, thought that "stable" was the diplomatic word for independence, and in his message to Congress the President, now do not fulfill those obligations. It would be impossible for our Government to recognize the insurgents in Cuba. The very fact that, if you wish to send an envoy there, you would have to send him by force through the Spanish lines, or you would have to land him on a beach, the same as the insurgents and filibusters have to land their munitions in that country, is enough to show that they have not standing for recognition.

They have not that stable government which is entitled to recognition. They have not power to carry on civil government. They have no capital or permanently located seat of government. They have not a single port in their possession. They have not a single ship on the high seas. They have not a government under civil authority that can enforce its laws.

They are surrounded entirely by the Spanish army. And it is a principle of international law which will not be disputed by any man who knows anything on that subject that until the parent country has practically ceased to enforce its government against the rebellious subjects, no other nation can give the insurgents recognition as a government, because they do not have it as a matter of fact. No man can question that principle of international law. We have fully committed ourselves to it as a nation. No South American republic was recognized by us until years after Spain had yielded all active effort to subdue it.

What is the condition in the island of Cuba to-day? Spain has a large army there. She occupies every seaport. She is still endeavoring to enforce her authority over that island. For this reason the Executive of this country and the Republican members of the Foreign Affairs Committee can not bring themselves to falsify the diplomatic history of our country and place themselves in a position antagonistic to the recognized principles of international law, for the country that dares to do this puts itself beyond the pale of the great family of civilized nations.

Mr. Speaker, having thus stated some of the reasons which actuated the majority of the Foreign Affairs Committee in adopting the action embodied in the pending resolution, let me say a word in conclusion. We stand, as I believe, in one of the greatest and most momentous eras in the history of our country; and as an American representative I want to make a strong appeal to the men of this House without respect to party. When the roll is called and the demand is made upon them to defend American honor and American rights, which have been assailed by the Spanish nation, I ask that one and all rise in their places and cast their votes to show the world, as we did a few weeks ago, that however we may differ upon matters of detail, we are to be consistent with his demands upon Spain, only asks that a stable government be given to the Cubans. Oh, the pity of it! Oh, the humiliation to all true Americans! Long and anxiously in this House have we waited for some message or expression from the President of the United States conveying to our anxious ears the glad news that he believed in the independence of Cuba. When did it come? He sent us the message which was read in the hearing of all the members of this House. Notwithstanding the statements which have been made in trying to bolster up that document since, you all know how it fell like a wet blanket upon that side of the House, upon the patriotic men over there whose hearts bled for the suffering Cubans, struggling for the liberties that every American believes every God-born individual has a right to possess.

We offer to you and to the country our substitute for your resolution, and appeal to the wisdom, patriotism, and judgment of our fellow-citizens, and for the rectitude of our intentions, the integrity of our purpose, the justice of our position, to that higher court which must pass upon the actions of all men and all nations,

Our fathers' God, from out whose hand
The centuries fall like grains of sand.

Mr. Adams supported the majority resolutions.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas as to why we do not recognize the present legislative government of Cuba. Mr. Speaker, our country must proceed in order, under the rules of international law, if we wish to preserve our standing among the nations of the earth. Our President has pursued a consistent course. As soon as he entered the executive chair he made propositions to Spain, all of which have been granted. He had not been in office sixty days until every American citizen, native born, or those bearing the official stamp of our courts, was set free to breathe that air of freedom which God meant we should enjoy.

The alleged Republic of Cuba has my sympathy. I believe that the men who have struggled so long to obtain their freedom are entitled to our sympathy, and, if possible, to our recognition. But they must first have a standing, such standing under international law as will justify the executive department of our Government in giving such recognition. The conditions

Americans one and all and that politics cease at the seacoast. [Loud applause.]

A motion to substitute the minority for the majority resolutions was voted down: yeas, 150; nays, 190. The majority resolutions were then passed by a vote of 325 to 19.

The first conference between the two Chambers on the subject ended in a disagreement, and a second was appointed. The joint committee made its report on April 18. It presented the following resolutions:

First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination when that is accomplished to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

The Senate agreed to the report by a vote of 42 to 35, and the House by a vote of 311 to 6. The President approved the resolution on April 20.

War with Spain followed this declaration. At its close, by the Treaty of Paris, December 10, 1898, Spain relinquished the sovereignty of Cuba, and the United States took temporary possession of the island, assuming all the international obligations arising therefrom. In December, 1901, the Cuban people elected Estrada Palma as President under a Republican constitution, and on May 20, 1902, the United States formally withdrew from the island.

CHAPTER V

THE ANNEXATION OF HAWAII

The Hawaiian Revolution—The Republic Asks for Annexation to the United States—Francis G. Newlands [Nev.] Introduces in the House Joint Resolution to Annex Hawaii—Debate: in Favor, Robert R. Hitt [Ill.], James A. Tawney [Minn.], Joseph H. Walker [Mass.], William Sulzer [N. Y.], Jonathan P. Dolliver [Ia.], William P. Hepburn [Ia.]; Opposed, Hugh A. Dinsmore [Ark.], Champ Clark [Mo.], John W. Gaines [Tenn.], Henry U. Johnson [Ind.]; Resolution Is Passed—Debate in the Senate: in Favor, George F. Hoar [Mass.]; Opposed, Justin S. Morrill [Vt.], Augustus O. Bacon [Ga.], William B. Bates [Tenn.]; Annexation Is Enacted.

ON February 12, 1874, a few days after the death of the childless King, Lunalilo, the Hawaiian legislature chose David Kalakaua as King. This was against the direct opposition of Emma, the Queen Dowager, whose partisans raised a riot in Honolulu which was quelled only by marines and sailors landing from British and American ships in the harbor. In appreciation of the American assistance King Kalakaua visited this country during the same year. Largely as a result of this visit a treaty of reciprocity was negotiated during the next year between Hawaii and the United States. It was renewed in 1887.

As time passed the King gave way more and more to the reactionary impulse common to Hawaiian monarchs, until on January 30, 1887, the party of progress, led by persons of American blood (many descended from early missionaries), held a mass meeting in Honolulu at which they demanded from the King a new constitution with guaranties of better government, such as the placing of the Cabinet under the control of the legislature. The constitution being ratified by the people, the King reluctantly signed it. Then, en-success of the revolution. The royal party, taking heart from this report, began to treat with the United States Government for the restoration of the Queen, but her refusal to grant a general amnesty to the revolutionists stopped all the negotiations.

Thus thrown upon their own resources the Hawaiian provisional government on July 4, 1894, declared Hawaii a republic, and organized it as such, with Sanford B. Dole as President, and with a legislature of two chambers.

THE CHAMPION MASHER OF THE UNIVERSE
By Victor Gillam in "Judge"

When the Republican party in the United States came into power again in 1897 after the Presidential campaign of 1896 in which the Republicans had denounced the course of President Cleveland and his party on the Hawaiian question, the Dole administration renewed the negotiations for annexation, and a treaty was made by President McKinley, which was ratified by the Hawaiian Senate, though not by the American.

The destruction of the Spanish fleet in Manila bay by Commodore George Dewey on May 1, 1898, caused a renewed interest in the annexation of Hawaii, the "half way place" to the Orient.

couraged by his sister, Liliuokalani, he schemed to regain his former power, and in 1889 attempted by force to overthrow the new constitutional government. His adherents were defeated in the skirmish which ensued.

On January 20, 1891, Kalakaua died in San Francisco, and was succeeded by Liliuokalani, who tried to continue his reactionary policy. Two years later, learning that she was about to attempt to overthrow the constitutional government by another revolution, the progressives formed a Committee of Thirteen to protect the constitution. On January 15, 1893, this committee passed a resolution advising abolition of the monarchy and application to the United States for annexation, and constituted itself a provisional government. The progressives openly preparing to effect their purposes by force, the Queen's ministers appealed to the foreign legations for the protection of Her Majesty's Government.

Not for this purpose, but to protect American interests, the American minister, John L. Stevens, had a force of marines and sailors landed in Honolulu from the U. S. S. Boston in the harbor. Holding that the provisional government was the government de facto, he recognized it on the part of the United States, and, in order to sustain it in this critical stage, on his own responsibility on February 16 declared it under the protection of our Government.

In the meantime Hawaiian commissioners had set out for Washington, D. C., to negotiate the treaty of annexation. A few days before his term expired President Harrison submitted to Congress such a treaty, but upon the accession of President Cleveland, largely by the influence of the new Executive, the treaty was withdrawn and Minister Stevens' actions were disavowed, a special commissioner, Albert Sydney Willis [Kentucky], being sent to Honolulu for the purpose. Another special commissioner, James Blount [Georgia], was sent to Honolulu to report on the situation.

Mr. Blount reported that the minister's actions had been unwarranted—indeed, that the landing of the American marines had been the deciding factor in the

GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

On May 4 Francis G. Newlands (Nevada) introduced in the House a joint resolution to annex Hawaii to the United States. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. On May 17 Robert R. Hitt (Illinois), chairman of the committee, reported the resolution without amendment accompanied by a report of the majority of the committee. Hugh A. Dinsmore (Arkansas) presented the minority report.

The subject came up for discussion on June 11.

ANNEXATION OF HAWAII

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JUNE 11-JULY 6, 1898

Mr. Hitt stated that the measure was substantially the same as the treaty of the previous year, as well as the treaty of 1893.

This is not a novel question at all. It is not an emergency proposition sprung upon us suddenly. It is not a case of greed for territory and overweening influence brought to bear by a great and powerful government upon one of the smallest in the world to constrain it to give up its independent existence and be absorbed by the other under the form of a legal proceeding. There is no oppression on our side, there is no unwillingness on the other side.

It is in pursuance of a policy long discussed and well known there and to our people here and to all the world. It is a result often contemplated by the successive governments of those islands for fifty years, because the circumstances surrounding the little nation in all the changes in its history have plainly made this a foregone conclusion. So slender, so tottering a political existence in the midst of the mighty political powers of the world had a precarious tenure of life. It was a continual temptation to them—an all-important possession of a weak power. It has often been threatened. Several times it has been seized and occupied by a passing commander of a frigate—by a French captain in 1829, by a British commander in 1843, again by the French in 1849.

Conscious of its feeble ability to maintain independence among the nations, the subject of union with our country has been contemplated long. One of the kings of Hawaii executed a deed of cession to the United States in 1851. Another of the kings prepared a draft of a treaty of annexation to the United States in 1854, but before it was executed he died. It is the natural result of events and causes long operating and now concluding with mutual, cordial consent.

Therefore the only question we have to consider, when this little commonwealth with open hands offers itself to us, is whether the possession of these islands is of any value to us or not.

Other nations have long since expressed their opinion of the value of the islands in many ways. Though it is a very small nationality, a very small extent of the earth's surface, not equal in people to a Congressional district represented on this floor, yet nineteen nations continually maintain representatives at Honolulu to watch their interests. We keep there to-day an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. Why? Not because they are fertile and beautiful islands, not because there are a little over a hundred thousand people there. No; it is because of the supreme importance and value of the islands on account of their position.

They sit facing our Western coast—that long stretch confronting the great Pacific Ocean, the most extensive body of water in the world, stretching away for six, seven, eight thousand miles—and they are the nearest point to our coast, and far, very far, removed from any other point in that vast sea. They are 2,000 miles away from us. That seems a very considerable distance, but the immense stretch beyond them to the other portions of the earth is so much greater that they seem comparatively near and are a part of our own system.

With the great change in the construction of fighting ships, all of which are now moved by steam, coal has become an essential of maritime war, as much so as powder or guns, and across that wide ocean any vessel of war coming to attack the United States must stop for coal and supplies at the Hawaiian Islands before it can attack us. No ship can be constructed, no battleship exists in the world, which can make the trip from the other side of that wide sea to our shores, conduct any operation of hostility against us, and ever get back unless it has its supply of coal renewed.

We have on this critical and central question, the opinions of the most distinguished, specially expert, and able men of the age, the greatest commanders of our armies and our fleets who are living—Admiral Walker and Captain Mahan and General Schofield, Admiral Belknap, General Alexander, and Admiral Dupont and Chief Engineer Melville. It is an impressive and convincing fact that all have given the same opinion. Everyone has stated that the possession of those islands was to

Admiral Dupont, in a report made as long ago as 1851, expressed his view in these words:

Should circumstances ever place the Sandwich Islands in our hands, they would prove the most important acquisition we could make in the whole Pacific Ocean—an acquisition intimately connected with our commercial and naval supremacy in those seas.

For a war of defence the Hawaiian Islands are to us inestimably important, most essential. We have fleets and strong land forces and coast defences on the east. We have comparatively slender preparations on the west coast. There is not anywhere on the east a group of islands of such cardinal and unique importance as the Sandwich Islands—not even the Bermudas.

Not only in defensive war but in war of any kind they are necessary to us. In the events of the hour we have an illustration of the importance and the military necessity of possessing those islands. The present war was begun for the declared purpose of expelling Spain from Cuba and liberating the struggling people of that island; but once involved in war, it is the duty of the President, who is commander of the army and navy, to strike at Spain wherever he can effectively; and a great and successful blow was struck in Manila by gallant Admiral Dewey and his fleet. [Applause.]

There is no one in our country so recreant to his duty as an American that he would refuse to support the President in succoring Dewey after his magnificent victory, lying in Manila Bay, holding in control the Spanish power there, but unable to land for want of reinforcements and surrounded by millions of Spanish subjects. Yet it is not possible to send support to Dewey to-day without taking on coal and supplies at Honolulu in the Hawaiian Islands—a neutral power.

By the law of nations, that power is bound to refuse to allow ships engaged in war to take on supplies or stay in port over twenty-four hours and is liable for all damages to Spanish interests caused by allowing the rules of neutrality in war to be violated by us. We are strong; Hawaii is weak. We absolutely must use that port, and do use it.

While we have been giving notice to the great powers of France, Germany, and Great Britain that war was existing and calling their attention to their duty as neutral powers, in order that they might issue neutrality proclamations, we came on the west to the little Republic of Hawaii, and without a word of courtesy or request took possession of all we cared to take, us of great importance, many of them say indispensable; that it will diminish, not increase, the necessity for naval force, economize ships of war and not require more; that, in the possession of an enemy, if we shall so foolishly and unwisely act as to refuse annexation and permit them to pass into the hands of an enemy, they will furnish a secure base for active operations to harass and destroy the cities of our Western coast; that, in our possession, duly fortified, those islands will paralyze any fleet, however strong, however superior to our own naval force in the Pacific, before it can attack our coast. On one of the islands is Pearl Harbor, now unimproved, a possible stronghold and a refuge for a fleet, which, fortified by the expenditure of half a million dollars and garrisoned and aided by the militia of the island and its resources, can be made impregnable to any naval force, however large.

I speak of a naval force. To capture it there must be a land force also. The possession of all the islands was stated by those able men, who were before the committee, to be essential, as they would furnish a valuable militia to promptly co-operate with a garrison of one or two regiments of artillery until, in the short distance from our shore, we could reinforce them with abundant military strength to repel the assault of the disembarking troops, who must come many thousands of miles farther than our own.

General Schofield, who spent three months on the islands and made a careful survey of Pearl River Harbor, when asked whether it would be sufficient to have Pearl Harbor without the islands, stated to our committee that we ought to have the islands to hold the harbor; that if left free and neutral complications would arise with foreign nations, who would take advantage of a weak little republic with claims for damages enforced by war ships, as is frequently seen. If annexed, we would settle any dispute with a foreign nation; that we would be much stronger if we owned the islands as part of our territory, and would then also have the resources of the islands, which are so fertile, for military supplies; that, if we do not have the political control, they may become Japanese; and we would be surrounded by a hostile people.

Admiral Walker, who has had long experience in the waters of the Hawaiian Islands, emphatically confirmed the views of General Schofield, especially that it would cost far less to protect the Pacific coast with the Hawaiian Islands than without them; that it would be taking a point of advantage instead of giving it to your enemy.

in utter contempt of her neutrality, of our duties as a belligerent nation dealing with a neutral country, and in disregard of the heavy liabilities we forced upon Hawaii.

The rules of neutrality sprang from our suggestion. When the treaty of Washington was negotiated in this city in 1871, the United States presented and proposed three general rules which should be observed by a neutral nation and determine its liability. The English refused to assent to them in the language first proposed, and after long debate and modification at last those rules were put in due form, accepted, and solemnly placed in that famous treaty.

Under this treaty we collected $15,500,000 from Great Britain for depredations committed on our interests by ships that had been coaled or harbored in British ports. So for every damage done to Spanish interests by an American war ship which has been supplied, repaired, or coaled in the Sandwich Islands that government, the property of the people of those islands, is liable to pay to Spain the full amount of loss.

When this war is over and peace is declared, if the gentlemen opposed to this resolution prevail and prevent annexation and continue Hawaii's independent existence, if the liabilities of the islands on the claims of Spain against the Republic of Hawaii should be referred to arbitration, and the President of the United States should be one of the arbitrators, he would have to vote to compel them to pay the last cent, no matter how vast might be the burden of taxation it would impose on that little people.

Now, this is not a vague speculation. It is not merely hypothetical. The property owners in the island are alarmed. The foreign powers represented there are active. I hold in my hand a dispatch from our minister at Honolulu of May 10, a part of which I will read:

The strongest influence has been brought to bear upon the government urging it to proclaim neutrality, give notice to the Bennington to leave port, and invite the coöperation of other powers to protect the neutrality of the group.

But without any words from us or any assurance from our Government, notwithstanding the pressure to which it has been subjected, the brave little Hawaiian Government, loving America better than Spain and confident in the justice of the great American people as a child trusts its father, remains unchanged in its purpose. [Applause.]

only true American colony, the only spot on earth beyond our boundaries in the wide world where our country is preferred above all others? [Renewed applause.] That steadfast body of men, pressed and menaced by the influence of so many empires and kingdoms, threatening them with the danger that would follow if they permitted the American flag to stay in their harbor, remained constant in their devotion to the colors they loved and the people they always trusted.

These same resolute men drove a worthless Queen from the throne when she attempted to overthrow the constitution and destroy the guarantees of property—the woman who, when she talked with Minister Willis of restoration, wished one condition, that she might behead the Americans. I have no apology to make for men sprung from our blood who have borne themselves with such enlightenment, courage, and energy as these men have done [applause], whose only fault is that they love our flag more than their own. They love the flag under which many of them once fought. Some of them fought under another, the bonnie blue flag, during our great war; but at heart brave Americans all, they have united there to sustain the cause of the United States in this war with Spain, animated by a love of American institutions and love of liberty. They are men who can not be intimidated or turned aside from their purpose, men who have successfully resisted every influence to bring them under the control of other foreign governments or any domestic tyranny.

I said we had only the question of interest to consider here to-day, whether it would be advantageous to us to annex. Have we not also a high question of national honor?

While we are demanding the observance of neutrality by other nations, we disregard it ourselves. We are compelled to it by military necessity. What is the honorable solution? Annex Hawaii and end it all.

The minority propose that we should guarantee the independence of the islands, which, of course, perpetuates their neutrality and continues us in a position that we cannot longer endure. The gentlemen would put our Government in the dishonorable position of declaring and guaranteeing Hawaiian independence as a neutral nation at the very moment when we are disregarding their neutrality and independence.

They can not remain as they are. The future is threatening. Sagacious statesmen have long foreseen it.

Mr. Willis was sent to these islands by Mr. Cleveland to demand the overthrow of the republican government. We all them out in their demand over the whole Japanese population, laborers and all. That population was being poured in at a tremendous pace, sometimes 1,000 a week, and they would have soon overwhelmed everything on the island by sheer numbers. The Hawaiian Republic made its utmost endeavors to struggle against this flood. They protested, they denied any such interpretation of a treaty which concerned not laborers, but merely traders, such as came on trading voyages in that old time.

They demanded that only those should land who had permits by the convention of 1886. They adopted a police restriction against paupers, such as all governments have a right to make. The police regulations required every one who came to have $50. The immigration company in Japan was up to the exigency. They sent them still without permits and met the pauper restriction by a curious device. As the coolie left the vessel to go off, he was handed $50, which he took in one hand, and after he passed the inspector he handed it back to the Japanese agent; and so they sought to evade the restriction.

The Hawaiian Government would not submit to such proceedings. They arrested those without permits or bona fide money and turned back over 1,100 of them. The Japanese Government were in dead earnest by this time. The game was in sight. If they could once get these men in sufficient numbers there with the voting power they would soon turn the whole government into a Japanese commonwealth, and then they would quickly end the reciprocity treaty with the United States and all our special rights to Pearl Harbor or anything else. Japan sent a ship of war, which might well alarm them, and a high official with it, who demanded that the permit should not be required, and that they should be free to come in as voluntary immigrants without stint; that Hawaii had no right to inquire into the bona fide character of the fifty-dollar transaction, and presented a great claim for indemnity to those turned back.

The little republic held out stoutly and asked for arbitration. Japan said, "We will arbitrate; we will soon let you know exactly what we will do"; and the next month they said they would arbitrate all questions between the two countries except as to the bona fide character of the fifty-dollar transaction and the permit for immigration, nor would they arbitrate the treaty-construction question. In short, they were willing to refer to arbitration everything except the questions to be arbitrated. The horizon looked dark for Hawaii.

But at this point the little republic made a treaty of annexation with the United States, and Japan learned that they could recollect his dispatches. In one of them he mentioned that far the most threatening fact in the condition of the islands was the rapid growth of the Japanese element, and the purpose for which it was being sent there. There are over 24,000 Japanese on the island; 19,000 of them are men.

If they voted, it would be converted into a Japanese commonwealth immediately. This is not a light thing.

Over twelve years ago the planters, desirous of having other labor to diversify their Chinese and Portuguese labor, tried to have an additional supply from Japan. An arrangement was made, which was put into a convention in 1886, permitting the Japanese Immigration Company to send over Japanese laborers upon due authorization from the Hawaiian Government. These Japanese came at first in small numbers; but pretty soon they began to come faster, and the Japanese Government, which is directed by able statesmen, anxious to take advantage of all opportunities, made a demand that these Japanese subjects going there should have the same rights as the natives.

That startled the Hawaiian Government. The demand was ingeniously presented and energetically sustained. It might seem surprising that such a demand should be made. It was based upon an old treaty made by Japan in 1873 with one of the kings, which it was claimed granted to all Japanese forever the rights of the most favored nation. In truth, that treaty related only to traders and their privileges in the ports, and was so meant. It gave to Japanese liberty to come with ships and cargoes to ports where trade with other nations was permitted, where they might hire houses and warehouses and trade, enjoying the same privileges that were granted to other nations.

The sixth article provides that the treaty may be revised, on six months' notice, by mutual consent. As the Japanese did not purpose to give consent, by their way of doing business it would be perpetual.

However, the treaty did not amount to anything without finding a "favored nation." They found an old treaty, made way back in 1863, by one of the native kings with Spain, drawn apparently in very liberal terms, and meant to enable the traders to come and trade in the ports, which provided that they should "enjoy the same rights and privileges which are granted to natives."

So, by carrying over these privileges given to Spanish traders as such by a Kanaka king thirty-five years ago, and under which Spain had never thought of claiming the voting franchise, by distributing them to the Japanese traders in 1873 they spread not discuss the matter further with them, because they had made a treaty of annexation with the United States, which, by its very nature, would extinguish all other treaties. Even that did not stop Japan, and she made an earnest protest to the United States against the treaty of annexation. Our Government answered promptly that Japan was not concerned in it; that we could deal only with the Hawaiian Republic, and refused to consider the protest, and this in such terms that Japan formally withdrew it. But she has not withdrawn these claims, she has not withdrawn the demand against the Hawaiian Government of the right to pour in Japanese without permit, or the right to demand for all Japanese any privileges or rights of the natives, which would include the right to vote and hold office.

Now, suppose we reject this offer of the Hawaiian Republic to join our country and become part of us. They are then left an independent government, with no hope of joining us, and become responsible for their own international relations and must answer to Japan. If Japan should succeed in her contention as to the old treaty rights her people will vote and soon change the administration of affairs there. They would elect their own officials and government in Hawaii.

They could at once attack the reciprocity treaty with the United States. By the terms of that treaty either party may terminate it on twelve months' notice. Pearl Harbor is therein granted to us; that is, we have a right to enter the harbor to improve it and use it as a coaling and naval station.

We have never done any of these things. The entrance has not ever been opened. I tried vainly to have an appropriation made by Congress over a year ago to have the harbor opened and improved and our flag raised, in order to strengthen our title by possession, so that when the question of our tenure should come up we might have that point in our favor—an important point in any contention which might arise under international law. But since we have done nothing the case stands thus: The Pearl Harbor grant to us in the reciprocity treaty was in a new article, Article II, added when the treaty was renewed in 1887. After that amendment had been put on in the Senate, and before exchange of ratifications of the renewed reciprocity treaty thus modified, there was an exchange of official notes between Minister Carter, of the Hawaiian Islands, and Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State of the United States.

Mr. Carter stated that they wanted it distinctly understood that in assenting to the Senate provision in a reciprocity treaty granting to the United States the use of Pearl Harbor as a coaling station they did not propose any derogation of the sovereignty or jurisdiction of the Hawaiian Islands or any cession of territory whatever; that it was to be regarded as a privilege granted as compensation for the advantages they obtained by reciprocity, and that with the cessation of reciprocity the Pearl Harbor grant would cease.

JAMES A. TAWNEY [Minn.].—Is it not a fact that under that grant the Government of the United States obtains absolutely nothing except the use of the water—that we obtain no land at all for the purpose of utilizing the harbor as a coaling station?

MR. HITT.—As the honorable gentleman says, we get nothing but the use of the water in that grant.

The commercial value of the islands, the great interests that are to be promoted or are to languish, dependent upon our possession of the islands, which are the crossing place of almost all the lines of steamers in that sea, have been often discussed. We have a very large trade there, over $18,000,000 annually of late years, and increasing. Not only do we admit their unrefined sugar free to our country, but, under the reciprocity treaty, they admit our products free of duty, and last year we sold to them $6,800,000 worth of goods.

Of course, if the islands are diverted to other control—if that treaty terminates—we will rapidly lose their trade. At present they purchase from us three-fourths of all their imports. We have a great shipping trade there, American ships carrying nearly all the trade of the island. Honolulu is the only port in the world where American shipping is so greatly in the ascendant as to outnumber that of all other countries put together. Of the seven trans-Pacific steamship lines, six make Honolulu a way station. Shall we let it pass into rival or hostile control?

The population of the island, 109,000, is a mixed population. About half, or nearly half, are Asiatic—Chinese and Japanese. About twenty to twenty-five thousand are people of European or American origin—a good many Americans, a good many Germans, British, and a large number Portuguese and other nationalities. This Caucasian element is the strong intellectual and industrial force of the island. The Portuguese are people who have been there for some time. More than half of them were born on the island; were educated in the schools there, which are similar to the schools here, and those children speak English as an ordinary American child. After annexation the Asiatics would rapidly disappear in numbers under the operation of our laws and under the penal code of the islands, which would send back Chinese laborers very soon. The contract system would

MR. HITT.—This measure does not launch us upon any new policy. The importance of the question lies, first of all, in the necessity of possessing these islands for the defence of our Western shore, the protection and promotion of our commercial interests, and the welfare and security of our own country generally. Mr. Blaine stated it very well in a dispatch where he said the Panama Canal connecting our two shores, facilitating their defence and communication, was a purely American question, and that the possession of the Sandwich or Hawaiian Islands, giving them strategic control of the North Pacific, was one of purely American policy.

As to the further addition of a so-called inferior race to our population, with augmentation of our present political problems arising therefrom, I would say that the Hawaiian population is so small as to be inconsequential. It is not one seven-hundredth part of our population at home.

Something is said about the danger to our beet-sugar interests in this country from the competition of Hawaiian cane sugar after annexation coming in free of duty. There may well be some persons connected with the sugar-refining interest who are hostile to annexation; but the producers of beet sugar or unrefined sugar have nothing to apprehend. The total available natural cane lands in the islands do not amount to four townships of our land. They could not supply a tenth of what we consume. Besides, annexation will make no difference to the farmer here, as the raw or unrefined sugar of the Hawaiian Islands now comes in as free of duty under the Hawaiian reciprocity treaty as it would after annexation, and the only man who is affected is the refiner, who is protected now by the tariff against refined Hawaiian sugar. Refined sugar does not come in free under the treaty, and if annexation comes the refined sugar will come in free, and of course the refiners are hostile to it.

PATRICK HENRY [Miss.].—If we take these islands and annex them, have we to pay anything in the way of debts?

MR. HITT.—Well, they have assets and liabilities, the assets being twice as great as the liabilities. We take both when we take the government. There is a provision in the resolution that the debt shall not in any case exceed $4,000,000. The assets of the islands are given in the statement of the financial officer showing that they are nearly twice that.

The consideration of this measure has been long deferred. There has been so much discussion throughout the country, such manifest impatience for its consideration here, that at last there be terminated. The immigration from this country would no doubt increase.

In answer to an inquiry as to the prevalence of leprosy among the Hawaiians Mr. Hitt said:

There is little or no leprosy among them or any cleanly, highly civilized people anywhere.

I have seen little reason to believe that there would be any difficulty whatever in regard to any maladies save among those Asiatic elements and the Kanakas. There is leprosy, brought to the islands, it is said, by the Chinese. There is a vague impression, especially among Bible readers, who are very prevalent in this House [laughter], as to that word "leprosy" in descriptions of the islands, which is not correct as to the form of disease called leprosy as it exists in Hawaii, and which I have myself often seen in the Orient. It is not the loathsome, running disease mentioned so often in the Bible. It seems to be a paralysis and withering of the ears, fingers, etc., and they drop away painlessly. It is a malady that rarely affects people of the Caucasian race of the better class, who use an abundance of soap and water. It is not contagious in the ordinary sense. It is communicated only by long association and intercourse. The present vigorous, well-organized, well-arranged government of the islands has segregated it at Molokai. We, too, have had it in a sporadic way in our country for a long time and it is controlled. There is a leper colony in Louisiana and one in Canada. I will leave that question to experts.

In answer to an inquiry as to the number of American citizens in the islands Mr. Hitt said:

There are many people there of American origin, but they are Hawaiians, some of them sons and grandsons of men who went from the United States. But they are not American citizens, except partially, by a peculiar provision of their law, which allows men to retain a title to foreign citizenship. They are very strongly American at heart.

CHARLES K. WHEELER [Ky.].—There is one phase of the question that I think the House would hear with a great deal of interest, and that is the result and effect of annexation, not upon the commercial or military welfare of this country, but as a departure from the established customs of our country.

is a pretty clear perception by almost every one that the annexation resolution before us is in response and obedience to the demands of the whole country. Our votes in passing it will voice the earnest purpose of the American people; the conservative sentiment of the country is expressed by it, as a measure for the welfare, for the security and prosperity of the whole nation. Let us pass it and carry out the will of the American people. [Loud applause.]

MR. DINSMORE replied to Mr. Hitt. He said that the subject was of profound importance too great to be made a partisan one, as he feared this one would be made.

He confessed that before he had studied the question he had been in favor of annexation, but after his investigations he became firmly opposed to it.

I am opposed to it, in the first place, at this time, because I do not believe that we have any constitutional authority by the method proposed to us now to take them. Secondly, I think that, if we could do it lawfully, it is not desirable that we should do so for many reasons.

I do not believe that the ownership and possession of the Hawaiian Islands are essential to the United States, either as a permanent defence against war in time of peace or as a present war emergency. I frankly concede that their possession affords advantage—one advantage as against possession in the hands of a formidable hostile power—but that advantage is greatly exaggerated, and the evils that would result, in my judgment, outweigh this advantage. I do not believe that we have the power to take them to ourselves except as a State, and I do not believe that the people of these islands are suitable for citizenship of the United States. I am opposed to it because the people of Hawaii have not been consulted in the matter.

Annexation is but the first step that gentlemen ask us to take upon a policy which is strictly in conflict with every tradition of our Government and the prospect of its honorable success and prosperity. I noticed when I alluded to the Constitution there were smiles on some of the countenances of gentlemen in the House. I know it has become quite old-fashioned to talk about the Constitution. I know that in these degenerate days it is not considered up to date to talk about being governed and restrained by the Constitution of the United States.

It is not only the men at home who attempt by coöperation with a foreign enemy to break down and destroy the Constitution that are distinguished as domestic enemies; they, too, are enemies who, for any cause, in any way, attempt to nullify and render inoperative the provisions of the Constitution.

For a century and more this Government has grown from its small beginning until it has become the greatest of states. I would have it continue so, Mr. Speaker, not by enlarging its territory, but by strengthening it in its internal affairs; by strengthening our institutions at home; by building up patriotism in the hearts of the people; by conserving the public interest; by promoting all industrial methods, and, above all, by strengthening our unity, restricting extension from our compact form, thus keeping every part of the country in touch and sympathy with every other. While we have refrained from interference with foreign nations, we have prospered under the direction of those wholesome admonitions, the sage advice of the wise and patriotic who built the ship of state. We have avoided entangling alliances with foreign nations, while we have maintained peace, commerce, and honest friendship, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, with all.

I regret to see any part of our people desiring to depart from the ancient traditional policy of our Government. We adopted the Monroe Doctrine. That doctrine declared not only that we would resent and oppose, if necessary, any interference on the American continent by foreign powers or the upbuilding of monarchical institutions here, but there was on our part an undertaking in good faith to refrain from interference with the affairs of foreign countries.

If we acquire Hawaii it is but the first step in the progress of colonial aggrandizement. We all know it. I hear it every day, not only from uninformed and impulsive people at the hotels and on the street, but from dignified, sober, reflective members of Congress. The press teems with it. "We are going on!" "We are not going to stop at Hawaii!" "We will take the Philippines and Puerto Rico and the Canaries, and establish ourselves upon every Spanish possession on the seas!"

Newspapers, assuming to speak for the President, tell us from twice to thrice a week that he is anxious to get complete possession of Puerto Rico and the Philippines before Spain capitulates—that no overtures for peace will be entertained until these islands are reduced to our possession. Think of it! And this war was inaugurated for humanity's sake, with a distinct disavowal of motives of conquest! Who speaks of the suffering reconcentrados now, though suffering tenfold more than when porting these resolutions say that at any time in the future it is expected to admit them to statehood? What is the population? This "gallant little republic" that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, my colleague upon the committee, Mr. Hitt, referred to a while ago has 20 per cent. of white blood—European and American.

CHAMP CLARK [Mo.].—Let me suggest to my colleague that of that 20 per cent. 16 per cent. are Portuguese, from the Azores Islands.

MR. DINSMORE.—Forty-two per cent. of the population of the island are Mongolian, Chinese, and Japanese. Are you to take into full citizenship the Chinese whom your laws exclude from coming into this country? Are you going to confer upon them the immunities and privileges and sovereignty of American citizenship, when you say that they are not good enough even to come among us upon our own territory temporarily?

Nobody pretends any purpose to take the Hawaiian Islands into the Union as a State, but the purpose is simply and solely, so far as the contention goes, to acquire them for the purpose of assisting us in our military and commercial operations.

But they say that Texas furnishes a precedent. Texas never was annexed. They tried to annex it after the treaty failed, but Congress refused to annex. Resolutions somewhat akin to this were introduced in Congress, but Congress rejected them. What did they do? They passed a resolution of Congress looking to the introduction and admission of Texas into the Union as a State; when? After it had organized itself into a State, with a constitution republican in form, constructed by a convention of delegates selected by the people, and after that constitution had been submitted to and ratified by its people.

Now the consent of the people of Hawaii has never been received in any way. There is only the form of a dead treaty which was rejected or abandoned by the United States Senate after it was agreed to by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and the oligarchy in Hawaii, but which had not, and has never been, consented to by the people of the islands. It might as well be said, and far more justly, that a treaty signed by a plenipotentiary of the British Crown, ratified by a British Parliament, would impart the consent of the people of Canada to be annexed to the United States.

You must admit as a State. Such is the Constitution, and such is the precedent to which you refer.

Gentlemen say that Navassa was annexed; that all the guano islands were annexed. Are gentlemen familiar with the statute the war began? The public mind is diseased with the fever of war, judgment is fled to brutish beasts, and men have lost their reason. American blood is to be spilled, American treasure wasted, for acquisition of territory which, if permanently acquired, threatens the sacrifice of peace, the happiness of our people, the very life of our Republic.

It is against this policy that I protest, because I believe it is inimical to the interests of this great country, that it portends disaster to us as a nation.

It is denied by some that the annexation of Hawaii is in conflict with our policy in the past. They say that we have annexed territory before. But what I want to call attention to is the fact that no territory has ever been acquired into the possession of the United States by the method proposed in this resolution.

Under the Constitution Congress has the right to admit new States into the Union. Let me read from the decision of the Supreme Court in 19 Howard, the celebrated Dred Scott decision, which treats directly of this subject. In delivering the opinion of the court the learned Chief Justice Taney said, among other things:

There is certainly no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government to establish or maintain colonies bordering on the United States or at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure; nor to enlarge its territorial limits in any way except by the admission of new States. That power is plainly given; and if a new State is admitted it needs no further legislation by Congress, because the Constitution itself defines the relative powers and duties of the State and citizens of the State and the Federal Government. But no power is given to acquire territory to be held and governed permanently in that character.

In an "obiter dictum" in the same decision the learned chief justice says that:

The different departments of the government have recognized the right of the United States to acquire territory which, at the time, it is intended to admit as a new state into the Union.

Mr. Jefferson acquired Louisiana under this view, but by treaty confirmed by the Senate, and to become a State or several States.

Is that the question presented here? Is there anything in these resolutions of the majority proposing that Hawaii shall be admitted as a State into the Union? Would any gentleman have the temerity to stand up in this assembly and say that he would take it into the Union as a State? Do the committee re-by which those islands were taken into our possession for a time? They were not annexed.

Congress, in 1856, passed an act which said that where a citizen of the United States discovered an island in the sea, an island, rock, or key containing guano, an island uninhabited and not under the sovereignty of any other power, that that island should be considered as "appertaining to" the United States. Did you ever know of that word "appertaining" being used by anybody in good conscience, by any lawyer in the writing of a deed of conveyance, by any State, corporation, or individual attempting to set up title to property? How careful they seem to have been to avoid such language as would confer, upon the part of the United States, any sovereignty or ownership on those islands.

They should "appertain" to the United States, but for what purpose? Permanently? The statute does not say so. For the purpose of enabling the citizens of the United States to procure guano, after having entered into bonds to the United States Government that he would sell that guano to no other person than United States citizens, and at a fixed price, and Congress specifically declares in the act that the United States shall not be considered as bound to retain possession of the islands.

So much for precedents. Now as to the necessity for possessing the Hawaiian Islands for the defence of the United States and our commerce.

I mention parenthetically the remarks of one gentleman who spoke of the necessity of having our guns on the Hawaiian Islands to protect our trade when the Nicaraguan Canal shall be built. It was ridiculed by my versatile friend from Mississippi [John Sharp Williams], who remarked, "What guns they would have to be."

There is a better way now to Manila, in the Philippines, than by Hawaii. It is over 800 miles nearer, and has, midway, an island with good harborage, a good coaling station, and coal already there provided, within the jurisdiction and control of the United States. Gentlemen seem startled by this statement.

Let me tell them that the route from San Francisco, by way of Kiska, in the Aleutian Islands, and by way of Unalaska, where there is already a coaling station, to Yokohama and Hongkong and to Manila is over 800 miles nearer, according to the official maps made by the accredited scientific authorities of the United States, than by way of Honolulu. There is a harbor there more than a mile and a half long and a mile wide, enough to float all the navies of the world. There is deep water with a good anchorage, several fathoms of water throughout its whole area, enough at all points and more for vessels of the deepest draft; and not only so, but in an island 25 miles long, and right upon the shore is fresh water in abundance. The temperature never falls below 7 degrees above zero.

Then what need for a coaling station at Honolulu? Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely nothing in the annexationist coal theory, but, if it is necessary, we have the exclusive privilege already by treaty with Hawaii. That treaty provides that no other nation but the United States shall have the privilege even of entering Pearl Harbor, and we are given the right to do all things necessary to make it an efficient coaling and repair station, to the exclusion of every other power, even Hawaii herself, and that carries with it the right to strengthen and fortify it, to make of it a naval station with the armament to defend it. What more do we want than this?

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Hitt] says this treaty, according to its terms, may be terminated by either party to the treaty. So it may. But who will abrogate the treaty? Will the Hawaiians? Never, if we avail ourselves of the rights granted, because the Hawaiians know they have more to expect from us than from any other nation. But, says the gentleman, some other power or people may get control of the government in Hawaii, and they would terminate the treaty. An event the anticipation of which there is nothing to justify. The mere assertion of our purpose not to allow any other power to control Hawaii has been sufficient to prevent it for fifty years, and the world respects our wishes more to-day than ever before. They have regarded them because hitherto we have in good faith refrained from interference with foreign territory, while insisting upon the enforcement of the Monroe Doctrine with reference to European control in our hemisphere. If we depart from our honorable course we need not wonder if Europe ignores our contention.

Do gentlemen reflect that when in the hands of a foreign power, if it controlled Hawaii, ships could not come from Honolulu and attack our Western coast, because when they got to the United States they would not dare engage us in battle unless they knew that they could overcome us, because, if they do, their coal supply is exhausted at once, and they cannot get away? They will be as helpless and inoffensive as painted ships upon a painted ocean. I do not admit the correctness of the theory that possession of Hawaii will render us able to do with less military and naval establishment than is necessary without for so many years and enabled our people to build up their homes and to live happily with their families, to lie down at night restful and at their ease because no danger threatened, will be gone. She will desert us; and we shall never have a moment that we can confidently rely upon as a time of peace.

Mr. Speaker, it should be a matter of profound pride and gratification to every American to know that, in our compact form on this great continent, whenever the American heart throbs the blood goes bounding through the veins to every extremity of the great national body, as quickly and as responsively as the electric fluid flies from the touch of the operator's hand to the farthest end of the wire. And why so? Because we have not scattered possessions.

We are not a colonial nation; we have concentrated rather than diffused our power; we have a compact republican Government here, made strong by the union of States touching arm to arm; we have followed the policy laid down to us by our fathers and have avoided entangling alliances, and have respected and obeyed the Monroe Doctrine to such an extent that up to this good day, at least, not a nation in all the world has dared to plant her colors upon Hawaii and keep them there and call it her own.

Great Britain did it once. France did it once, but out of respect to the demands and wishes of America in the assertion of the Monroe Doctrine those colors were pulled down, and for more than fifty years the powers of the earth have respected our right there; and so long as we are decent and honest, and respect the principles and spirit of the Monroe Doctrine ourselves, they will continue to respect them. But, as Ex-Sen. Edmunds says practically, the moment we depart from it we may then begin to prepare for our defence.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that we shall be able to act in this matter as cool, deliberate, and patriotic statesmen. I hope that we may not yield to the feverish feelings of war which have taken possession of men's minds and hearts. Within the last two months we have seen men by the dozen, by the score, in this very body, change their opinion on this question.

The war fever has got into their blood, and they are about to do a foolish thing. It will be the greatest blunder in our national history. It is mere vanity, a desire to place ourselves alongside other nations who depend upon acquiring and holding territory abroad. We may take Manila; we may acquire Porto Rico; we may take the Canaries and set up our flag, our dominion, and our sovereignty. If we do, Mr. Speaker, we may expect to see it. A navy will be indispensable for protection of a station there, and just as strong a naval force will be necessary for defence of our coast as if we owned the islands and a naval station there.

We must keep ships of war there, because if we do not the navies of the world can go there and batter down our forts and disable our guns, as Admiral Sampson has just been doing in Santiago de Cuba.

But, in addition to that, we must keep ships upon our own coast. If we were at war with Great Britain she would not have to cross the Pacific; she has naval stations on the westward American coast. But from the Asiatic side they can avoid Hawaii, go around it, and come to our coast exactly as for weeks and weeks in the Caribbean Sea Admiral Cervera eluded the two fleets that were looking after and chasing him every day in the great trackless waste of waters. Vessels must come in sight before they can be engaged in combat. So that after all as a strategic point the Hawaiian Islands are not of so much consequence as gentlemen contend.

Mr. Speaker, what is the necessity for our entering upon a policy of annexation? We are engaged in war. For what purpose was this war inaugurated? What was the motive assigned for our action at the time when we made the demands upon Spain to which she did not accede? The motive was humanitarian. We said: "We will not tolerate right here at our doors a condition which we consider barbarous and inhuman, even though it is not upon our own soil; no civilized nation would tolerate the cruel persecution going on at the instance of Spain in the island of Cuba; and it must stop."

We disavowed any intention of aggression on our part. We disavowed any purpose to make Cuba a part of our territory or to exercise any sovereignty over it. In view of such declarations is it good faith upon our part to inaugurate such a policy with reference to Puerto Rico and the Canaries and the Philippines? I say it is unworthy of respectable manhood, and what is not respectable for man is not decent for a nation. [Applause.] And, even if it were, I contend it is contrary to the welfare and interest of our country.

What must we expect if we enter upon a colonial policy? Suppose we set our feet upon territory in the Orient. From that moment we become involved in every European controversy with reference to aggressions and the acquirement of territory there. No longer will our ancient peace abide with us. That angel which has extended her beneficent wings over our heads the disintegration of this giant Republic of ours, which nothing else, in my judgment, can accomplish. If you will take them, do it; but God help us! [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

MR. CLARK.—Annexationists appear to labor under the delusion that in the twinkling of an eye any sort of a human being, no matter how ignorant, vicious, or degraded, can be made worthy of American citizenship by a simple act of Congress. Not so, however. Fitness for that exalted privilege can be obtained only by having the right sort of natural qualifications to build on and then by being educated for centuries in the hard school of experience.

Confidence is said to be a plant of slow growth. So is human liberty. It is marvelous to remember at what a snail's pace, with what painful steps, we have advanced to self-government.

Magna Charta, Trial by Jury, the Bill of Rights, the Petition of Right, the Long Parliament, the Commonwealth, the Revolution of 1688, the Right of the Writ of Habeas Corpus, the American Revolution, the Declaration of Independence, the old Articles of Confederation, the Constitution of the United States—these are only the luminous mileposts on the long, tedious, hazardous, and triumphal road by which we have traveled to the proud position which we occupy at this hour.

Our institutions have indeed been purchased with a very great price; and yet we are about to imperil them by entering upon a vainglorious policy of imperial aggrandizement, gorgeous in appearance, but surely fatal in its effect, or all history is a lie.

Why do we desire to expand our territory? It is too large already. From the beginning of things the most perplexing questions of legislation, of government, and of politics have grown out of our abnormal size. The largeness of our territory, our wide diversity of soil, climate, employment, and interest, have always been the stumbling blocks to perfect unity. On this rock—when our area was insignificant compared with what it is now—the constitutional convention of 1787, with George Washington at its head, came near going to pieces. These things caused the most titanic civil war that the world ever saw. These things divide us here now into warring factions, for, loath as we are to admit it, our political differences are in the main founded on issues purely sectional or local.

Vastness of area, wealth of resources, variety of climate, abundance of navigable waters, multitudes of population—these alone are not all the necessary constituent elements from which a great, free, and enduring government must be built.

Russia has all these galore, and yet she is the veriest despotism on which the sun looks down.

Ages ago Sir William Jones stated the question and gave the answer in immortal verse:

What constitutes a state?
Not high-raised battlement or labor'd mound,
Thick wall or moated gate;
Not cities proud with spires and turrets crown'd;
Not bays and broad-arm'd ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starr'd and spangled courts,
Where low-brow'd baseness wafts perfume to pride
No! Men—high-minded men—
With pow'rs as far above dull brutes endued
In forest, brake, or den,
As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude;
Men who their duties know,
But know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain;
Prevent the long-aim'd blow
And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain.
These constitute a state;
And sovereign law, that state's collected will,
O'er thrones and globes elate,
Sits empress, crowning good, repressing ill.

What shall it profit us, even temporarily, to do this thing? The annexationists draw a picture of these islands in rosy hues, and tell a dullest story of the free homesteads awaiting us in that tropical region. We are to get the crown lands in return for this four millions we are now appropriating and for the other countless millions which we will expend in the future. As a matter of fact, the crown lands are absolutely worthless. Rest assured that the sugar barons have already secured titles to every foot of land of any value. The free homesteads to be carved out of the crown lands are a fake, pure and simple. All the crown lands which will ever be opened to homestead entry are too dry to till without irrigation and so high up in the air that irrigation is impossible.

Even if there are valuable crown lands which have never been broken to the plow and fertilized by water, they are not for our children and other white people of our breed, for the all-sufficient reason that they cannot endure outdoor work in that sultry climate. More farming lands there simply mean more Chinese cheap labor, more Chinese contract labor, more Chinese and Japanese slave labor, brought into our country to compete with our free white labor. Such an outrageous and iniquitous in the public press after it was edited carefully by some expert annexationist. By one of those curious coincidences that sometimes appear in human affairs the only portion of the general's evidence that was of any consequence or which could throw any light on the subject was eliminated from the press report. It was this, that on the entire coast of the Sandwich Islands there is but one harbor valuable for military or naval purposes or susceptible of being fortified. That is Pearl Harbor, and we already have that. What does this prove? It knocks the bottom clear out of the annexation scheme; it demonstrates that we do not need Hawaii even for strategic purposes, for, having Pearl Harbor, we possess all that portion of the islands that we need for strategic, military, or naval purposes without polluting and weakening our system of government by taking to our bosom a horde of Asiatic savages. Why, then, run the awful risk of beginning a policy of imperial aggrandizement and territorial expansion of which no prophet, not even General Grosvenor, can see the end or foretell the evil?

What is our patriotic duty, then? It is to hold Pearl Harbor and fortify it to the utmost. That removes all the dangers to our institutions. I am willing to vote every dollar necessary for that great work; and the fact that gentlemen will not accept that solution of the question is proof positive that their intention is to make the annexation of these islands the beginning of a general and extensive policy of territorial expansion.

And I warn gentlemen who solemnly aver that they are opposed to the policy of imperial aggrandizement, and yet who advocate this senseless scheme, that when some party in the days to come shall openly declare the whole program they will be estopped by this week's work from objecting. Now is the accepted time for killing this thing. This is the day of salvation.

We are told that we must have an island or we must perish. The jingoes here are as much fascinated by the prospect of having an island as was Sancho Panza. [Laughter.] It was his vision by day and his dream by night, and it brought him nothing but misfortune and unrest. Why this sudden and urgent necessity for an island?

It is said that we need it in case of foreign war, especially in case of a war with a great naval power. Is that true or not? Will we never learn anything from experience? How stands the record? We have waged three foreign wars, and come off victors in every one of them, without an island. In two of them we defeated England, the greatest sea power of the world, without an island to our name—once when we were only 3,000,000 strong, performance is forbidden by good morals, as well as by an exalted love of country.

But the annexationists have their plan like the nigger's con trap, "set to catch 'em gwine and comin'."

They at first gave it out that the reason we needed the islands was that we could then grow for ourselves all the sugar we wanted, representing that the cane-sugar industry out there was only in its infancy, and could be increased ad libitum. That statement so alarmed the sugar-beet enthusiasts that they howled so loud that the annexationists hauled in their horns on the sugar question and declared that they had been mistaken about that, and that what we really needed the islands for was to raise our own coffee, so that neither Spain nor any other nation could prevent us from having an abundance of that delightful tippie.

Within the last few days the nimble advocates of annexation have abandoned both sugar and coffee as reasons and have found a brand new one—Commodore Dewey's splendid victory at Manila! Since he performed that immortal deed without our owning these islands they say that it is absolutely necessary for us to buy them in order that we may send reinforcements to him. Suppose Dewey had lost that battle; what then? Do you not know that the annexationists would have been yelling at the top of their voices that we need these islands because of his defeat?

Now, if his great victory proves anything at all about these islands it is that we have no earthly use for them, for he could not have done any better if we had owned all the islands in all the seas. [Applause.]

We are told that we need these islands as a strategic base in military operations. All the admirals, rear-admirals, commodores, generals, colonels, majors, and captains say so. How does it happen, then, that we have gotten along splendidly for one hundred and nine years without these volcanic rocks? If we did not need them when we were only three millions strong, why are we likely to perish for want of them now that we are 75,000,000 souls? Have we grown weaker as we have multiplied in population? Certainly no jingo will have the hardihood to maintain a proposition so preposterous. And yet that is precisely the conclusion to which their logic inevitably leads—which is the reductio ad absurdum.

But we had before the Committee on Foreign Affairs certain illustrious witnesses to testify in favor of annexation, to enlighten the beclouded intellects of the minority, and to convert us from plain patriotism to wild jingoism. Among others was Lieut.-Gen. John M. Schofield. Part of his evidence appeared and again when we could muster only 12,000,000 men, women, and children, counting the slaves. The strangest part of this glorious history is that the ocean was the very place where we thrashed England the most soundly—without an island. Indeed, had it not been for our victories upon the water, and for that matchless achievement of the Iron Soldier of the Hermitage at Chalmette, we would not have been in strictly prime condition for crowing over the war of 1812.

I have a question which I wish to ask the mathematical jingo solely for information. If, with a handful of raw militia, Andrew Jackson in one hour killed 2,600 English soldiers—the picked veterans of the Peninsula—with a loss of only 7 killed and 8 wounded, without an island, what in heaven's name would he have done to them if he had only had an island? [Laughter and applause.]

There are four Territories which we Southwesterners are anxious to bring within the sisterhood of States—Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Indianola. They are kept out now most unjustly because they are liable to vote the Democratic ticket and cocksure to vote for the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

For fifty years New Mexico has been knocking at the doors of Congress, asking for Statehood, and she is still cooling her heels on the outside, notwithstanding the fact that she possesses all the constitutional qualifications, having a population greater than that of Nevada, Idaho, Montana, Utah, or Delaware.

What shall we think of the consistency of people who denounce these young mountain commonwealths as sage brush and rotten borough States, unfit to touch the immaculate skirts of prim, precise Massachusetts or to kiss the hem of the gorgeous garments of her imperial highness New York, and in the same breath propose to admit Hawaii, which is removed by 2,500 miles of ocean from our borders, and whose mongrel population consists of Hawaiians (pure and mixed), 39,504; Japanese, 25,407; Chinese, 21,616; Portuguese, 15,291; British, 2,250; Germans, 1,432; Americans, 3,080, including the largest and most repulsive collection of lepers beneath the sun?

O judgment! thou art fled to brutish beasts,
And men have lost their reason!

[Applause.]

Why is this monstrous proposition made? Let us be plain and state the truth though it shame the devil. This crime against free government is to be committed for three reasons:

1. Because some $5,000,000 of Hawaiian bonds have been sold in this country at about 30 cents on the dollar. We are asked to guarantee the payment of four millions of these bonds. The moment we annex the islands those bonds will soar to par and certain favored patriots possessed of inside information will reap a profit of 70 cents for every 30 cents invested, making a total of three and one-half millions—a very comfortable nest egg to have in the family.

2. There is a pressing necessity for two rotten borough Senators to eke out the single gold-standard majority at the other end of the Capitol.

3. But, above all, William McKinley will have sore need for the three electoral votes of Hawaii in the melancholy days of November in 1900, when he again faces at the polls the great tribune of the people, William Jennings Bryan, of Nebraska. [Applause.]

For these base and forbidden ends we are asked to do an act which will jeopardize the American Republic.

How can we justify either to ourselves or to our posterity the act we are about to commit? How can we endure our shame when a Chinese Senator from Hawaii, with his pigtail hanging down his back, with his pagan joss in his hand, shall rise from his curule chair and in pigeon English proceed to chop logic with George Frisbie Hoar or Henry Cabot Lodge? O tempora! O mores! [Laughter and applause.]

For more than a quarter of a century a persistent fight has been waged by the denizens of the Pacific Slope against the sublimated humanitarianism of the East to exclude Chinese immigrants from our shores. We supposed that we had finally settled the difficulty; but we are now coolly invited to stultify ourselves and undo the labor of many years by an act which will in one moment admit more Chinese into this country than the Chinese Six Companies of San Francisco would have imported in fifty years.

I press these questions home upon your minds and consciences: Are we ready to admit Chinese to citizenship? Are we willing that they shall have a voice in our affairs? Do we propose deliberately and absolutely without provocation to take that reckless leap into the dark? Do not a great many people believe that we have already gone too far in the attempt to assimilate all the peoples of the earth? Is not this question constantly asked: Is the American Republic endowed with the stomach of an ostrich that there is no limit to its digestive powers? Is there not a large, insistent, and growing sentiment in drink. The way to cultivate "peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations," which Jefferson enjoined upon us, and to have "entangling alliances with none," which was part of his creed, and also of Washington's, is to decline this glittering Hawaiian bauble.

All history proves that the passion for acquiring territory grows with what it feeds on.

The moment we go beyond low-water mark our feet take hold of national death. There is no limit to our foreign acquisitions except our own wisdom and our own moderation, for we are now strong enough to work our will among the nations of the earth.

The entire Western Hemisphere and all the islands of the adjacent seas are ours, if we desire to possess them. No human power can stay our arms. Had we been animated by the spirit of universal conquest the scream of our eagles would long since have resounded amid the Andes and the Cordilleras.

When Robert Lord Clive was impeached for plundering the East Indians of a princely fortune, while admitting that he had appropriated vast sums to his own uses, he exclaimed in a fine burst of indignation: "By God, at this moment I am astonished at my own moderation!"

All land grabbers, big and little, have heretofore been astonished at our moderation, but it has been our strength, our glory, our salvation.

And are we now to reverse the policy of a century—that policy which has made us the wonder of the world?

We are invited to take the first step in that primrose path of dalliance which leads to the eternal bonfire. And where will we stop?

No reason can be urged for annexing the Sandwich Islands which will not apply with equal force to the annexation of something else and everything else.

"The Pearl of the Pacific" is the beginning of the end. Then "the Gem of the Antilles," for, if we need an island in the Pacific, why not one also in the Atlantic?

Indeed that preëminent twister of the British lion's caudal appendage, Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, of Nahant [laughter], is not to be satisfied with the one island of Cuba in the West Indies, so he has introduced a bill to purchase the islands of St. Thomas, St. Croix, and St. John; and many here are talking of annexing Puerto Rico, the Philippines, the Canaries, and the Caroline Islands.

The jingo bacillus is indefatigable in its work. Every day or this country in favor of restricting even white immigration to the able-bodied, the virtuous, the intelligent?

But we will be told that it will be made unlawful for Hawaiian Chinese to come to America. Believe them not. It cannot be done. The American Congress on a historic occasion by a superhuman effort solemnly enacted that it could not be done. I plant myself on the doctrine of stare decisis and declare that we must not violate the precedents of nearly a hundred years. The pioneer Missouri State makers, though in their honored graves, are avenged at last. They placed a clause in their first constitution prohibiting free persons of color from coming from other States and settling in that imperial Commonwealth. Secession was loudly threatened by the Northern contingent in Congress if that clause were not eliminated. For two years Missouri was kept out, and finally, as a condition precedent to her entrance into the Union, Congress required that her legislature should by solemn ordinance declare that that clause should forever remain a dead letter, and it was so ordained.

Now, after seventy-seven years, in order to smuggle in a few volcanic rocks in mid ocean, and to endow the variegated inhabitants thereof with the invaluable privileges and immunities of American citizens—in order to protect them with the old flag and to gladden their hearts with a four-million appropriation—this Congress proposes to do the identical thing which it declared it an unpardonable sin for Missouri to do. Missouri did not exclude free persons of color. Neither can Congress keep out the Hawaiian Celestials.

Annexionists with one accord will pooh-poo the idea of danger to the Republic, and will solemnly asseverate that the acquisition of Hawaii does not presage further territorial expansion.

Believe them not, Mr. Speaker. Put not your faith in jingoism. Study that strange and intricate machine, the human heart. Consider the unconquerable Anglo-Saxon lust for land. Revolve in your mind whether greed has ever yet set limits to its possessions.

Review the whole history of the human race and tell us how many rulers have ever willingly alienated one foot of land over which they exercised dominion.

There is only one, and he shines forth a bright particular star among the sovereigns of the earth—the Emperor Adrian, who voluntarily relinquished vast territories, thereby setting bounds to the empire and preserving its life for centuries.

The way to remain sober is resolutely to refuse the first two some prophetic jingo, in the endeavor to excel all his tribe, proposes to annex the five seething, bubbling, eruptive Central American Republics. Jingoism appears to be more contagious than the measles, the smallpox, or the black plague, and let us fervently pray that it will not also prove more fatal. [Applause.]

That eminent publicist, orator, and author, Henry Watterston, has capped the climax of jingoism by proposing to annex Ireland. Somebody else asked "Marse Henry" why we should squander time and money annexing Ireland when we have already annexed the vast majority of the Irish?

One of my Missouri friends—a preacher in my church at that—

JOSEPH H. WALKER [Mass.].—What church is that?

MR. CLARK.—The Christian Church, vulgarly called the Campbellite.

HENRY U. JOHNSON [Ind.].—The fact that you are in communication with a preacher shows that antiannexionists are not outside the pale of salvation.

MR. CLARK (continuing).—wrote me last week to immortalize myself by proposing in this House to partition Spain, giving the largest slices to France and Portugal, with a piece around Gibraltar to England big enough to keep the British lion from roaring. You jingoes here are mere babes and sucklings beside my reverend brother from Missouri. You need to be fed on strong meat in huge chunks for a long time to bring you up to his exalted standard.

This whole annexation scheme reminds me of a game of cards, about which I know nothing [laughter], but of which I have heard a great deal, called draw poker—which has been solemnly adjudicated by a Nevada court to be a scientific performance and not a game of chance as popularly considered [laughter]—in which one of the most prominent features is "raising" your opponents until you "raise" them clear out of the game. Every jingo appears to be determined to "raise" all others in this bad and desperate game.

If we annex Hawaii and you, Mr. Speaker [Thomas B. Reed], should preside here twenty years hence, it may be that you will have a polyglot House, and it will be your painful duty to recognize "the gentleman from Patagonia," "the gentleman from Cuba," "the gentleman from Santo Domingo," "the gentleman from Corea," "the gentleman from Hongkong," "the gentleman from Fiji," "the gentleman from Greenland," or, with fear and trembling, "the gentleman from the Cannibal Islands," who will gaze upon you with watering mouth and gleaming teeth. [Great laughter and applause.]

In that stupendous day there will be a new officer within these historic walls, whose title will be "interpreter to the Speaker," for your ears will be assailed by speech in as many discordant voices as were heard at the confusion of tongues on the plain of Shinar at the foot of the unfinished Tower of Babel. [Applause.]

Let it not be forgotten that we went into this Spanish war on a solemn resolution, passed by both Houses of Congress and signed by the President, that we are not waging it for purposes of imperial aggrandizement or territorial expansion, but solely for love of humanity. It is not putting it too strong to say that that resolution raised us immeasurably in the eyes of all civilized nations, placed us on an unequaled pinnacle of glory, and made us many valuable friends in Europe.

Now, within six weeks of the passage of that lofty resolution, we are beginning to do precisely the reverse, putting ourselves here in Washington—a system utterly un-American in its character and contradictory of our entire theory of government?

We hear a vast deal of ecstatic talk about these leprous islands "falling into our laps," as if that were a reason for annexation. Are we such Simple Simons as to accept everything offered us? Because a hog with the cholera, or a sheep with the rot, or a horse with the glanders, or a dog with the rabies is given to us, by the same token we should annex him to our animal possessions and infect the whole lot with a loathsome and incurable disease.

We are to take them because, forsooth, they are given to us! That is the main argument for annexation, but even that is not the truth. Far from it. By these very resolutions we pay four millions for a starter. How many millions will finally go the same road Omiscience alone can tell. We are paying down cash on Mr. Dole's counter for these volcanic rocks nearly one-third as much as Thomas Jefferson paid for "the Louisiana Purchase."

No; it is not given to us. And if it were I would still say with the ancient poet, "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes"—Beware of the Greeks bearing gifts.

For whose benefit and behoof are we to do this preposterous thing? Not for ourselves or our children, surely; for Hawaii has a tropical climate, beneath whose burning, blistering sun no Anglo-American can work outdoors.

Why not learn something from the great historic and scientific fact—for fact it is, though it may be amazing—that Teutonic civilization and representative government are coextensive with the wheat belt? They are exotics in the Tropics, and will wither and perish there.

Who is back of this annexation scheme? Who has worked up a sentiment in its favor? Who has maintained a lobby here to labor for its success? Who has enlisted a portion of the public press, and caused it to question the patriotism and cast insinuations against the integrity of the men who have the courage, the wisdom, and the patriotism to fight this colossal job?

I was long since taught that it is a sound practice when trying to fix responsibility for a crime to search for the person or persons who would reap the greatest profit from its commission.

Applying that rule of common sense to this case, to what conclusion are we irresistibly led? To this: That the sugar kings of the Sandwich Islands are the chief promoters of the scheme, because they are easily the chief beneficiaries. Even the holders of Hawaiian bonds are not in it with them, because all the bonds in position to be charged with acting with Punic faith and dragging our country down from the high pedestal on which we placed her, thereby reducing her to the low and common level of the land-grabbers of the Old World.

Some of the other inevitable evils of annexation are an increase in our standing army; an increase in our navy; a vast increase in our taxes. Unless the American people have made up their minds deliberately to do those three things we have no right to saddle such a load upon their backs—a load which will go on augmenting year by year so long as the world shall stand. Most assuredly I refuse to be a party to such an outrage upon those who, in the last analysis, must foot the bills.

Mr. Clark then discussed what the status of Hawaii would be after annexation. It had been proposed, he said, to make it a county of California, but to this that State had strenuously objected.

If we annex the islands we must govern them some way. If not as a State, or a county of California, then what? Do we propose to resolve this day that we will hold the people of these islands in perpetual tutelage as a territory, by which term we have hitherto meant a State in embryo?

A perpetual chrysalis existence as a territory is repugnant to the genius of our institutions and out of harmony with our entire history. Home rule has been our policy from the beginning, and the chief boast of the younger Harrison's administration was that it relieved the people of six territories from the reproach and annoyances of territorial leading strings and conferred upon them the glory and dignity of statehood.

Again, I submit that these people are not fit to vote in territorial elections if they are unfit to vote in State elections, which they clearly are, even according to the standard of President Dole's little oligarchy; otherwise he would not have so revised the voting lists as to confine the suffrage to 2,800 persons out of a total population of 109,000 souls—that is to say, about one-seventh as many people are allowed to vote now as were permitted to vote under the monarchy.

If, however, these people are fit for neither a State nor a county, nor a territory, what form of government shall we give them? Crown colonies like the English? Or shall we send American proconsuls to plunder these unfortunate people as the Roman proconsuls plundered the ancient world or set up a system of satrapies to be controlled by the central Government ever issued by the Dole Government are not equal to the profits which the sugar kings will make out of annexation in each and every year henceforth and forever so long as they shall live, because annexation will make raw Hawaiian sugar come in free, and the sugar kings will pocket the tariff on the same, which amounts under the blessed Dingley bill to millions of dollars annually, and will grow as the Hawaiian sugar output increases, and is really a gift from us, which already exceeds $65,000,000.

But it will be answered that reciprocity already lets Hawaiian sugar in free, and therefore the kings have, and can have, no interest in annexation. Do not believe that for one moment, Mr. Speaker. The reciprocity treaty is a tiptop thing for the kings, but it is only temporary in its nature, and annexation would be a permanent blessing to them. I do not know much about stocks; I have had no experience with the ticker; but, mark my prediction, the moment annexation is an assured fact sugar stocks will soar skyward—a direction in which their owners will never go. To this low estate have we fallen at last that the sugar kings of the Sandwich Islands force us from the safe, wise, honorable policy of one hundred and nine years into a new, dubious, and untried policy which endangers our prosperity and is a menace to our very existence.

I would not be understood as asserting that members in advocating annexation are consciously influenced by the sugar kings or are in any manner corrupted by them. I am perfectly willing to admit that their motives are absolutely pure. Nevertheless, I believe that the sentiment in favor of annexation now, in the day of William McKinley, under the impulse of which members are rushing upon ills they know not of, is largely the work of the sugar kings, just as the sentiment favorable to annexation in the days of William L. Marcy was distinctively the creation of the propagandists of African slavery. As annexation was resisted and defeated by lovers of human freedom then, so it ought to be resisted and defeated by lovers of human freedom now.

To the Republicans who are shouting for annexation I commend the fine Shakespearean dictum, "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

The Republican party claims now—since emancipation has become popular and since the vote of our "Brother in Black" controls the elections in several close States—that it waged for four years a costly and bloody war to extirpate African slavery from this country. In 1861 the claim was that that awful war was for the preservation of the Union.

But if the Civil War was carried on to free the negroes, as is now claimed, how can Republicans justify themselves either in the forum of conscience or at the bar of public opinion for annexing the Sandwich Islands, thereby again grafting slavery onto the Republic? No man who has any reputation for veracity will jeopardize it by denying that coolie slavery does exist in the Sandwich Islands to-day as thoroughly as African slavery ever did exist in South Carolina or in Massachusetts up to the time when it was found to be unprofitable on that stern and rockbound coast. [Applause.] Furthermore, men of intelligence know that Chinese slavery is more brutal and more immoral than was African slavery in its worst estate, even in Massachusetts. It is a matter of common knowledge that Chinese men are sold into slavery, and that Chinese women are sold into and especially prepared by cruel surgical operations and physical mutilations for a species of slavery ten times worse than death itself.

Perhaps it may quicken the consciences, open the eyes, and dampen the ardor of certain jingoes here to know that organized labor is against this annexation scheme. This element, which justly looks to its own interests, and which is more and more every year finding ways to make its influence felt, opposes this Hawaiian job under the impulse of self-preservation, which has been wisely defined as "the first law of nature." The labor organizations of California, being nearest the scene, being at the point of earliest contact, and being the first who would suffer from competition with coolie slave labor, were very properly the first to sound the alarm. They were soon reinforced by an earnest protest from the American Federation of Labor, which demonstrates that workmen throughout the land sympathize with their imperiled brethren on the Pacific Slope.

The Federation places its strong resolution against annexation on the ground that it "would be tantamount to the admission of a slave State, the representatives of which would necessarily work and vote for the enslavement of labor in general."

The corner-stone of this Republic is the proposition enunciated by Thomas Jefferson, the chief priest, apostle, and prophet of constitutional liberty—"Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

If that proposition is not true, then the American Revolution was a monstrous crime; Washington, Warren, Montgomery, Greene, Marion, and all that band of heroes were turbulent traitors to King George III; and all the blood shed in our two wars with Great Britain was wanton and wicked waste.

interfering with our affairs—yes, always, till now, and even now make an exception only in favor of the Hawaiian plotters!

Did not Washington drive the impudent, meddling Genet, minister of the French Republic, out of the country at the risk of a war with France when we were a feeble folk?

Did not Mr. Secretary of State Daniel Webster's dark brow grow darker when he thought of the brave Kossuth haranguing our people on our affairs?

Did not our Government demand the recall of Minister Sackville-West for his impudent letter touching a presidential election? And did not his government, recognizing the justice of the demand, instantly recall him?

Was not the foolish and insulting letter of Minister Dupuy de Lôme about President McKinley and our people one of the things that irritated our people into demanding this war?

Why have not Thurston, Hatch, Dole, and all the rest been sent about their business and given plainly to understand that we need no instruction from them as to our duty or our interests? Surely this is an amazing performance.

We hear much of "manifest destiny." That is a charming phrase. It tickles the ears of men; it panders to human vanity; it feeds the lurid flames of our ambition; it whets the sword of conquest; it is an anodyne for the troubled conscience, but it lureth to destruction. At the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder. It is, however, no new doctrine. It is as old as the hills, "rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun." Years and years ago, stripped of all disguises and adornments, it was formulated by that eminent annexationist, Rob Roy, in this plain, blunt language:

The good old rule, the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.

Moses placed his veto on this convenient theory of "manifest destiny" when with inspired pen on tables of stone he wrote this stern command: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's lands."

"Manifest destiny" has been the specious plea of every robber and freebooter since the world began, and will continue to be until the elements shall melt with fervent heat.

It was "manifest destiny" which led Lot to overreach his uncle Abraham in selecting the rich lands of the valley, and you remember the weird story of Sodom and Gomorrah.

"Manifest destiny" led Philip's invincible son across the sea,

This annexation scheme is in flagrant violation of that basic principle of our Republic, for many thousand Hawaiians—more than the entire male adult population—have solemnly protested against the sale and delivery of their country to us by a little gang of adventurers who, claiming to be the whole thing, are offering to us a property of which they have robbed the rightful owners. And now America, which has been solemnly declared by the Supreme Court to be a Christian land, is to be made the receiver of these stolen Hawaiian goods.

But the jingoes tell us that this protest of the Hawaiians is all bogus, gotten up by designing knaves, and that the Hawaiians are falling over each other in their eagerness for annexation. If this is true, why not submit this annexation scheme to a popular vote in Hawaii, as was done in the case of Texas?

If a fair election on that proposition cannot be had, what assurance have we that fair elections can be had hereafter, if we annex these islands? If the Hawaiians are not fit to vote on a proposition of vital interest to themselves who will have the effrontery to say that they are fit to vote for all coming time on propositions of vital interest to us and to our posterity?

The propaganda which has been carried on openly in this city for the last five or six years by the agents of the Hawaiian sugar kings in favor of annexation is a disgrace to this Government and has lowered us in the eyes of ourselves and the rest of the world. It has no parallel in all history. Minister Hatch has lobbied for it. Ex-Minister Thurston has lobbied for it, and has written and sent a book in favor of it broadcast over the land, which book the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs made a part of its report. Other lesser personages have lobbied for it. These not succeeding, at last appeared President Sanford B. Dole, in all his bewhiskered glory.

What other government on earth would permit the agents of a foreign government to come into its very capital and openly interfere with its affairs? Suppose, when the arbitration treaty with England was pending in the Senate, Queen Victoria had come to Washington to lobby for its ratification. Such a howl would have gone up as would have startled the man in the moon, and it would have been a howl of righteous indignation. If Sanford B. Dole was not here to influence public opinion and the action of Congress, what was he here for? And why make his visit in January, at the precise time that his precious treaty of annexation was being debated in the secret sessions of the Senate and was a few votes short of the necessary two-thirds majority?

Have we not always been extremely jealous of foreign officials across the Granicus, even to farthest Ind, to build up an immense empire, which crumbled to pieces at his death.

"Manifest destiny" sent the Roman emperors to the burning sands of Africa, to the impenetrable forests of Gaul, to the inhospitable mountains of Asia, to the bottomless bogs of England, and at last put up the imperial crown for sale at auction to the highest bidder.

"Manifest destiny" caused Bajazet to desolate the fairest portions of Asia, and he ended by being hauled around in an iron cage as a ravening wild beast, which he was.

"Manifest destiny" impelled Mad Charles of Sweden to put all northern Europe to the sword until he met his Nemesis in Peter the Great at Pultowa.

"Manifest destiny" was Napoleon's gauzy justification for all the bones bleaching from Toulon to Mount St. Jean. He was always prating about his star; but it disappeared forever in the sunken road of Ohain, and he wandered from the stricken field "the immense somnambulist of a shattered dream."

"Manifest destiny" makes England the great bully of the world, oppressing the weak, toadying to the strong, laying up wrath against that day of wrath, that dies iræ, which is as sure to come for her as that a just God reigns on high.

Oh, yes! "Manifest destiny" is a seductive thing. It is the beautiful, the irresistible, the wicked Circe beckoning us on to our undoing. The entire pathway of man since the day when Adam was driven from Eden with flaming swords is black with the wrecks of nations who harkened to the siren song of "manifest destiny," and the epitaph upon whose tombstones is: "They were, but they are not."

Hitherto we have been the favorites of heaven; but let us not tempt fate too far or destiny will grow weary of partnership with us and dissolve it as she did with Napoleon at Waterloo.

Hawaii is the fly which will make our whole pot of ointment stink in the nostrils of the civilized world.

Let us put away this supreme temptation from before our faces, and generations yet unborn will bless us for this act of wisdom, self-abnegation, and patriotism.

Nature has set bounds to this magnificent Republic beyond which she should not go—the Atlantic on the east, the Gulf of Mexico and the Rio Grande on the south, the Pacific on the west, and in the fullness of time, without the expenditure of a dollar or the spilling of one drop of blood or the shedding of a single tear, the frozen ocean on the north.

Within those wide, extended limits we will live and grow and flourish, the happiest, the richest, the most puissant, the most intelligent, the securest people on the whole face of the earth.

But depart from the plan of justice, of wisdom, and of moderation, go chasing the ignis fatuus of "manifest destiny" over land and over sea, and some day Macaulay's artistic New Zealander, after finishing his picture of the ruins of St. Paul's, will sit on a broken arch of "the Long Bridge" and sketch the ruins of this Capitol. Before you consummate this monstrous folly I say to you, in the language of Galgacus to the ancient Britons, "Think of your forefathers; think of your posterity!" [Prolonged applause.]

MR. WALKER.—Mr. Speaker, I hope I shall be able to relieve the House from any effects which may have been produced by the lamentations of its Jeremiah. [Laughter.] In the discussion and decision of this question there is not the first element or purpose of territorial expansion. We enter upon the discussion and decision of this question of accepting Hawaii in precisely the same manner and upon the same principles that we would enter upon the discussion of the question of building a ship of our navy. It is within as narrow limits as that question. It is clearly a question of our national defence, our national duty, our national existence, in the position in which the great Former of the destiny of nations has placed us.

I have struggled against this decision. I have been opposed to the annexation of Hawaii until I heard the shot of the guns of Dewey at Manila; and then I awakened to the importance of this question to the great destiny, as I believe, of this nation. No man has a moral right in his power and strength in any community to shut himself up within his own selfish interest and advantage and there live, seeking what he may for himself and forgetting those about him. Nor has any nation such a right. It has no right to cut itself off from all the moral obligations that rest upon it to secure righteousness and maintain peace in the great community of nations.

I do not make any claim that it is our duty to right the wrongs of every people and of every nation under all circumstances, but I do say that it is the duty of this nation to take its proper place among the nations of the world, and that we stand verily guilty before God if we do not do our full duty in maintaining peace in the world. We are seeking Hawaii for peace.

The roots of all moral courage rest in physical courage. The power of moral courage, in the last analysis, rests in the physical courage of the man or the nation, and the certainty that moral hemisphere. Our sympathies are all with the people, with free institutions; they are all against monarchies, and with governments deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. The day is not far distant when a monarchical flag will not wave over an inch of territory on the Western Hemisphere or on the islands adjacent thereto. Jefferson's dream is coming true when this Western World, from Baffin's Bay to the Straits of Magellan, will be dedicated to freedom and to free institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. Sulzer denied that the annexation of Hawaii would be a departure from the Monroe Doctrine.

The Monroe Doctrine precludes foreign powers from acquiring additional territory on this hemisphere, but it surely does not prevent us from annexing contiguous territory essential to our own preservation.

On the 1st day of April, 1893, the American flag was hauled down at Honolulu. Five years afterward, under the same American flag, the booming guns of Dewey's battleships sounded a new note on the Pacific shores, a note that has been echoed and reëchoed around the world, and that note is that we are on the Pacific, that we are there to stay, and that we are there to protect our rights, promote our interests, and get our share of the trade and commerce of the opulent Orient. [Prolonged applause.]

The great powers of Europe are seeking new markets for their manufactured goods. They know that the markets of the world control the commercial destiny of nations. We must watch our rights and protect our interests in the Pacific. If we do not, I believe we will do the commercial interests in this country an irreparable injury. Our first step should be to annex Hawaii. That is the key to the whole situation. Our next step should be to build the Nicaragua Canal, and our third step should be to rebuild and reëstablish our merchant marine. Annex Hawaii, and all the others will follow like the day the night. Not to annex the islands now would be national folly; to annex them, security, peace, and national insurance. [Long applause.]

On June 15 Henry U. Johnson (Indiana), a Republican, opposed the bill. He maintained three propositions:

First. That the annexation of Hawaii to the United States is not necessary as a war measure in our conflict with Spain, courage will find exercise in physical courage and in physical action when duty calls. In order that we may have practical courage, physical courage, and moral courage we must have the means of legitimately exercising our physical power, else we are as weak as China when attacked by Japan. Where should we have been in this contest with the weak power of Spain ten years ago before we had developed a navy worthy of the name?

Mr. Speaker, I have become convinced that this nation, to maintain her self-respect and the respect of the nations and in the interest of peace, must have a navy as powerful as any nation in the world, ship for ship, man for man, fort for fort. [Applause.] We must have Hawaii as a part of our naval outfit. We must have the Nicaragua Canal as a part of our naval as well as mercantile outfit. [Applause.]

The time of our swaddling clothes has gone. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that we have attained to-day to a stature such as none of us dreamed we should ever reach in our day, or even in that of our immediate children. We cannot shirk its responsibilities. We cannot return again to the place of a physical pigmy or a moral dwarf. [Applause.]

On June 14 William Sulzer (New York) supported the bill. He declared that annexation was a good Democratic doctrine, every increase of national territory save Alaska having come under Democratic administrations. One Democratic President alone opposed the policy: Grover Cleveland hauled down the American flag in Hawaii, and attempted to restore the disgraced and degenerate monarchy.

I am glad he failed. I believed then, and I believe now, that his action in this case was the most unwise, the most impolitic, and the most unpatriotic thing he did during his administration. I know many Democrats stood by him in Congress then, and some of them who are here to-day no doubt take the stand they do because they dislike to stultify their records. I said then, as I say now, that it was a sad mistake. The American people are not in sympathy with any man who hauls down the American flag in favor of monarchy. [Applause.]

When the Hawaiian monarchy collapsed it fell like a rotten tree on the bank of a turbulent stream, quickly to be swept away and never to be restored. It is not democratic policy to restore a dead monarchy in the place of a live republic on this

Second. That the annexation of the island is not necessary in order to prevent it from falling into the hands of some other great power, to be used by it to menace and attack our coast.

(Third. That the annexation of Hawaii is of itself inherently wrong, and that it is the opening wedge which is designed to lead, and which will lead, to still further acquisitions of insulated foreign territory, and that such a policy is against the best interest of the country, and therefore ought not to be entered upon.

Mr. Speaker, this war with Spain furnishes simply a pretext for annexation, not a reason for it. Commodore Dewey, with his heroic sailors, has swept out of existence the only fleet which Spain had in Asiatic waters. His squadron lies unopposed in the harbor of Manila. That city is under the guns of his victorious fleet and is completely at his mercy. Is any man fool enough to believe that Spain dare send the only other squadron which she possesses, that which is designated as the Cadiz squadron and which is now maneuvering off the coast of Spain, to the Philippine Islands to relieve her forces there? The very moment she attempts it she leaves her own coast to be ravaged by the formidable fleet which we can with perfect ease and safety spare from our naval operations in the Caribbean Sea against Cuba and Puerto Rico. Nor is it possible to dispatch a Spanish army to the Philippines, for how can an army be sent without vessels of war to act as its convoy?

Mr. Speaker, it is admitted that we already possess a coaling station in the islands; that we have collected at Honolulu a large quantity of coal, and that, by permission of the Government of Hawaii, our war vessels and transports stop there and coal en route to the Orient. What more do we want there for war purposes?

It has been said that, if we do not annex these islands, when peace is declared between Spain and ourselves she will claim damages and collect them from these people for their violation of neutrality laws in our interest, and that she will punish them. All such talk, sir, is absurd. To assert that weak and impotent Spain can levy any damages against Hawaii or punish her because she has given us an opportunity to enter her ports and coal there during the existence of this war is simply ridiculous. Do gentlemen forget that the same fostering care upon our part that has maintained Hawaiian independence in the past will be exerted, if need be, to protect her hereafter, and that in the treaty of peace with Spain, a treaty that will be dictated by the United States, a clause can and will be inserted, if necessary, upon our demand, releasing all claims against the Hawaiian Government by the Madrid authorities for any aid she may have afforded us during the existence of hostilities?

If Spain desires to visit punishment on the Hawaiian people, we can defend them when they are independent as well as though they are annexed to our own soil. We can easily come to their rescue without the necessity of political union with them.

But, Mr. Speaker, the annexation of Hawaii is not the ultimatum of the annexationists. It is but the entering wedge. Permit this act to be done, and you gain an impetus which you will find it difficult to resist. Its avowed purpose, its natural tendency, its irresistible consequence means that we are to proceed still further in extending our possessions and in the acquisition of foreign territory in no wise contiguous to our soil.

Mr. Speaker, is there not grave danger that this holy crusade for liberty and the independence of Cuba is liable, after all, to end in a disgraceful scramble for spoils, a scramble as disgraceful as any that ever characterized the people of ancient Rome? Is there not a disposition here to commit the American people, suddenly and before they can have an opportunity for calm thought and reflection, to a policy which will inevitably result in their injury; and which they will condemn when they have the time to grasp it in all its aspects and weigh it in all its consequences? Are we not acting here for posterity as well as for ourselves?

Why is it that gentlemen rush with indecent haste to pass this resolution now? Why is it that they are absolutely unwilling even to submit it to the people to be discussed pro and con at the polls at the next election?

Sir, I insist that this proposition for annexation should be postponed until after the next election, when our constituents can have the advantage of the arguments which have been made, and to the end that we may then come back here as their representatives, fully advised as to their judgment, given upon due deliberation, prepared thereby to execute whatever may prove to be their will.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the masses of our countrymen favor this annexation. I do not accept the opinion of the Chief Executive as a just exposition of their views. Neither the clamor of certain of the press nor the demands of military and naval dignitaries should conclude them. But, even if the majority of our constituents are inclined to this measure, and distinction? In times of profound peace, when our army and navy are small, and we have no colonial possessions to garrison, Othello's occupation is gone, and the opportunities for promotion are few and far between.

One does not have to be a graduate of West Point or Annapolis to be able to read the pages of history aright and to draw from them accurate and useful lessons as to the effect of territorial and provincial holdings upon the destiny of nations. Our military and naval officers may declare until they are red in the face, as they did before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that we will require a less navy instead of a greater one after we have annexed Hawaii, and you and I are at liberty to believe it or not, as we see fit.

But to get back to the point at issue. It is claimed that if we do not annex Hawaii its people will voluntarily transfer the island to some other power. Mr. Speaker, I deny it. Never have the people of Hawaii manifested the least inclination to join their fortunes to that of any other nation on earth than ours. They have vigorously resisted at all times any suggestion of foreign domination by other countries. Their trade has uniformly been with us. They have had no inclination whatever toward the great nations of the Old World, from whom they are separated by thousands of miles of water.

For years their absolute independence has been guaranteed by the United States and by a joint treaty entered into between England and France. Are we to believe, then, that just at this time, when no nation is moving against them, when the treaty between England and France is still in force, and when we, stronger and greater than ever before, are still guaranteeing their freedom, they will consent to transfer themselves to some other country simply because we do not accept them? The idea, sir, is preposterous.

President Dole, in an interview which occurred in Chicago and was published in the New York Journal of the 24th of last January, was asked what would happen in the event that the United States rejected annexation. He answered: "Well, the republic is there. I do not know that anything would happen, except that things would go on as usual. I do not see any immediate danger from possession by any other country."

If, however, these people would not voluntarily surrender their autonomy, is there still danger that a foreign power may seize and hold Hawaii against their will—forcibly annex it, and thus obtain a base of operations against us in case of war with us?

we believe their conclusion to have been reached without having the facts fully presented for their consideration, and that annexation will result in their injury and to the damage of our country, it should still be our high prerogative and our bounden duty to interpose a barrier between them and the evil they are about to embrace, until they have had the opportunity to review their opinions and make a final decision in the light of all the evidence.

Mr. Johnson then discussed his second proposition.

The logic which insists that we shall possess ourselves of Hawaii upon the ground that it can be used as a basis for menacing our coast proves too much. It goes too far. The same logic carried to its natural conclusion would require us to dislodge England from British Columbia in the Pacific and from Halifax and the Bermudas in the Atlantic, where for years she has held strongly fortified positions within easy range of our shores.

Let me call gentlemen's attention to this very significant fact, that we have had within easy striking distance of us for years these fortified strongholds of this powerful nation, and yet for nearly a century we have not had a single war with her. She has during all this period been unable to oppress us or deprive us of our rights. Every controversy we have had with her has been settled amicably and by the peaceful arts of arbitration, instead of resorting to bloodshed and the sword. In these modern days, sir, it does not follow of necessity that "lands intersected by a narrow frith abhor each other." It is possible to occupy adjacent territory and still preserve peace.

Mr. Johnson then opposed the view of the military and naval officers that the possession of Hawaii was necessary to our protection against foreign nations. These gentlemen, he said, viewed the opinions held on war measures by plain citizens with a compassion bordering upon contempt, yet their special interest in these matters was the very element which, by giving a bias to their opinions, vitiated the soundness of their conclusions.

Bred to arms, is it at all surprising that they should desire that which will give them opportunities for employment and

This pretence has also been made, sir. When the report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs was made to the Senate on a resolution for annexation of Hawaii, there was written in the report a statement that England had designs upon the island. But, sir, the ink upon the paper that contained that declaration was scarcely dry before Sir Julian Pauncefote, pursuant to instructions from his government, hastened to make known to the United States that nothing of that kind was intended and to disavow all such purposes.

It has also been claimed that the Japanese were trying to colonize the island with a view of getting it under control and then turning it over to Japan.

Certainly the Japanese could not do this by peaceful methods, for in response to my question the gentleman admitted that, under the constitution and laws of Hawaii, the Japanese had not the right to vote. It is not denied that they are most of them on the island as contract laborers under a seven years' contract, without any political rights whatever. No sooner, sir, had this claim been made than the Japanese minister hastened to make a disavowal, not only on his own account but for his government.

The Japanese minister has further pointed out to us that Japan does not favor emigration of her people and that it has never been her policy to extend her territory beyond the zone which immediately surrounds her.

Sir, pass the resolution which the minority offers in this instance as a substitute for the annexation resolution of the majority, declare to Hawaii and the world once more our old doctrine that we guarantee the independence of the island and will maintain the same, and that no foreign nation must lay hands on it, and there is not a power in the world that would dare to violate the declaration, because it would know that a violation of it simply meant a terrible and destructive war with the greatest nation of modern times.

But, if there is any doubt upon this point, how easy it would be to settle it by an amicable arrangement. I myself had the honor to introduce into this House a joint resolution, now pending before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which provides that the President of the United States shall appoint three commissioners on behalf of the United States to meet a like number of commissioners from each one of the leading nations of the world, at a conveniently early day, at Washington, to formulate a plan for an agreement, to be reported back to the respective governments for their adoption, forever guaranteeing the entire independence of Hawaii, and prohibiting the taking possession of any part of its soil.

There is not a nation on the face of the earth that would not be willing to accept an agreement containing this proposition. England is committed to the principle; France is committed to it; Japan is committed to it.

If, however, it is thought that by inviting other nations to have a voice in this arrangement concerning Hawaii there would be a yielding up of the principles of the Monroe Doctrine, how easy it is to disavow such a surrendering except in this specific case in the very agreement itself, and to declare that the making of it by us shall not be construed as a warrant to the contracting nations for aggression in our hemisphere.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is contended that we already have a perpetual right to Pearl Harbor, which is the essential part of the Hawaiian Islands, under our second reciprocity treaty with that country. This harbor and its immediate environments are practically all that is necessary to be held for war operation and a coaling station. I grant you that whether we possess perpetual right in this harbor is a debatable question. Mr. Bayard has said that our rights there will expire when the treaty expires.

But, sir, I see it positively stated that Mr. Sherman has said and that Mr. Morrill has said that it was the understanding, when this Pearl River Harbor grant to us was inserted in the last reciprocity treaty with Hawaii, that it guaranteed to us a permanent right to that harbor. It is also stated that they have said that Mr. Edmunds, whose legal ability no man can gainsay, drew the provision with this very object in mind, and that he always put that construction upon it.

But I care not which one of these constructions is accepted. The fact remains that we can, if we want to, purchase Pearl Harbor of Hawaii and fortify it, and in my humble opinion we can purchase it without any difficulty. [Applause.]

Mr. Johnson then discussed the status of Hawaii after annexation. Referring to General Charles H. Grosvenor (Ohio), who had "scorned" to discuss this question, he said:

Indeed, all the other gentlemen who have advocated annexation have been careful to avoid this phase of the subject, adverting to it only when interrogated about it, and then dismissing it hurriedly with the declaration that the question will very genius of our free institutions, as well as the invariable practices of our people, cry out in vigorous protest against it.

This Government of ours is 'of the people, for the people, and by the people'; it contemplates no such thing as the holding of provinces with no right of local control and no hope of ultimate statehood. It was conceived in protest against the holding of men in servitude. It hath ever been and ever must be the antithesis to that odious system which holds possessions by the sword and draws sustenance from their products. Under our flag individual aspirations for liberty and citizenship are encouraged. If men are never to be qualified to participate in the blessings of free government, we should studiously avoid extending over them the folds of our starry flag. A name will avail us nothing if we abandon the essence of our polity. We cannot remain a republic and at the same time practice the methods of a despotism.

And where, may I ask, have we the machinery for the government of provinces? I know, sir, that we pride ourselves upon our capacity for political affairs; that we boast of our genius for administration. I have heard gentlemen say that whatever any other nation can do we can do also. Notwithstanding all this, I venture to suggest that we have no special training for the management of colonies and outlying provinces in the region of the Tropics, populated by alien and mongrel races. Great Britain, who has been beyond doubt the most successful of modern nations in this line, despite the many misfortunes which have plagued her in her colonies, is thoroughly equipped for such administration. She possesses a magnificent civil service, in which persons are specially educated and equipped for the government of her dependencies. With her favoritism is unknown in the selection of these officials. The most perfect qualification is required.

But how long would we tolerate such a system of selection of men for the administration of our tropical possessions; we who are constantly denouncing our civil service as an undemocratic and monarchical institution and are vociferously demanding its overthrow and destruction? Ah, sir, of one thing we may well rest assured: Whatever form of government we may confer upon these islands, the offices essential to the conduct of their affairs will be eagerly sought after with wild clamor by the henchmen of public men as rewards for political services which they have rendered to their masters. Favoritism in appointments will abound. Thorough equipment for the work will be largely ignored.

be solved when the proper time arrives, that we can safely be trusted to determine the matter wisely, and other answers equally as vague and evasive.

Mr. Speaker, what kind of statesmanship is this which regards only present action and gives no thought to ultimate results? Is this the kind of "leadership" which we are to follow—the leadership which leaps without looking? I for one do not "scorn" to discuss the question, and I again ask what do we propose to do with Hawaii and these other insular territories when we get them? The demand for the immediate passage of the pending resolution makes this a present problem, and gentlemen cannot either ignore or evade it.

Mr. Johnson emphasized the arguments of Mr. Clark against admitting Hawaii a State, chiefly the one that the deciding vote of a Hawaiian Senator or Representative might direct the destiny of the nation.¹ This incapacity for statehood carried with it incapacity for the condition of a territory since government in local affairs was relegated to the inhabitants of our inchoate States.

There is but one other course left open to us. We must govern these islands as conquered provinces. We must hold them by the hand of stern repression, according to their inhabitants neither participation nor representation in our Government. It is thus that ancient Rome held her conquered territory. It is thus that England now holds certain of her tropical possessions. We must have our captains-general, our governors-general, our councils of administration, and our executive councils. We need not call our governing bodies by these very names, but they will possess and exercise the precise functions of these dignitaries.

But where do we find American precedent or authority for such a form of government as this? You will search for it in vain, though you ransack every archive and depository in the land. Nor can you find any sanction for it in the customs of our people. The Declaration of Independence, the spirit and letter of the Federal and State constitutions, the utterances and writings of the Fathers, every page in the Federalist, the teachings of our publicists, the decisions of all our courts, ay, the

And what is to be expected, gentlemen, of an administration of a province conducted by such appointees as these? Away from the scrutiny of the home Government, they will prey like harpies upon the ignorant people, who will not only be incapable of defence but even incapable of protest. Injustice, peculation, and scandal equal to that practiced by Lord Clive and Warren Hastings in India will be the order of the day.

Our public officials will vie with the unscrupulous adventurers who will seek these islands in hopes of bettering their fortunes, in schemes for their enrichment by means of oppression and plunder. The great syndicates and trusts will find there a congenial field for their operations, where, away from the pressure of that public opinion which here imposes a certain degree of restraint upon their excesses, they will pursue their heartless and unconscionable practices without stint and without restraint.

These provinces, too, Mr. Speaker, will become the inevitable home for political intrigue. Here it will be that the unscrupulous politicians will lay their plans, will hatch schemes for the control not simply of dependencies but of States—of the National Government itself. The thunderbolts that are to be launched at a free people will be forged upon these islands, which, in our weakness and folly, we unconsciously dedicated to this hostile purpose.

Sir, we do not want Hawaii or any of these other islands. We do not care to assume their debts and obligations. We have enough debt of our own, now rapidly increasing day by day, to tax our resources severely and impose heavy burdens upon our people. Let Hawaii keep her volcanoes, which are extinct, and her leprosy, which is extant. Nor do we covet the vices and miseries of these heterogeneous populations of the tropics. Unlike the inhabitants of the temperate zone, they are wholly incapable of assimilation, and without capacity either to appreciate or embrace the genius of our institutions. General Garfield was right when he said, at the time the first treaty of reciprocity with Hawaii was pending, that there ought never to be any extension of our territory into the Tropics and that to do so would weaken both our Government and our people. Their possession will promote neither our happiness, our prosperity, nor our power as a nation.

We do not need any of this territory for the expansion of our people, for, unlike the thickly settled nations of the Old World, we have here a mighty area, a vast empire of our own, amply large enough to accommodate with comfort any possible increase to which our population may attain in centuries to come. We have variety of soil and climate, diversity of industries, and unbounded natural resources and material wealth all at our command. Our fields are to be sown with grain, our mines are to be opened and worked, our factories are to be operated, and these are sufficient to occupy our time and our energies and to yield us an ample return for our endeavors. Why should we, then, abandon the development of that which is our own for these less desirable and less profitable lands, which none but those who are accustomed to the climate can cultivate with success?

Nor should we annex to our domain, Mr. Speaker, any territory whose people are many of them unwilling to consent to the annexation. Talk, sir, about the authority of the Hawaiian Government as you will (and no one disputes its de facto existence nor that it has the bare legal right to form a union with us by treaty, as provided in its constitution), the fact, nevertheless, remains, and it is useless to deny it, that a large number of the people there are strongly opposed to this movement. Of this we have ample evidence. Shall we now, as a free people, invoke the technicalities and brush aside the equities of the case to the end that we may receive in a spirit of cupidity a gift which the Dole Government cannot in honor and good faith proffer and which we cannot in honor and good faith accept?

Gentlemen, we do not desire to establish a precedent by making this acquisition. We appreciate that it will scarcely be made before it will be cited as authority for still further encroachments. Ah, Mr. Speaker, how easy it is to make a mistake! How difficult to recover ground once lost! How terrible the force of a wrongful inertia!

We oppose the pending resolution, too, because it involves a total abandonment of our cherished traditions.

I have heard those who oppose these efforts at annexation stigmatized, both here and elsewhere, as back numbers, as barnacles who impede the onward progress of the ship of state. It has been said that we are making now precisely the same arguments and predictions which were made against the annexation of all the vast territory whose subsequent history has added so much to the greatness of the country and has shown conclusively the fallacy of the objection urged to its annexation. Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen who indulge in this kind of prattle seem wholly incapable of drawing plain distinctions.

In the exuberance of their denunciation they seem to over-be needed. Our army must be enormously increased in size, for these various acquisitions must be strongly fortified and garrisoned. And there, gentlemen, are also our increased reserves, and our coast defences, which must not be neglected, for this novel and splendid policy of empire which we are to inaugurate requires that we shall continue to defend our own shores as well as defend these islands which we are to acquire.

Mr. Speaker, this is a brilliant and a dazzling career that is being marked out for us; but will it pay? Will our people be the happier, the more prosperous, the more powerful, if they pursue it? The trained eye of Bismarck has been quick to grasp our situation and to see our folly, and he has declared that this proposed policy would be an intermeddling policy, leading to unavoidable frictions; that it would require us to become a military and a naval power—which he characterizes as an expensive luxury, rendered unnecessary by our geographical position. He has truthfully declared also that our change of front means retrogression in the high sense of civilization.

Mr. Speaker, are we to exchange the tranquillity which has been ours for the alarm and anxiety which are the plague of the people who thirst for universal empire? Are we to have war flurries which disturb business and international differences which check development? Our interest clearly requires that we should steer clear of an Anglo-American alliance, however much our sympathy may bind us to our kindred across the sea. But what nation which holds colonies has ever yet been able to avoid alliances with other powers in order to maintain her possessions against nations of envious and unfriendly disposition or whose interests clash with her own? Does not all history demonstrate that this is true?

Gentlemen, there is but one safe course to pursue. Let us avoid the segregation which leads to war and makes defence difficult. Let us preserve our territory compact, where our geographical position, our immense population, and our great resources render us impervious to successful attack. Our base of supplies is thus at our very backs; our lines of communication cannot be cut off. Let us apply ourselves to the correction of internal grievances by the passage of just and wholesome laws, and to the development of our wonderful natural resources. That we should have an adequate army and navy and coast defences is undoubtedly true; but let our mission be that of peace, and no nation is likely to disturb or to oppress us. It has not been done in the past; it is not at all likely to occur in the future.

look entirely the difference between annexing territory which is contiguous and territory which is insular, territory which is in the temperate and territory which is in the tropical zone, territory which our own people are capable of inhabiting and cultivating and territory which they can neither exist in with comfort nor cultivate without distress; between territory in which self-government is a possibility and territory in which it is wholly out of the question, territory which can be defended with ease and territory which can be defended only at great risk and expense.

Under this traditional policy of ours, sir, we have grown and developed until we have become the wealthiest and most powerful country upon the globe, far outstripping in progress the nations who have adopted and practiced the policy of insular acquisitions.

Concentration, sir, not diffusion, is the desideratum; a nation which is compact, not one which is scattered to all parts of the globe. Russia seems to have grasped the force of this proposition. She saw in Alaska a segregation which was her weakness. She was glad to rid herself of the danger. Her great power to-day rests no more upon her vast population and her autocratic rule than upon the compactness of her domain, from which she can send forth her mighty armies to attack and overpower, and yet be under no necessity of defending distant provinces from the assaults of her enemy.

Hawaii, Puerto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippines once a part of our domain, they become not sources of strength but sources of weakness. They are vulnerable places in our national armor which invite attack. They will be constant subjects for irritating differences with other powers—powers with whom our present isolation makes it easy for us to remain at peace and yet grow and prosper with unprecedented rapidity. It is the possession of outlying territory that to-day puts Spain in our power. Her diffusion is her greatest weakness.

With this territory wrested from her grasp, we will be better able to defend it than she; but reflect one moment, sir, at what an enormous outlay of trouble and expense. Admiral Irwin, himself a strong advocate of territorial expansion, admits that the adoption of such a policy will require us to maintain a navy equal in power to any in the world. Measure, gentlemen, the disparity between our own navy and that of the mother country, and then tell me what it will cost us to build such a navy, to say nothing of the cost of its maintenance.

But the navy is not the only arm of our service which will

But I have heard it said in this debate that we must acquire these possessions to increase our trade. Mr. Speaker, neither economic science nor human experience sanctions the theory that trade can only be built up by the annexation of territory. The logical way to increase our trade is to produce commodities superior in quality and cheaper in price than our competitors, and then to break down the walls of our tariff, except so far as the protection of our laboring population makes it necessary that it shall stand, that combines and trusts may not interdict trade, oppress the consumer, and grow wealthy upon the monopolies which they enjoy. Nor should we forget, sir, that trade is not the selling of commodities for money, but the exchange of commodities for commodities.

I confess my amazement that gentlemen on this floor who are stanch Republican protectionists should be urging so strongly the annexation to the United States of these tropical countries where cheap coolie labor, under the direction and control of great syndicates and corporations, can and will produce competing products of the American farm, such, for instance, as rice, sugar, and tobacco, cheaper than they can be produced here, and then transport them to our shores duty-free and sell them in the American market.

What is likely to be the effect, sir, upon the American laborer, especially the American farm laborer, of such a policy as this? I do not wonder, in view of the outlook, that the president of the American Federation of Labor has addressed a letter to the Speaker of this House protesting against the passage of the pending resolution. Mr. Speaker, this new policy of imperialism is against both the interest of the farmer and the interest of the laborer, and for this reason those who profess to be in sympathy with these classes should antagonize the policy at the very outset.

And, then, there is the Monroe Doctrine. Gentlemen, has this doctrine no corollary? What is it that has induced the trans-Atlantic nations to acquiesce in our domination in this hemisphere if it is not our disavowal of all intention or right to interfere in the affairs of the other hemisphere? And yet it is now openly declared on every hand by those who believe in this "march of empire" that we propose, having justly pushed our way to the very doors of Asia, to remain there after our necessity has ceased and establish ourselves forever as a factor in the local affairs of the Orient.

Think you that this course will increase European respect for the Monroe Doctrine and tend to increase its stability? Beware, gentlemen, of the law of retaliation. We must take the burdens along with the supposed benefits of this novel doctrine which we are to embrace. Let us not be surprised if we become the subject of reprisals from abroad and if, in grasping for power there, we suddenly discover that we are in danger of losing power nearer home.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, there is one pathway out of this dilemma which is less dangerous than the rest. Why shall we not take it? Let us reject the proposition to annex Hawaii. Let us retire from Cuba as soon as possible after this war and the establishment of an independent and stable government by its people, thus keeping faith with the Cubans, the world, and ourselves.

Let us not hesitate to seize upon Spanish soil wherever the necessities of war may demand it for the sake of victory; but when peace is restored and our indemnity paid, let us restore her lost provinces to the government at Madrid, or, if Spain will not or cannot redeem them, let us dispose of them to some other nation, for we will hardly be able to find a purchaser who will not govern them more justly than she. This should be done for our own sake, not for the sake of Spain. Having done this, let us turn again to peaceful pursuits and to the realization of that glorious destiny which awaits us if we are only true to traditions which deserve to be imperishable.

Jonathan P. Dolliver (Iowa) supported the resolution. He paid Mr. Johnson the dubious compliment of having made the strongest argument against annexation in his two speeches (the first in the preceding year), and yet of attracting no more than the applause of the House—for he would find, when the question was taken, a singular absence of votes in the negative.

Mr. Dolliver put this dilemma to Mr. Johnson and the other opponents of the resolution:

We either have an interest in acquiring the islands or we have no interest in standing guard over them against others. If they are important enough to defend from others, they are important enough to acquire for ourselves. I for my part have more confidence in our own country than I have in any other country in the world. We know there is no nation in Europe that does not appreciate the strategic value of this halfway station in the ocean.

statesmen of both parties in the past fifty years, has also had his mind poisoned by the atmosphere which surrounds the position he has taken, until it appears credible to him that the opinions of our great soldiers and sailors are worthless, because, in his judgment, they are actuated by a desire for promotion in the national service?

Captain Mahan says that few ships of war can carry fuel enough to go from San Francisco to Asia without stopping to recoal, and he says that no ship can come from an Asiatic station to our shores to attack our coast and be able to get back without having a place to coal. Even a landsman can understand that; and therefore I put my faith in him when he points out that, since these islands must harbor the coal supply of the mid-Pacific, they literally command that ocean, so that if our country controls them we have in them an absolute protection for our coast. [Applause.]

My friend says you can go to China and the East by a shorter route. If that were true, it would not touch this question. This is a question of national defence, not a problem for passenger agents. The gentlemen from Ohio [General Grosvenor], in the great speech that he made in this House yesterday, quoted the statement of Captain Bartlett, former Hydrographer and now Chief of the Office of Naval Intelligence, in which he points out in plain terms the reasons which offset the geographical advantage of sending ships from San Francisco to the Orient by way of the Aleutian Archipelago.

And the explanation which he gives seems in my mind to be reasonable and conclusive. Ships going by that route encounter a current running at the rate of more than a mile an hour, and ships passing through that latitude encounter fogs and foul weather at all seasons, and therefore this practical student of the problem is convinced that that route is not advantageous, even if it is pursued by some lines of steamships. If what is said about this Alaskan port is true, it is another evidence of the farsighted wisdom of Secretary Seward in boldly rejecting the counsel of the enemies of that annexation in his day. But what has that to do with this question? What comfort is the United States to get out of this Aleutian harbor if a hostile squadron, approaching us from Asia, is admitted to the coaling privilege at Honolulu?

But my friend says we are about to annex all the Spanish islands, east and west, as well as this Hawaiian group. The American people will take care of the Philippine Islands when our campaign in the Orient is at an end. They will take care

My friend started out with the proposition that it was not necessary for us in this war. That is not the question. This war is an incident, a noble and splendid incident, but only a transient incident in the life of a great community like ours. We are not dealing to-day altogether with the war with Spain. We are not acting for this hour, or for this year, or for this century, or for the next century; we are acting for the millenniums yet to come, with our hearts full of the sublime hope that the institutions planted by our fathers shall endure through long distant ages. [Applause.]

On the question of expert military opinion Mr. Dolliver said:

Most of us have a little hesitation in putting ourselves against the military authorities of our own times. My friend from Indiana has overcome that. I regret to see so good a man setting himself to write a platform for all the street-corner strategists of the country to stand on. It would seem that we have had enough of cheap and furious general orders issued on the dry-goods boxes in the villages of the United States.

When I want to get light on a military question I go to a man who has made war a study, and for that reason I cannot accept my friend's opinion of the military necessity for the annexation of the Sandwich Islands. I like the gentleman, and confide in his abilities as a lawyer, but in this matter I prefer to go to General Schofield, who says that from a military standpoint the annexation of these islands is a necessity to the United States.

We have also the authority of Captain Mahan, in some respects the most influential living authority in naval matters, an authority of war recognized by the whole world, who says that the annexation of these islands is of immense importance now and hereafter to the successful naval operations of the United States. Now, the gentleman from Indiana ridicules this, and says that the officers of the army and navy of the United States, having been educated at our academies, are circumscribed in their outlook and liable to give an unreliable counsel in these matters on account of the selfish prospect of their own promotion.

I am ashamed to listen to such a judgment offered upon this floor. Is it any wonder that my friend, who has pored over the Hawaiian question until he has lost confidence in the foremost of Puerto Rico; they will take care of Cuba, and that afflicted community will find in the hearts of our people, when our work in Cuba is done, the same sympathy, the same anxiety for their welfare, that persuaded the great Republic to enlist an army and send its navy on its mission of mercy and peace in the West Indies. [Applause.] My friend need have no fear. Every question that arises will be taken care of; but we must take care of the question of Hawaii first, because it had the floor fifty years before the other questions arose. [Laughter and applause.] Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor now and here of making an end to this controversy and raising in that fortress of the Pacific the old flag of our fathers, once hauled down, but about to be run up again, forever afterward to glorify the skies of the Southern Ocean. [Prolonged applause.]

William P. Hepburn (Iowa) supported the bill. Denying that the annexation of Hawaii necessarily committed us to a colonial policy, he nevertheless accepted the venture.

Who dares to say that, even if we should enter upon this new policy, the fate which befell the Roman Empire would be ours? Look at England. What would she be to-day if confined to her insular domain? The mistress of the seas? Ah, no! One of the leading nations of the earth! Ah, no! Giving her laws, her literature, and her civilization to all the world! Ah, no! Had there not been a Frederick the Great, who can say that the little Duchy of Brandenburg would have extended itself into the great German Empire of to-day? This same "greed," this thirst for annexation, this desire for new territory, this passion for extending civilization, has blessed the earth.

The statesmanship of the earth to-day is in favor of this system of colonization, of territorial expansion, of breadth and greatness and grandeur, of extension of empire. All the statesmanship of the world, save that of the Democratic party here in the United States, says "aye" to the proposition; they alone are halting in the procession. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, how strange is this attitude of the Democratic party! Gentlemen, what inspires you now to this new departure? I say it is a new departure. Heretofore you have been the annexationists. Every argument that you have made here to-day or during this debate was refuted by the friends of Mr. Jefferson in 1803; again in 1819; again in 1845; again in 1848—refuted over and over again. Let me read a sentence or two of Democratic doctrine to remind you gentlemen how far you are departing from the faith of the fathers—your fathers, not mine, thank God! [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I read from a document that forty-odd years ago occupied more of public attention, that commanded more of the respect of the Democratic party, than any other single document that you can find, unless it is the Declaration of Independence:

Here the speaker read the Ostend Manifesto (see page 83).

That was your doctrine, gentlemen, only a little while ago. What now has become of your then passion for territorial aggrandizement? What has given birth to these new fears of yours? There was no fear in 1854 or in 1860 that through the acquisition of Cuba we should have implanted in the system of the body politic that thirst and hunger, that greed for territory which would lead us on to that kind of expansion that resulted in the destruction of Rome. No man seemed to care a "continental" then about Rome [laughter on the Republican side]; no Democrat in the land was howling then about the example and fate of Greece; no man was fearful that we should extend our territory over Africa and Asia and the islands of the sea. Are you gentlemen wiser?

The old men thought that what brought about the grandeur of their country, territorial expansion, was Democratic. The new men are unwilling that anything of that kind shall be done by a Republican Administration.

Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to say how Hawaii would be governed if a part of the United States, but I undertake to say that if the Republican party is in power and has control that it will be well governed. If there is slavery there now, as gentlemen tell us, it will be obliterated. [Applause on the Republican side.] I can promise you that. If there are unjust laws there now, they will be repealed then. I cannot tell you whether Hawaii will be a State of the Union, or when. I undertake to say, however, that with the experiences that we have recently had [in Reconstruction of ex-Rebel States] they will be permitted to undergo such period of probation as will assure us that they are fitted for republican institutions. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, there are three methods of acquiring territory—by discovery, by conquest, by purchase. Each is legitimate stained doctrine respected by others, we must scrupulously practice what we preach.

Some tears were shed in the former and confidential part of this debate for the reason that we, unlike European nations, had no colonies nor dependencies and were not alert in the seizure of ports and harbors of China, ostensibly to build up trade and commerce, as all Europe seemed to be doing.

Yet the monopoly of these ports and harbors, for their own exclusive benefit, appeared likely to provoke the hostility of other commercial nations, and therefore a trio of the China reformers, now led by Great Britain, at once agreed to make all these ports as free and open to the whole world as to themselves. The loudly proclaimed overwhelming necessity that the United States should begin to snatch by diplomacy or by force some foreign market place, or annex some foreign islands, or at least twist the tail of the British lion, has been, it now appears, overworked, and all of its varied pathos has fled.

The reciprocity treaty with the Hawaiian Islands of June 3, 1875, was an enormous blunder, greater even than that with Canada in 1854, on the part of the United States, as a brief examination of its practical operation will conclusively show. Thus exempting their sugar from duty by compact we gave to those who were unentitled to it by reciprocity or by furnishing our people with any cheaper sugar the power annually to intercept and take away from us millions of revenue on sugar for which no fair equivalent of commerce or of sentiment has ever even been pretended. To obtain more revenue we had just imposed on sugar extraordinary duties, and the remission of such duties on Hawaiian sugar and molasses, as might have been expected, gave enormous profits to the sugar planters and greatly augmented the Hawaiian production of sugar. Much of the most valuable sugar lands there were immediately largely monopolized, sugar machinery was swiftly and annually imported, and many thousand coolie laborers from China and Japan were suddenly brought and put at work in Hawaii at the coolie rate of wages.

In 1876 our imports of free sugar from Hawaii were only 26,000,000 pounds, but in 1896 increased to 443,000,000 pounds. The treaty ought long ago to have been terminated or reasonably modified, so as to have remitted not more than 10 or 20 per cent. of the duties on sugar, or no more than we may properly remit on the sugar of Brazil or Germany, where our trade would require and receive some reciprocal advantages in return. Some interested parties in Hawaii might regret a collapse in and recognized by the family of States in the law of nations. We are now engaged in war against Spain. It is our duty to cripple Spain in her navy, in her army, in her revenues, in her possessions. We hope, every patriot hopes, that Cuba, Puerto Rico, the Philippine Islands will be ours by conquest. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Successful war demands that this should be. When you gentlemen say that you will have none of it, are you praying that disaster shall come to our fleets and to our armies—that we may fail in conquering those islands? Surely I know that you do not mean that. Therefore you must be consenting that we may acquire in legitimate and lawful ways—by conquest—these possessions of Spain. What we will do with them afterward is a question for the statesmanship of this great nation. That we will act wisely I have no doubt. But, whatever we do with that territory, I am persuaded that this side of the House, and I believe that side, will insist upon retaining such portions of that territory as will enable us to meet all of the requirements of modern commerce. In the old days, with the old instrumentalities, we did not need the frequent friendly port. Now we do. We must have it or drop out of the procession of nations in their great effort to capture the commerce of the world. [Prolonged applause.]

The minority resolution was defeated by a vote of 96 yeas to 204 nays. The joint resolution of the majority was then passed by a vote of 209 to 91.

The resolution was referred in the Senate to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which reported it without amendment on June 17. It came up for discussion on June 20.

ANNEXATION OF HAWAII

SENATE, JUNE 20-JULY 6, 1898

Justin S. Morrill (Vermont) opposed annexation. He declared that it would advertise to the world the final wreckage of the Monroe Doctrine.

We cannot afford to denounce and forbid all acquisitions of territory in the Western Hemisphere by European governments, even at the peril of war, and forthwith embark in a thus damned enterprise ourselves. If we would have our yet un-their present enormous advantages, but our people would not regret to have this unreciprocated and quixotic boon no longer so extravagantly maintained at their cost.

Our home producers of sugar do not want to be confronted forever with the competition of free sugar produced by coolie labor which no American can afford to tolerate, much less to protect, as we are doing and as it is now proposed we shall do forever. Our election of 1896 was not won on a pledge of protection to the sugar production of Hawaii.

Senator Morrill urged the argument, with which the reader is already familiar, that the Hawaiian natives (nine out of ten of whom opposed annexation) were not fitted to sustain republican government; they might even restore the deposed Queen. Besides these Kanakas there were other non-American races in the islands—Japanese, Chinese, and Portuguese.

Certainly none of these could ever be safely counted in favor of leaving the "paramount" authority in the hands of the United States, and an army of sufficient strength, with the Stars and Stripes, would therefore be a permanent necessity to shield the islands from insurrections and revolutions.

One gentleman in this debate rests his argument for annexation on his belief that the Chinese and Japanese will be at once driven out of Hawaii by Americans and expatriated. All history will show that this is impossible. The few Americans there now could not do without their labor. No race is ever supplanted except by a hardier one—one that can endure more hours of labor and be content with cheaper and coarser food. The British troops took Quebec, but the Canadian Frenchmen remained in Canada. They are there now, and so is their language. We have had colonization societies for generations, and expended large sums of money in sending away colored immigrants, but wholly without success, because their labor is indispensable here, and it cannot be superseded by more acceptable labor.

It has been the happiness of the Republic of the United States that it has long and very distinctly had the benefit of a contrast with aristocratic empires and monarchies in relation to colonial dependencies. These arrogant aristocracies nurse their pride and dazzle their subjects with the obedience and enchantments of distant colonies and dependencies, but their condition is now, or was recently, on exhibition by their paternal and maternal wars and rumors of wars in India, North and South Africa, Madagascar, Egypt, China, Philippine Islands, and Cuba.

These perennial colonial flagellations, or life struggles of colonies and dependencies which refuse to stay conquered, require the increase of big home armies and bigger navies, which can only be maintained by the biggest taxes. The aristocratic empires push the inexorable demand of three to five years of the life of all their young men in military service, and then to be ready for further service until emancipated by the decrepitude of old age. These large standing armies threaten their neighbors, and their neighbors threaten everybody else by an increase of their battleships. Boundless public debts and double and twisted taxes leave their people poor, with no hope that these grim and stubborn exactions will ever be less.

Hitherto the statesmen of our Republic have kept clear of colonies and dependencies, for it need not be admitted that Alaska is an exception, nor that it is ever more likely to become one of the United States than any other part of the yet unappropriated North Pole. Our young men of the Republic are at school, or at work on the farm, or busy somewhere learning a trade or a profession from which they may derive a livelihood or the comforts of an independent home. They are not impressed for the regular army, which is so small as to be almost invisible, and wholly composed of volunteers. Two-thirds of our rebellion debt has been paid, and we fully expect to pay the remainder, and that it will speedily grow less.

The historic policy of the Republic of the United States for the hundred years just passed, based as it has been upon the sound doctrine promulgated by Washington in his farewell address with words of perennial wisdom against foreign entangling alliances, has taken root in the hearts of the American people, where it is treasured up as their political Bible and cannot now be "mocked at" as merely an ancient tradition. Its acceptance has made the nation great, made it respected. If our fidelity to the well-ripened statesmanship of the Father of his Country shall be perpetuated for the next hundred years as in the past, the honor, prosperity, and power of our republic, it may safely be predicted, will light and lead all the nations.

Augustus O. Bacon (Georgia) spoke against the resolution.

It is a question, if we pass this joint resolution, not only of one revolution, but of two revolutions. If we pass the joint reso-

In all cases the United States has annexed only territory ceded by governments having undoubted right to cede, and never from governments of doubtful ownership. They have never instigated revolution to get territory before this case.

The present oligarchy has no right to annex the islands. It is a government that has not the sanction of the people.

It is divesting a race of men of their right to country and government and putting them in a gradual process of extinction. The process has begun and will continue with accelerated speed.

The strength of the government depends on the unity and harmony of thought and action of the people. This results from the unity of race. Discordant races can never harmonize in putting into action political and social institutions. They can never agree completely in devising the best means to effect desired results. They necessarily take different views of governing forces as their intelligence and habits differ. Thus a government composed of different races will demand despotic rule to keep order and force obedience to law. In a republican government it requires the voluntary assent of the people which must come from them, and this can only be where the mass is congenial and act from similar motives and a uniform intelligence.

A mass of such heterogeneous races as now inhabit the Philippine and Hawaiian Islands will always be a source of weakness in a government ruled by the highest and most advanced races in the world. The present government of Hawaii is but an oligarchy of interested men placed in power and kept there by the power of this Republic. Our Government depends on the consent of the governed. The violation of this principle, whether by bribery and corruption or by force, will soon change the character of the mass and of the government. The higher races will not tolerate the less advanced races with the government. They will either purchase their action or force it. In Hawaii there is not one in ten, not more than 5 per cent. of the population, that understands the principles on which our Government is based, and they are incapable of understanding or conforming to them. It might be better in case of annexation to establish for them a despotic proconsular government. It would be better than the irresponsible oligarchy now existing sustained by the power of this Government. The political evil of introducing a mass of semi-barbarism is not any worse than the moral and social.

The annexation of Hawaii would be the entering wedge to a series of troubles in our country which could not be controlled lution we enter upon a revolution which shall convert this country from a peaceful country engaged in its own concerns into one which shall immediately proceed to intermeddle with the concerns of all the world. We enter upon a revolution which shall change the entire character of the Government, which is a government of equals, a government solely for the benefit of its citizens, into a government in which the flag shall float over communities that we would never agree should be equals with us in this Government.

That is a great enough revolution, Mr. President, but if we pass the joint resolution, we have entered upon a revolution which I consider even greater and more deplorable; that is a revolution where, because the majority has the power, it will in this body surrender the great treaty-making function which the Constitution gives jointly to the President and the Senate, and thus enter upon a field where the will of the majority shall obtain regardless of constitutional restrictions.

On June 30 William B. Bate (Tennessee) opposed the resolution.

Mr. President, there are two important considerations in this question: The policy and the right of annexation.

It is the commencement of indefinite extension of our territory. It will introduce a foreign dissociable element, the most heterogeneous mass that has ever been incorporated and which can never unite with Americans. It will introduce into our system the Roman proconsular service, an element foreign to American sympathies and habits. It will be commercially a disadvantage. They will purchase little and sell much. It is wholly in the interests of Hawaiian planters.

This step will demand a great increase of our army and navy, both results to be avoided if we adhere to our traditional policy. They will increase the expenditure and greatly augment taxation. They will greatly increase a class of men who will contribute nothing and must be paid and supported by the laboring element.

The movement is of doubtful constitutional authority. It has only the unauthorized authority of pressing and interested opportunity. It will increase the number of officers: with it will come paternalism, and, with that, strength to the great center and weakness to the outlying States. This continued process will by degrees wear away the muscular power of our great republic and dwindle it to a shadow and death.

by our people in after years. It may be the beginning of empire; it would be the initiatory of a new theory of government and give impetus to that rule of military power which will result in the control of this Government by militarism.

I shall vote against these resolutions because their adoption will be an abandonment of the Monroe Doctrine and the inauguration of an Oriental policy, with all its consequences, and for which our Government was not designed or constructed and with which it cannot be administered.

I shall vote against these resolutions with the same integrity of motive which led this Congress to assure the world that this war was not for the acquisition of territory. And I shall vote against these resolutions because they are a practical violation of the Constitution when they transfer from the treaty-making power to the Congress a subject-matter now before the Senate in a treaty form and undetermined, and with which the Congress should have no connection until the treaty-making power has definitely acted.

On July 5 George F. Hoar (Massachusetts) supported the resolution.

Mr. President, the trouble I have found with this Hawaiian business is not in the character of the population of the Sandwich Islands, not in their distance from our shores, not in the doubt that we have an honest right to deal with the existing government there in such a matter, but in the nature and character of the arguments by which a great many friends of annexation have sought to support it. Then, too, some very good friends of mine, with whom I have been accustomed to agree all my life, look with an unconquerable apprehension upon this measure, and their judgment of itself would be enough to make me distrust my own opinion.

At the age of four score and eight years, the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. Morrill], with his intellectual vision undimmed and his natural mental forces unabated, has contributed to this great argument the most powerful statement which has been made on either side of the question.

But, as I have said, the most important argument to my mind against this measure has been the character of the arguments by which it has been supported. If it be true that the passage of these resolves is to commit the United States to such a policy as we have heard advocated on this floor, and as has been advocated in many parts of the country in the press, then

George F Hoar

But this does not quite state the case. The opponents of annexation say we should hold onto Pearl Harbor for all the needs of commerce or of war. So that the question is not whether we are to advance our flag into the Pacific for the first time, but whether it is, on the whole, best that the little scrap of territory and the little handful of people that dwell under the walls and at the gates of our great fortified place shall be under our lawful control or shall be under the control of some foreign country, perhaps a powerful country, perhaps a hostile country.

It is not a question of empire in the Pacific, small or great. It is a question of how far in that little group of islands the boundaries of that empire shall reach—whether we shall be there forever in a strait waistcoat and within stone walls, or whether we shall have about our walls a little breathing room and a little elbow room. And that, Mr. President, is the whole of it.

No; that is not quite the whole of it. We have a relation to this group of islands which we can permit no other power to hold or to share. They are to this extent under our dominion now, that they cannot be permitted to annex themselves or to attach themselves to any foreign country whatever. We exercise already, and we have exercised for two generations, a dominion over Hawaii which makes it impossible for her to contract not only a marriage alliance, but any other special treaty granting favors or exclusive privileges to any other nation on earth.

Gentlemen doubt whether we are not putting a constraint upon this maiden queen of the Pacific when, with the assent of her existing lawful guardians, at least, we propose to take her hand in marriage. But they have no scruple to tell her that although we will not have her she never shall marry anybody else. She shall dwell forever under the walls of our city and under the guns of our fortress, only half a nation, half a people, possessing half manhood and half womanhood only, in the condition of perpetual childhood and tutelage.

Neither do I think, Mr. President, we need to concern ourselves much with the argument of distance. It is true that it is 2,000 miles, or a little more, from San Francisco to Honolulu, but we have learned long ago to annihilate such space. The center of the territory of this Republic, if I am rightly informed, is already in the Pacific Ocean. The water line of Alaska equals the circumference of the globe if it were straightened out. It is 600 miles farther from San Francisco to Kiska—which gentle-the people of the United States are confronted at this moment with the most serious danger they have encountered in all their history, unless we except the danger that slavery would be extended over the whole country or the danger that the rebellion would succeed.

If this be the first step in the acquisition of dominion over barbarous archipelagoes in distant seas; if we are to enter into competition with the great powers of Europe in the plundering of China, in the division of Africa; if we are to quit our own to stand on foreign lands; if our commerce is hereafter to be forced upon unwilling peoples at the cannon's mouth; if we ourselves are to be governed in part by peoples to whom the Declaration of Independence is a stranger; or, worse still, if we are to govern subject and vassal states, trampling as we do it on our own great charter which recognizes alike the liberty and the dignity of individual manhood, then let us resist this thing in the beginning, and let us resist it to the death.

I do not agree with those gentlemen who think we should wrest the Philippine Islands from Spain and take charge of them ourselves. I do not think we should acquire Cuba, as the result of the existing war, to be annexed to the United States.

I do not think we should undertake to rule, as I just said, over barbarous archipelagoes in distant seas. I do not think we should force our commerce upon unwilling nations at the cannon's mouth. I do not think we should enter into a struggle, lawless and barbarous, for the plunder of dismembered China. I do not think that a navy, on the whole, is the best instrumentality of a friendly intercourse with mankind. I do not think drums and trumpets and shouting and the clapping of hands and stamping of feet are the only arguments to be addressed to the statesmanship of a sane and Christian people.

But, Mr. President, I am satisfied, after hearing and weighing all arguments and much meditating on this thing, that the fear of imperialism is needless alarm.

Here Senator Hoar dwelt upon the small extent of the territory proposed to be annexed, 6,640 square miles, or one 343d part of the national area, and the small population, 100,000, or 13 hundredths of one per cent. of the national population.

We are to get a territory a fortieth part of the size of the State of Texas and a population not equal to that of a third-rate city.

men on the other side tell us ought to answer our purposes as a way station on the road to the east—than it is from San Francisco to Honolulu.

My late colleague and friend, and the friend of all of you, Senator Dawes, is, as I think we all know, a man not much given to flights of fancy. But he uttered in my hearing at a little gathering of twenty or thirty men a few years ago a sentence worthy of being handed down in literature by the side of Mr. Webster's famous passage in his speech on the President's protest. Mr. Dawes said: "If we cannot say of our country, as Mr. Webster said of Great Britain, that her morning drum beat, following the sun, keeping company with the hours, circles the earth in a continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England, we can say that before the sun sets upon Alaska it has risen upon Maine."

The utterances of the Fathers of the Republic, even the utterances of Mr. Webster and his contemporaries of a later time, so far as they speak of dealing with remote regions, have been rendered irrelevant by steam and electricity.

The ocean telegraph, and perhaps the telephone, will have that effect upon distance that the enterprising newspapers of Honolulu under our rule will tell their readers of events in Washington six hours before they happen. [Laughter.]

But it is said that until present conditions change very much the population of these islands must be governed under arrangements established by Congress, and not in the ordinary way of an American State. That is true. But that is in entire accord with the constitutional policy established by our fathers and maintained without any considerable complaint from their day to ours.

Mr. President, we are governing here by Congress now a population in this District of 300,000, I suppose, or thereabouts—larger than all but three or four of the States that formed the Union—simply because we do not deem it wise that the Congress of the United States shall sit where their protection against mobs and public disorders shall depend in times of political excitement upon the authority of any State, and we govern all these people without their being represented, and nobody complains, or thinks that it is a violation of American principles.

We govern Alaska also and we govern the Territories at the will of Congress, and I find no departure from our American principles in saying that this little population living near Pearl Harbor shall be governed as Territories are governed and as the District of Columbia is governed until they are fitted to come in as a State.

Gentlemen tell us that the possession of the Sandwich Islands will not add to our security, but to our danger in a foreign war. They say that we must maintain a powerful fleet to defend them besides what we already have on our Pacific coast. But I have already suggested an answer to that argument. We settled that question when we acquired by treaty our rights in Pearl Harbor, and it will remain settled until Congress is ready to cede back Pearl Harbor to the Sandwich Islands. If we are to give up Pearl Harbor then there may be room for that argument. If we are to hold onto Pearl Harbor—as nearly every man who has spoken in this debate on the other side says we are—we must fortify it, we must defend it in case of war, and we do not want to run any risk that the power that tries to take it shall be already lawfully entrenched next door.

But I do not put this case upon any such ground. I think the acquisition of Hawaii by the United States is an extension of the domain of peace upon the habitable globe. I hope and expect that we shall come out of the present war, unless we indulge in the folly, as I think it, of entering upon a policy of acquisition and of aggression, after such fashion that no nation, small or great, powerful or weak, will desire to attack us for a hundred years.

Mr. President, we must, of course, have no doubt about the question whether we have an honest right to do this. If we have not, we are not going to steal Naboth's vineyard or to commit under any temptation an act of international dishonor. That is clear. But we have, in the first place, the assent of the Hawaiian Government. We cannot in matters of international dealing commonly go behind that. We would never permit any nation, small or great, who undertook to deal with us, to make the inquiry whether the President and the Senate of the United States did not represent the will of the American people, and there is no possibility for any dealing under public law between nations on public questions which undertakes to go on any other theory.

I agree that in annexing a nation and merging its life with our own we would not take the act of a temporary usurpation in violation of the will of the people. We have heard repeated the charge that the present government in Hawaii was the result of a usurpation countenanced and fostered by the presence of the American forces. I think that argument is refuted by the fact that ever since and during four years when the President of the United States was notoriously in sympathy with the exiled Queen there was neither overthrow nor attempt to overthrow the existing government in Hawaii. The Queen and the Hawaiian monarchy are just as surely things of the past, a nightmare of the past, as are Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Blount and their mugwump followers.

The Americans want it, the government there wants it, the Portuguese want it, and the Hawaiians, to the best of my knowledge, neither know nor care whether they want it or not. They are a perishing people, and their only hope and desire and expectation is that, in the providence of God, they may lead a quiet and undisturbed life, fishing, bathing, supplied with tropical fruits, and be let alone.

They will fall, Mr. President, if we do not prevent it, a prey to Japan, not by conquest, but by immigration. This result all parties agree that we must prevent. Japan is not, according to the opponents of annexation of this body and in the press, to be allowed to get the Sandwich Islands, either by force or by absorption. If that be true, is it better, is it safer, is it more in accordance with the policy of a wise and well-considered peace, to prevent that by annexation than to have hereafter a war of force based on the doubtful principle of international law and the doubtful claim of right to which we must resort if we find that thing going on?

We did not consult the Indians in Texas or in California or in New Mexico or in Alaska when those Territories were taken into the Union. We did not consult the Indians when we declared our own independence.

Mr. President, I believe that this is a contest to be settled now peacefully or to be settled hereafter by force between America and Asia for the possession of this group of islands; that it is a contest between the domain of peace, which is America, and the domain of war, which is Asia. The danger is, as I have said, that there will be an infusion of Japanese and then an attempted annexation to Japan; and there is a more serious danger in undertaking to resist this hereafter by war than there is in preventing it now by the methods and instrumentality of peace.

Mr. President, of the population in 1896 there were 53,726 persons, one-half the entire number, without any regular occupation.

Now, when we are speaking of a great national choice, I prefer to take the opinion as to national destiny of the government and the men who carry on the schools and the men who rescued the nation from barbarism and cannibalism, and the tradesmen and the fishermen and the laborers and the farmers and the mechanics, rather than the men who are without any occupation at all.

It would be as reasonable to take the vote of the children in an orphan asylum or an idiot school as to what should be done if a conflagration were raging in the street or if a flood were about to sweep away their building, as to consult these simple and helpless people about how to deliver them from this Oriental menace.

It is said they will come in as a State some time. But they will not come in as a State unless they are fit to be a State. If they have got hereafter a population of a million or fifteen hundred thousand of American lineage and American character and American ideals, a population like that of Washington or like that of Colorado, they will come in and we shall welcome them. But, if they are unfit, they will not come in; we never have been in a hurry about this thing. They said that about New Mexico when they made the treaty by which we acquired her fifty years ago. We have not admitted Alaska; we have not admitted the District of Columbia; we have not admitted Arizona. If they get a people there likely to select such men as Mr. Dole or Mr. Thurston or Mr. Damon for Senators and Representatives, they will be a very good people for Statehood and for American citizenship and American sovereignty.

Mr. President, there are two dreams of empire, two conceptions of destiny, two avenues of power presented to the gaze of the American people to-day. One is held out to us in the far East and in the West Indies as the result of military conquest; the other is held out to us in Hawaii by the children of the Puritans, who have redeemed those beautiful islands from barbarism and cannibalism, and show them as the harvest of seventy years of Christian and peaceful labor. The first is that which has been the ruin of the empires and republics of former times. It is that which has brought Spain to her wretched condition to-day. The second allures us in the path we have followed since liberty entered this hemisphere by the gates of Jamestown and of Plymouth, and the little handful of Puritans and Cavaliers came in, who have grown and multiplied until our temple covers a continent and its portals are upon both the seas. One is the dominion over subject people, and the rule over vassal states. It is forbidden to us by our Constitution, by our political principles, by every lesson of our own history and of all history.

The other is the invitation to willing and capable people to share with us our freedom, our self-government, our equality, our education, and the transcendent sweets of civil and religious liberty. In that path we have never yet known failure. Let us tread it, if need be, without fear and without flinching. Let us, if need be, take some risks in the holy cause of liberty. Let the light which illumines the continent shine also upon the sea.

Mr. President, the wise man in that sublimest of poems, the Book of Ecclesiastes, describes to us the decay of human strength and hope in old age. He tells us that "the keepers of the house shall tremble"; that "they shall be afraid of that which is high, and fears shall be in the way." This applies also with a still more terrible and emphatic significance to the disease and decline of states. The country that hath no growth in it hath no hope in it. That people that loses its courage loses with it everything else that is worth having.

We have made in the past acquisitions and additions into our empire to which that of the Hawaiian Islands is but as a drop in a bucket—is but as the dust that hangs upon the scales. We have never been afraid to venture our ship of state upon any voyage or in any sea.

We sailed wherever ship could sail;
We founded many a mighty state;
Pray God our greatness may not fail
Through craven fears of being great.

I think we can find no safer guide than the chart of our own experience. What has been good for us in the past will be good for us again in the future.

Some of our passengers will always be seasick. There will never to them be blue in the sky, or freshness in the gale, or light in the horizon, or hope in the heart. Our brave young country, especially in this Fourth of July season, will not look for its leadership to such counselors. We have never from the beginning looked to such counselors. Our New England prophet and poet¹ has struck for every American heart the note which belongs to the season and the opportunity:

O tenderly the haughty day
Fills his blue urn with fire;
One morn is in the mighty heaven,
And one in our desire.

Mr. President, it is not distance; it is not numbers; it is not vast space by sea or land; it is not hostile or rival nations that we have at this time to dread. It is a departure from American principles. It is the temptation to substitute for our fundamental law of political equality and our fundamental rule of political justice the dream of empire, the greed of gain, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life. I would solve this problem which is upon us to-day. I would solve the greater and more dangerous problem which is upon us in the near future by this simple rule:

We will acquire no territory; we will annex no people; we will aspire to no empire or dominion, except where we can reasonably expect that the people we acquire will, in due time and on suitable conditions, be annexed to the United States as an equal part of a self-governing republic.

The joint resolution was passed on July 6, 1898, by a vote of 42 to 21. It was approved by President McKinley on July 8.

THE rebellion in the Philippines against Spain arose largely from the enmity of the people toward the monastic orders, which, by their ownership of great tracts of the best land in the islands, and their exemption from taxes, constituted an oppressive monopoly.

The nucleus of a revolutionary organization was afforded by secret societies, composed of anti-clerical Filipinos. The Masonic Order was introduced about 1860, and from its lodges sprang various patriotic secret organizations, one of which, the Philippine League, founded by the patriot and author, Dr. José Rizal, had for its chief purpose the expulsion of the friars. Rizal was expelled from the islands in 1887, and his writings were proscribed. However, the Spanish Governor-General of the Philippines, Primo de Rivera, virtually promised him immunity if he returned, and he did so in 1892. He was arrested almost on his arrival at Manila, and convicted of having organized a secret revolutionary society known as the Katipunan. Banished to a remote place in the Philippines, he was permitted in 1896 to set out for Cuba to act as physician for the sufferers from an epidemic there of yellow fever.

At this juncture the Katipunan broke out into open rebellion against Spanish rule, and the authorities seized Rizal on his way to Cuba, and, bringing him to Manila, after a mock trial, shot him on December 30, 1896, as a traitor.

The insurrection centered in the province of Cavité, which was held by the rebels under Andrés Bonifacio, the head of the Katipunan, and Emilio Aguinaldo, its recognized military genius, until the spring of 1897, when, reinforcements having come from Spain to the Spanish general, Lachambre, this officer was able completely to shatter the organized power of the insurgents. The rebel leaders, however, contrived to extort from the Governor-General a compact known as the Treaty of Biacnabat, by which they received half of a promised payment of $800,000, and were permitted to withdraw from the country. They went to Hong Kong, a British island to the north, and, forming a Filipino Junta, continued their revolutionary plans. Fomented by them, and assisted by the money which had been received under the treaty, a patriotic rising took place in Luzon north of Manila in March, and in Cebú in April. Native soldiers in the Spanish army deserted to the rebels in regiments, but owing to lack of arms the rebellion remained ineffective.

Upon the day that war began between Spain and the United States Aguinaldo appeared in Singapore, and on April 24, 1898, had a conference there with United States Consul-General Pratt, the result of which was that Commodore George Dewey of the Asiatic Squadron of the American Navy arranged for Aguinaldo to follow the squadron to Manila.

On May 1, 1898, Commodore Dewey annihilated the Spanish fleet in the Bay of Manila. Aguinaldo arrived at Cavité on May 19 in the United States dispatch boat McCulloch. He had an interview with Dewey, the result of which was that the Commodore supplied him with arms for the insurgents, whose number was increasing greatly every day by deserters from the Spanish forces, and by volunteers.

By the time General Wesley Merritt arrived with troops from the United States late in July Aguinaldo had retaken the province of Cavité, and, with the aid of Dewey, was investing Manila.

The city was surrendered on August 13, and was held by the American troops, while Aguinaldo and his Filipinos rapidly subdued the various provinces of the islands.

On August 12, the day before the surrender of Manila, a peace protocol was signed between representatives of the Governments of Spain and the United States at Washington, providing that the United States should hold the city and bay of Manila until a treaty of peace, negotiations concerning which were arranged, should be signed between the warring nations. On October 31, after the Peace Commission had been in session at Paris for a month, the United States commissioners, under orders from the Government at Washington, demanded the cession of the Philippines. In the treaty, which was signed on December 10, 1898, Spain ceded the entire archipelago of the Philippine Islands to the United States, and our Government agreed to pay Spain $20,000,000.¹

Aguinaldo had no anticipation of such a disposition of the Philippines. Indeed, before the peace protocol was signed, he had organized a Filipino Government (on June 12), promulgated a provisional constitution (on June 23) in which independence was announced as the object of the revolution, and (on August 6) appealed to the nations of the world for recognition of this independence, and of the belligerency of his government, basing his claims on his conquest of the fifteen chief Filipino provinces.

¹ Thomas B. Reed [Me.], Speaker of the House, who was opposed to the annexation of the Philippines, declared that we had purchased the 10,000,000 inhabitants of the islands—"yellow-bellies" he called them—at $2 a head.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY

SENATE, DECEMBER 10, 1898-FEBRUARY 14, 1899

Anticipating the action of the Peace Commission on the very day of the Treaty of Paris, George G. Vest (Missouri) moved the following joint resolution in the Senate:

That under the Constitution of the United States no power is given to the Federal Government to acquire territory to be held and governed permanently as colonies.

The colonial system of European nations cannot be established under our present Constitution, but all territory acquired by the Government, except such small amount as may be necessary for coaling stations, correction of boundaries, and similar governmental purposes, must be acquired and governed with the purpose of ultimately organizing such territory into States suitable for admission into the Union.

Senator Vest supported the resolution on the 12th. When eminent statesmen, he said, were ridiculing the "swaddling clothes" made by Washington and Madison for the country, and revolutionizing a system of government under which we had grown great and prosperous, it was high time to examine into the powers of Congress in regard to the acquisition and government of new territory, and to ask whether the American people were ready to accept the new evangel of imperialism.

What is the colonial system against which our fathers protested? It is based upon the fundamental idea that the people of immense areas of territory can be held as subjects, never to become citizens; that they must pay taxes and be impoverished by governmental exaction without having anything to do with the legislation under which they live.

How can it be true that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed when millions of human beings are held without their consent as mere chattels, to be disposed of as the sovereign power of the mother country may choose?

But, Mr. President, passing from this historic argument, which seems to me unanswerable, the highest tribunal in the United States, the Supreme Court, has settled this question by a unanimous opinion, when the ablest lawyers in the country were upon the bench. I am now about to refer to a decision which I know will revive bitter memories unless those memories be happily eliminated by recent events. In the case of Dred Scott against Sanford, Chief Justice Taney, delivering the opinion of the court, which constituted the opinion of seven of the justices out of nine, effectually disposed of the question as to whether the United States could hold colonies without the intention or prospect of forming them into States and admitting them into the Union.

The portion of the opinion that I shall now ask the Secretary to read was acquiesced in by the nine justices of that court, including Justices McLean and Curtis, who disagreed with the majority in regard to the slavery question, but acquiesced in the opinion that this Government had no right to adopt the colonial system of Europe.

Here Senator Vest repeated the argument already given by Representative Dinsmore in the case of the annexation of Hawaii (see page 186).

Mr. President, I assert that the fundamental idea of our American institutions is citizenship to all within the jurisdiction of the Government, except to the Indian tribes. The Constitution makes an exception as to the Indians because their position was sui generis and entirely anomalous. As the Supreme Court said in the Cherokee-Georgia case, the Indian tribes are independent dependencies. We have recognized their right to their own tribal customs and institutions, and at the same time put upon them non-intercourse laws, and exercised by legislation the power of control.

With that single exception, all the people of the United States within its jurisdiction are to be citizens, and, whatever may be said in regard to the older inhabitants of new territory that may be acquired by this country, it is beyond any question, under the terms of the fourteenth amendment, that all children born within our jurisdiction, no matter what the condition of the parent is as to citizenship, are made citizens of the United States and of the State in which they reside.

NELSON W. ALDRICH [R. I.].—Does that apply to the Chinese?

SENATOR VEST.—Most unquestionably; and the Supreme Court so decided in March last in the case of Woo Chin, the opinion being delivered by Justice Gray, of Massachusetts. The Supreme Court in that case not only decided that the child of Chinese parents born in this country becomes a citizen, but that Congress cannot take away the right of citizenship conferred by the Constitution on account of birth. If this is not settled by adjudication, nothing can be settled by the Supreme Court of the United States.

To return to the requirements of the fourteenth amendment. When we take jurisdiction over millions of acres of what is now foreign soil and bring under our jurisdiction millions of human beings, whatever may be the case as to the citizenship of the older inhabitants of those areas, their children born under the jurisdiction of the United States become citizens, entitled to all the immunities and privileges of citizenship. If this amendment does not provide this, it is absolutely nugatory and void, and so also is the fifteenth amendment, which provides that all citizens shall be entitled to the right of suffrage.

But, Mr. President, it is said that we have abandoned by precedent the application of the doctrine announced in this resolution, and that we have by legislative action admitted the right of the United States to acquire by purchase large tracts of territory to be held as colonies. I emphatically, distinctly, and without qualification deny that assertion.

When did we admit territory to be held as colonies? Was the Northwestern Territory brought under the jurisdiction of the United States in order to be held as a colony? The author of the Declaration of Independence was the author of the ordinance of 1784, called the ordinance of 1787, and in it provision was made that as soon as 5,000 white male inhabitants should be found in that territory they should have the right to elect a territorial legislature and pass laws for their own government.

Who will be reckless enough to say that Thomas Jefferson, who penned the words "All governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," would have degraded and branded with infamy that princely gift of Virginia to the country by inserting in it the hateful principle of the colonial system of Europe?

Did we depart from the doctrine I am here to-day advocating with all my strength when we admitted Louisiana, during the presidency of Jefferson, to the jurisdiction of the United States? In the act of cession from France is found a provision that as soon as possible the inhabitants of that territory shall be made citizens of the United States and the territory itself admitted as a State of the Union.

Did we give up the doctrine when Florida was purchased from Spain and brought within the jurisdiction of the United States? In the act of cession from Spain is contained the same provision that is found in the Louisiana purchase.

But we are told by eminent statesmen that when Alaska came into the Union we surrendered this whole question. When Russia ceded Alaska to the United States the same provision was put in the act of cession, that the inhabitants of Alaska as soon as possible should become citizens and Alaska be admitted as a State of the Union.

Mr. Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in what is known as the Alaska case (steamer Coquitlam vs. United States), declared that Alaska was a territory of the United States.

When, where, how have we ever surrendered the great doctrine that this is a confederation of sovereign States and that there are known to the Constitution but four forms of government—first, the National Government, then the State government, then the territorial government, and then the District of Columbia? It is not possible to point out any other form of government under the Constitution.

But, Mr. President, I come now to the great, overwhelming, and crucial argument made by the expansionists in favor of this new system. Driven in desperation by the earlier history of our country and by the decisions of the Supreme Court to their last alternative, they claim that the territories, whether organized or unorganized—and newly acquired—are not subject to the Constitution of the United States, and that the Constitution applies alone to the States of the Union. They quote in support of this monstrous proposition—for I can denominate it nothing else—the great name and authority of Daniel Webster. I am sorry to say that Mr. Webster, for whose learning and ability I have the highest respect, permitted himself, in an acrimonious debate with John C. Calhoun on the government of the territory acquired from Mexico in 1848, to say that the Constitution did not apply to the territories.

I repeat that I have the highest respect for Mr. Webster as a lawyer and statesman, but the proposition he advanced is so monstrous as not to permit discussion. To say that the citizens of a Territory under the jurisdiction of the United States are excluded from the provisions of the Bill of Rights is to say that they are at the mercy of Congress without limitation; that Congress can prohibit the free exercise of religion; take away the right of trial by jury; take away immunity from unreasonable search and seizure, and destroy all the great rights guaranteed by the Bill of Rights to all the people of the United States. For what did our fathers struggle?

For what did their descendants labor and toil if this monstrous proposition be now true? Fortunately for the country, and for human rights and constitutional liberty, the Supreme Court of the United States has, in repeated adjudications, settled this question, finally and forever against Mr. Webster's position. As early as January, 1820, Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court, in the case of Loughborough, decided emphatically that the term "United States" in the Constitution meant the States and the Territories and every foot of the soil over which the flag of our country floats.

Yet, despite this decision, it is now told us that one rate of taxation can prevail in the Territories and another in the States, notwithstanding the provision of the Constitution that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the whole United States.

In 101 United States, in the case of National Bank v. The County of Yankton, Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, said:

All territory within the jurisdiction of the United States not included in any State must necessarily be governed by or under the authority of Congress. The Territories are but political subdivisions of the outlying dominion of the United States. Their relation to the general Government is much the same as that which counties bear to the respective States, and Congress may legislate for them as a State does for its municipal organizations. The organic law of a Territory takes the place of a constitution as the fundamental law of the local government. It is obligatory on and binds the Territorial authorities; but Congress is supreme, and for the purposes of this department of its governmental authority has all the powers of the people of the United States, except such as have been expressly or by implication reserved in the prohibitions of the Constitution.

It may do for the territories what the people, under the Constitution of the United States, may do for the States.

Mr. President, now what can the people of the United States do for a State? Can they take away from the people of a State the right of trial by jury, or of habeas corpus, or immunity from illegal arrest and search and seizure, or take away from them the right of religious opinion?

I shall not weary the Senate by reading other opinions, but I will refer to them, and Senators can satisfy themselves. In the case of Thompson vs. Utah, decided in 170 United States, the Supreme Court unanimously declared that the right of trial by jury in criminal cases to the people of a Territory could not be taken away by Congress and that the powers of Congress as to Territories were limited and defined by the Constitution of the United States and not unrestricted. They made the same decision in two other cases, the American Publishing Society vs. Fisher, 166 United States, 464, and Crandall vs. Nevada, 6 Wallace, 35. There can no longer be a question, nor the shadow of a question, that the Congress of the United States is as to the Territories limited in its action by the Federal Constitution.

Mr. President, I have not controverted, and do not propose to controvert, the power of the Federal Government to acquire and govern territory, but I do deny that territory can be acquired to be held as colonies, peopled by millions of subjects not citizens, with no hope or prospect of its ever becoming a State of the Union. I may be answered by the statement that this is not a practical question, because Congress has exclusive jurisdiction as to the admission of States, and it may hold this territory indefinitely without any idea of its ever coming into the Union; in other words, establish under cover and by fraud upon the Constitution the colonial system which the Constitution never contemplated.

I will not insult my brother Senators by supposing that they would thus evade the spirit and letter of the Constitution, and, when believing that the colonial system is not possible in this country, would vote to take in vast tracts of land inhabited by barbarians, intending never to allow this territory to come in as a State, but to hold it for commercial advantages alone, in violation of the fundamental law of the land. Whenever the Congress of the United States becomes so degraded as to do this, it matters little what occurs in the future. It is simply a question of time when the disastrous end will come.

Sir, we are told that this country can do anything, Constitution or no Constitution. We are a great people—great in war, great in peace—but we are not greater than the people who once conquered the world, not with long-range guns and steel-clad ships, but with the short sword of the Roman legion and the wooden galleys that sailed across the Adriatic. The colonial system destroyed all hope of republicanism in the olden time. It is an appanage of monarchy. It can exist in no free country, because it uproots and eliminates the basis of all republican institutions, that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

I know not what may be done with the glamor of foreign conquest and the greed of the commercial and money-making classes in this country. For myself, I would rather quit public life and would be willing to risk life itself rather than give my consent to this fantastic and wicked attempt to revolutionize our Government and substitute the principles of our hereditary enemies for the teachings of Washington and his associates.

ORVILLE H. PLATT [Conn.].—Mr. President, I am not prepared to-day to speak on the joint resolution and answer the claims made by the Senator from Missouri, but, lest my silence should be misconstrued, I wish to state that I do not recognize the doctrine as announced in a dictum of the Supreme Court in a case in which, as the Senator says, all the rest of the decision has been set aside by the arbitrament of war, nor do I acquiesce in the law as stated by the Senator from Missouri.

I believe, Mr. President, that the right to acquire territory is an inherent right in the nation. That has been the doctrine of the nation ever since the Louisiana treaty was ratified and confirmed. It has been recognized by the courts that the right to acquire territory is an inherent right, because we are a nation, a right of sovereignty, and it has no limitations either in the Constitution or elsewhere. I shall hope to show, before action is taken upon the joint resolution, that the United States is not limited in its right to acquire territory by any restriction whatever; that if we are fighting a war and conquering territory, we need not stop as we go along and have our armies cease operations until there has been some declaration somewhere that we are going to make States of that territory.

SENATOR GEORGE F. HOAR [Mass.].—I desire to ask my honorable friend, who stated what he thinks, whether he believes we have the right, under the Constitution, permanently to govern subjects of vassal states, or people who have no constitutional rights of their own?

SENATOR PLATT.—I believe that our power to govern any province, country, or land which we have the right to acquire is full and plenary, and is given by that clause in the Constitution which says:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

On December 21, 1898, the President sent a letter of instructions to the Secretary of War that the United States military government of Manila city and bay be extended as soon as possible over the islands.

In performing this duty the military commander of the United States is enjoined to make known to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands that in succeeding to the sovereignty of Spain, in severing the former political relations of the inhabitants, and in establishing a new political power, the authority of the United States is to be exerted for the security of the persons and property of the people of the islands and for the confirmation of all their private rights and relations. It will be the duty of the commander of the forces of occupation to announce and proclaim in the most public manner that we come, not as invaders or conquerors, but as friends, to protect the natives, in their homes, in their employments, and in their personal and religious rights. All persons who, either by active aid or by honest submission, cooperate with the Government of the United States to give effect to these beneficent purposes will receive the reward of its support and protection. All others will be brought within the lawful rule we have assumed, with firmness if need be, but without severity so far as may be possible.

It should be the earnest and paramount aim of the military administration to win the confidence, respect, and affection of the inhabitants of the Philippines by assuring to them in every possible way that full measure of individual rights and liberties which is the heritage of free peoples, and by proving to them that the mission of the United States is one of benevolent assimilation, substituting the mild sway of justice and right for arbitrary rule. In the fulfillment of this high mission, supporting the temperate administration of affairs for the greatest good of the governed, there must be sedulously maintained the strong arm of authority to repress disturbance and to overcome all obstacles to the bestowal of the blessings of good and stable government upon the people of the Philippine Islands under the free flag of the United States.

This proclamation caused the relations between the Filipino and American troops in the Philippines to become greatly strained, and in Washington as well as Manila it was felt that a serious outbreak on the part of Aguinaldo might be expected at any moment.

On January 9, 1899, Senator Hoar supported the joint resolution. He announced that it was with pain he disagreed with his party associates.

I am one of those men who believe that little that is great or good or permanent for a free people can be accomplished without the instrumentality of party. And I have believed religiously, and from my soul, for half a century, in the great doctrines and principles of the Republican party. I stood in a humble capacity by its cradle. I do not mean, if I can help it, to follow its hearses. I am sure I render it a service; I am sure I help to protect and to prolong the life of that great organization, if I can say or can do anything to keep it from forsaking the great principles and doctrines in which alone it must live or bear no life. I must, in this great crisis, discharge the trust my beloved Commonwealth has committed to me according to my sense of duty as I see it. However unpleasant may be that duty, as Martin Luther said, "God help me. I can do no otherwise."

I am to speak for my country, for its whole past and for its whole future. I am to speak to a people whose fate is bound up in the preservation of our great doctrine of constitutional liberty. I am to speak for the dead soldier who gave his life for liberty that his death might set a seal upon his country's historic glory. I am to speak for the Republican party, all of whose great traditions are at stake, and all of whose great achievements are in peril.

Certainly, Mr. President, no man can ever justly charge me with a lack of faith in my countrymen, or a lack of faith in the principles on which the Republic is founded. I have, in my humble way, defended the character of the American people, their capacity for self-government, the character of the great legislative bodies through which that government is exercised, whenever and by whomsoever assailed. I do not distrust them now. But the strongest frame may get mortal sickness from one exposure; the most vigorous health or life may be destroyed by a single drop of poison, and what poison is to the human frame the abandonment of our great doctrine of liberty will be to the Republic.

Professor Creasy, in his "Six Decisive Battles of the World," well says:

There has never been a republic yet in history that acquired dominion over another nation that did not rule it selfishly and oppressively. There is no single exception to this rule either in ancient or modern times. Carthage, Rome, Venice, Genoa, Florence, Pisa, Holland, and republican France, all tyrannized over every province and subject state where they gained authority.

My excellent friend, the honorable Senator from Connecticut, taunts me with doubt and fear. Well, Mr. President, I do not think that I have been, am now, or am likely to be in a condition of much doubt in regard to this transaction. I am compelled to part company with the Senator. But I am very confident I am in the company of the framers of the Constitution, the signers of the Declaration, the men of the Revolution, and the great statesmen and lovers of liberty of every generation since until six months ago. As to fear, I will return the kindness of my honorable friend by suggesting to him that there is a fear, which I hope some time may possess him, which is defined by the highest authority as the beginning of wisdom. It is the fear of the Lord; the fear of doing wrong; the fear of usurping power; the fear of violating trust; the fear of violating the highest trust ever committed to mortal man—a restrained, delegated, and specific political power intrusted to him for the public ends, for the service of liberty and the benefit of the people.

The question before us is the greatest, I believe, that has been discussed among statesmen since the origin of government—certainly it is the greatest question ever discussed in this chamber from the beginning of our Government. It is: Have we the right, as doubtless we have the physical power, to enter upon the government of ten or twelve million subject people without constitutional restraint? Of that question the Senator from Connecticut takes the affirmative. And upon that question I desire to join issue.

Mr. President, I am no strict constructionist. I believe this country to be a nation, a sovereign nation. I believe Congress to possess all the powers which are necessary to accomplish under the most generous and liberal construction the great objects which the men who framed the Constitution and the people who adopted it desired to accomplish by its instrumentality. The men by whose hands Connecticut signed the Declaration of Independence, who in her behalf helped frame the Constitution, who represented her in either House of Congress in the great Administrations of Washington and John Adams, were of that way of thinking. But the man of them most thoroughgoing and extreme, Hamilton himself, Ellsworth himself, or Adams himself, would have looked with amazement, if not with horror, upon the doctrines asserted by the honorable Senator from Connecticut to-day.

Senator Hoar affirmed that every constitutional power is limited to the purposes of the Constitution as declared in its preamble.

Now, the liberal constructionists claim that everything which is done to accomplish any of these purposes, unless expressly prohibited, may be constitutionally done by the lawmaking power. And in that I agree with them.

The strict constructionist has claimed from the time of Madison that these objects can be accomplished only after ways and fashions expressly described in the Constitution or necessarily implied therein. And in that I disagree with him.

But when the Senator from Connecticut undertakes to declare that we may do such things not for the perfect union, the common defence, the general welfare of the people of the United States, or the securing of liberty to ourselves and our children, but for any fancied or real obligation to take care of distant peoples beyond our boundaries, not people of the United States, then I deny his proposition, and tell him he can find nothing either in the text of the Constitution or the exposition of the Fathers, or the judgments of courts from that day to this, to warrant or support his doctrine.

Further, the first article of the Constitution declares: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States." What becomes, in the light of that language, of the Senator's repeated assertion that powers not denied may be so exercised? Is not legislative power a power of sovereignty? Therefore, according to the Senator's logic, every power of legislation that any foreign government—legislative, constitutional, limited, or despotic—may exercise may be exercised by us. We have heard of limited monarchies, constitutional monarchies, despotisms tempered by assassination; but the logic of the Senator from Connecticut makes a pure, unlimited, untempered despotism without any relief from assassins.

The question with which we now have to deal is whether Congress may conquer and may govern, without their consent and against their will, a foreign nation, a separate, distinct, and numerous people, a territory not hereafter to be populated by Americans, to be formed into American States, and to take its part in fulfilling and executing the purposes for which the Constitution was framed, whether it may conquer, control, and govern this people, not for the general welfare, common defence, more perfect union, more blessed liberty of the people of the United States, but for some real or fancied benefit to be conferred against their desire upon the people so governed or in discharge of some fancied obligation to them, and not to the people of the United States.

I declare it can be demonstrated by the whole contemporaneous history and by our whole history since until within six months that it is a power which our fathers and their descendants have ever abhorred.

The idea that our fathers intended to clothe the Federal Government with such a sovereignty is as repugnant to me as the idea that because God created man in His own image He intended that he should be at liberty to commit murder or robbery or any form of bestiality because He had clothed him with the physical power to accomplish it.

*Expositio contemporanea maxime valet.*¹ The great contemporaneous exposition of the Constitution is to be found in the Declaration of Independence. Over every clause, syllable, and letter of the Constitution the Declaration of Independence pours its blazing torchlight. The same men framed it. The same States confirmed it. The same people pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to support it. There are undoubtedly, among its burning and shining truths, one or two which the convention that adopted it were not prepared themselves at once to put into practice. But they placed them before their countrymen as an ideal moral law to which the liberty of the people was to aspire and to ascend as soon as the nature of existing conditions would admit. Doubtless slavery was inconsistent with it, as Jefferson, its great author, has in more than one place left on record. But at last in the strife of a great civil war the truth of the Declaration prevailed and the falsehood of slavery went down, and at last the Constitution of the United States conformed to the Declaration and it has become the law of the land, and its great doctrines of liberty are written upon the American flag wherever the American flag floats. Who shall haul them down?

Now, Mr. President, it is quite significant that my honorable friend from Connecticut, with his customary candor and logical consistency, finds it necessary in support of his present position to assail and to deny that doctrine of the Declaration upon which our fathers based their right to make it and the right of the people of the United States to be a nation at all. I asked him whether, in his judgment, governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed; and he replied: "From the consent of some of them." I do not understand that in conquering and subjugating and governing this people he proposes to get the consent of any of them. So his modified Declaration of Independence will not quite help him out. He tries to find a halfway stepping stone before he gets from the ancient path of republican liberty which the fathers trod down into this modern swamp and cesspool of imperialism. But he has got to make the entire plunge without stopping on the way.

Mr. President, the persons who favor the ratification of this treaty without conditions and without amendment differ among themselves certainly in their views, purposes, and opinions, and as they are so many of them honest and well-meaning persons, we have the right to say in their actual and real opinions. In general, the state of mind and the utterance of the lips are in accord. If you ask them what they want, you are answered with a shout: "Three cheers for the flag! Who will dare to haul it down? Hold on to everything you can get. The United States is strong enough to do what it likes. The Declaration of Independence and the counsel of Washington and the Constitution of the United States have grown rusty and musty. They are for little countries and not for great ones. There is no moral law for strong nations. America has outgrown Americanism."

Mr. President, when I hear from some of our friends this new doctrine of constitutional interpretation, when I hear attributed to men in high places, counselors of the President himself, that we have outgrown the principles and the interpretation which were sufficient for our 13 States and our 3,000,000 of people in the time of their weakness, and by which they have grown to 75,000,000 and 45 States, in this hour of our strength, it seems to me these counselors would have this nation of ours like some prosperous thriving youth who reverses suddenly all the maxims and rules of living in which he has been educated and says to himself: "I am too big for the Golden Rule. I have outgrown the Ten Commandments. I no longer need the straight waistcoat of the moral law. Like Jeshurun, I will wax fat and kick."

Mr. President, if the United States forsake this doctrine of the fathers, who shall take it up? Is there to be no place on the face of the earth hereafter where a man can stand up by virtue of his manhood and say, "I am a man"?

In general, the friends of what is called imperialism or expansion content themselves with declaring that the flag which is taken down every night and put up again every morning over the roof of this Senate Chamber, where it is in its rightful place, must never be taken down where it has once floated, whether that be its rightful place or not—a doctrine which I shall have occasion to say before I get through is not only without justification in international law, but if it were implanted there would make of every war between civilized and powerful nations a war of extermination or a war of dishonor to one party or the other.

If you cannot take down a national flag where it has once floated in time of war, we were disgraced when we took our flag down in Mexico and in Vera Cruz, or after the invasion of Canada.

I have made a careful analysis of the constitutional argument of the Senator from Connecticut. He says:

First. That the United States is a nation, a sovereign;

Second. That as a nation it possesses every sovereign power not reserved in the Constitution to the States or the people;

Third. That the right to acquire territory was not reserved, and is therefore an inherent sovereign right;

Fourth. That it is a right upon which there is no limitation, and in regard to which there is no qualification;

Fifth. That in the right to acquire territory is found the right to govern it;

Sixth. That this right to govern it is also a sovereign right; and Seventh. That it is a right without constitutional limit.

The Senator from Connecticut proceeds to establish these propositions by citations from decisions of the Supreme Court; from Mr. Webster; from text writers, and from legislative precedents. Not one of these in the least helps him.

From these postulates the Senator reaches the conclusion that we have a right to conquer, hold, and govern a subject people of ten millions, without any constitutional restraint, such people being entitled to no constitutional rights, but subject to the uncontrolled will of the American Congress.

He says that he has faith in the Declaration of Independence. That declares that all men are created equal, and that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, which he interprets to mean "from the consent of some of the governed," although, as I think I have said, I do not find that any of them are expected to consent in this case;

That he wishes I had the same faith in the Declaration of Independence that the fathers had;

That he prays that the sound of the liberty bell from the tower of Independence Hall, still ringing in his ears, may proclaim liberty to regions never dreamed of by the Fathers.

That proclamation he will make by turning our guns and bayonets, if need be, upon the people of the Philippine Islands, compelling them to submit to a government whose powers, just or unjust, are not to depend upon their consent, compelling them to submit to taxation without representation, and depriving them forever of the equality which the Declaration of Independence, in which he still has faith, declares they were created.

The Senator thinks he finds a justification of his doctrine in the constitution of Massachusetts, which does not permit criminals or persons who cannot read or write to vote;

In the constitutional provision by which Congress exercises exclusive jurisdiction over the District of Columbia;

In the Louisiana treaty;

In the government of Territories before they become States; and

In the acquisition and government of Alaska.

Having completed this argument, my honorable friend from Connecticut joins his fellow expansionists in their enthusiastic chorus, reads me a lesson on fear and doubt and seeing lions in the path, and ends with a pious prayer for the faith and courage of the Fathers. The great doctrines of the Declaration and of the Constitution, which, I think, are lions in the path, he says are chained now, and that he can go quietly by them to his Malay Castle Beautiful in the distant Oriental seas.

He does not say what fathers. But I suppose, from his doctrine, he means Father Lord North, and Father George III, and Father Hutchinson, and Father Tryon, and the Tory fathers of Revolutionary times, for they are the only persons having any connection with the history of this country who ever believed one of his doctrines. He certainly does not mean Father George Washington, Father Thomas Jefferson, Father John Adams, Father Benjamin Franklin, Father Oliver Ellsworth. Their faces were all set inflexibly against his constitutional doctrines and his moral theories.

The constitutional argument for slavery was ten times as strong as the argument of the Senator from Connecticut. The slave master said he owned men for their good. The Senator from Connecticut proposes to own nations for their good. But the slave property had come down to the slave owner from his fathers.

To the constitutional doctrine of the Senator from Connecticut I desire to oppose mine. It is the doctrine on which I have acted and on which the party to which I belong has acted during the whole of my public life.

The sovereignty which can be exercised by the nation as a unit is only that which is necessary for accomplishing the purposes of the Constitution, and must be either expressly granted therein or necessary or convenient, in the judgment of Congress, to accomplish the purposes expressly declared therein.

All other sovereignty is reserved to the States or to the people.

The power to conquer alien peoples and hold them in subjugation is nowhere expressly granted, and nowhere implied as necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes declared by the Constitution.

It is clearly shown to be one that ought not to be exercised by anybody—one that the framers of the Constitution thought ought not to be exercised by anybody—

1. Because it is immoral and wicked in itself.

2. Because it is expressly denied in the Declaration of Independence, the great interpreter and expounder of the meaning of the Constitution, which owes its origin to the same generation and largely to the same men.

3. It is affirmed that it is immoral and unfit to be exercised by anybody—in numerous instances by contemporary State constitutions and the contemporary writers and authorities on public law, who expressed the opinion of the American people in that generation who adopted the Constitution as well as of the men who framed it.

The power to hold property is implied, whether that property be land or chattels. It exists because—

1. It is essential to the accomplishment of the purposes of the Constitution. That is undoubtedly as true of the right to acquire and hold property in land as other property.

2. The power also is clearly affirmed by the letter of the Constitution, Article IV, section 3.

This power to dispose of the territory or other property belonging to the United States, and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting it, and the power implied from that provision, to acquire and hold territory or other property, like other constitutional powers, is a power to be exercised only for constitutional purposes. We have no more right to acquire land or hold it, or to dispose of it for an unconstitutional purpose than we have a right to fit out a fleet or to buy a park of artillery for an unconstitutional purpose.

One of the constitutional purposes is the enlargement of the country by the admission of new States, and therefore Congress may lawfully acquire, hold, and dispose of territory with reference to the accomplishment of that great constitutional purpose, among others. It may also acquire adjoining or outlying territory, dispose of it, make rules and regulations for it for the purposes of national security and defence, although it may not be expected that the territory so acquired, held, and disposed of shall ever come into the Union as a State. That is, as many people think, the case of Hawaii.

Now, the disposing of and the making rules and regulations for territory acquired for either of these purposes necessarily involve the making laws for the government of the inhabitants—forever, if the territory is not to come in as a State, or during the growing and transition period if and until it shall come in as a State.

But, Mr. President, it is to be observed, and it should not be forgotten, that all this is a constitutional provision which looks chiefly at the land and territory as mere property. And it applies, so far as its terms and its general spirit and purpose are concerned, equally to public lands within a State as to those which are without it.

The framers of the Constitution were not thinking mainly and chiefly, when they enacted that clause, of lawmaking, of the government of men, of the rights of citizenship. They were thinking of public property. Two things about this clause are quite significant. One is that it is not contained in the article which gives Congress general legislative powers, but is sandwiched in between the section providing for the admission of new States and the section providing for guaranteeing to every State a republican form of government, showing that they were not thinking of conferring a general legislative power over the inhabitants, and were only thinking, so far as the inhabitants of a territory were concerned, of the transition or expectant period while they were awaiting admission to statehood. And, Mr. President, you are not now proposing to acquire or own property in the Philippines with dominion as a necessary incident; you are not thinking of the ownership of land there. You propose now to acquire dominion and legislative power and nothing else. Where in the Constitution is the grant of power to exercise sovereignty where you have no property?

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut undertakes to prove that we violate the principles of constitutional liberty and public law to which we appeal, and the principles of the Declaration of Independence which we invoke as interpreters of the Constitution, by saying: "Oh, you govern the people of the District of Columbia against their will."

Well, Mr. President, if it were true that our fathers, in dealing with 10 miles square, had inadvertently or inconsistently neglected the great doctrines and safeguards of human liberty, I think we should govern ourselves in our public conduct by the grand general rule and not by the little, narrow, contracted exception.

But there is no exception. The District of Columbia, from the necessities of the case, must be within the control of the National Government, whose seat is here. You cannot have with safety a mob, if there be one, disposed to break the windows of this Capitol—a population who in times of turbulence or of civil war or of great and bitter political strife are under another authority than that of the Congress itself. Suppose at the outbreak of the Civil War Virginia and Maryland had possessed their ancient jurisdiction over this little territory!

The Senator from Connecticut cites the acquisition of Alaska as a violation of the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence, and as affording a precedent for what he defends—the organization of a despotism over 10,000,000 people.

Mr. President, the acquisition of Alaska was defended by Charles Sumner, intrepid advocate and martyr of liberty, to whom the Declaration of Independence was as another gospel. The difference between his purposes and those of the men who defend this new policy is apparent. The closing sentence of his great speech on the cession of Russian America, made in executive session and made public by order of the Senate, covering 170 pages in his collected works, sets forth the benefit which its acquisition by the United States will confer upon Alaska:

But your best work and most important endowment will be the republican government which, looking to a long future, you will organize, with schools free to all, and with equal laws, before which every citizen will stand erect in the consciousness of manhood. Here will be a motive power without which coal itself is insufficient. Here will be a source of wealth more inexhaustible than any fisheries. Bestow such a government and you will give what is better than all you can receive, whether quintals of fish, sands of gold, choicest fur, or most beautiful ivory.

Is it true, my honorable friend from Connecticut, that before constitutions and before legislators all men are created equal, or is it true only of some of them?

Is it true that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights? Or is it true only of some of them?

Is it true that among those rights are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness? Or are these for some of them only?

Is it true that governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed? Or is it from the consent of only some of them?

Does Connecticut, who voted the other way in 1776 and in 1787, vote that way now?

Is it true that liberty-loving Vermont, who up to this moment has never uttered a thought or spoken a word or given a vote but for freedom, is to repudiate these golden utterances now? Why, Mr. President, I should think the insulted eagle would forsake her mountains if it were reported that her vote had been cast to trample under foot these mighty doctrines of liberty.

Are the thought and the spirit to prevail, and the interpretation we are to give the great document that which secures liberty to the people of the United States, or to people everywhere where the flag floats?

Are you to take the spirit which maketh life, or the letter which killeth in this hour of great national temptation in one of the greatest actions and greatest eras in all history?

When you raise the flag over the Philippine Islands as an emblem of dominion and acquisition you take it down from Independence Hall.

A year ago last December the President of the United States sent a message to Congress. In that message he said:

I speak not of forcible annexation, because that is not to be thought of, and under our code of morality that would be criminal aggression.

President McKinley, when he spoke, was not thinking even of honor or of power, inspiring and alluring as are honor and power. He placed himself and placed the American people on the stern, enduring, and perpetual rock of righteousness; that forcible annexation is not to be thought of; under our code of morality that would be criminal aggression.

Who shall haul him down? Who shall haul down the code? Who shall haul down the President?

Mr. President, that rock is like the rock of the Word—

Whoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken; and on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder.

There are other things found in this Declaration which the Senator from Connecticut wishes I understood as the fathers did, which I commend to his most respectful attention. In enumerating the wrongs inflicted upon this people by George III, the Declaration says that he "refused to pass laws for the accommodation of large districts of people unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature, a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only."

And now my honorable friend says that the same men who set their hands to that Declaration, and pledged their lives, fortunes, and sacred honor to its support, proceeded twelve years after to establish a government on which they conferred the power, exercised by George III, to destroy the right of representation in the legislature, to govern a people without it, and to forever extinguish and trample out that inestimable right, formidable to tyrants only. And not only that, but he is about, as I understand him, to proceed to vote to do it.

Further, our fathers in their terrible arraignment and indictment of the King for using these sovereign powers, which the Senator now claims belong to and are to be used by the President and Congress of the United States, says that the King had "made judges dependent on his will alone for the tenure of their offices and the amount and payment of their salaries"; and yet he proposes to make judges for 12,000,000 people dependent on the will of the President only for their tenure of office, and on the will of Congress alone for the amount and payment of their salaries.

Further, they said that King George had "kept among us in times of peace standing armies," and "quartered large bodies of armed troops among us without the consent of our legislatures." I suppose somewhere in this Capitol men are at work to-day in devising ways and means for a permanent standing army to be kept in these islands, east and west, without the consent of anybody there.

They said King George had combined with others to subject us to jurisdiction foreign to our Constitution and not acknowledged by our laws, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation for quartering large bodies of armed troops among us; for imposing taxes on us without our consent; for depriving us in many cases of the benefits of trial by jury; for altering fundamentally the forms of our government; for declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

The Declaration of Independence declares that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of the ends therein stated it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. But the Senator from Connecticut thinks we have the constitutional right ourselves to institute a new government for that people, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as shall seem to us most likely to effect our safety and happiness without giving them the slightest voice in the matter.

And, further, the Senator must think, although he does not say so—I suppose he expects to vote so—that we have the right to turn our cannon, bayonets, and ships of war and armies upon that people if they attempt to exercise this right, and prevent them from doing it.

Our fathers taught us the priceless value of national credit, and to keep free from the burden of national debt. We have thought until lately that our strength came in a large part from our unsullied and unequalled public credit. If we were compelled in self-defence to enter into a contest with the strongest or richest power on earth, our credit would remain unimpaired until our opponent were bankrupt. If in time of war or public danger we were compelled to contract debt, we have supposed that the only policy of dealing with it in time of peace was to pay it.

But now the Senator from Connecticut seems to contemplate that we shall embark on a permanent system of national expenditure which will put this nation under an obligation the equivalent of which will be a national debt greater than that of any other nation on the face of the earth. Have you reflected that a permanent increase of our expenditures of one hundred and fifty millions a year—which we cannot avoid, and from which we cannot withdraw—is precisely the same thing as adding to our national debt five thousand million dollars, capitalized at 3 per cent., which is more than the Government is now paying, and that a permanent increase in our expenditures of three hundred millions a year is the same as increasing our national debt ten thousand millions, capitalized at 3 per cent.? I think it can be easily demonstrated that the policies on which we are asked to embark involve a permanent national expenditure much larger than the amount I have named. Our civil list, already so enormous, must be enormously increased. Instead of taking from the people by fair competition, or even by fair selection, men to take their share in self-government, we must have in the future, as they have in England, a trained class whose lives are to be spent, not in self-government, but in the government of other men.

At the close of the nineteenth century the American Republic, after its example in abolishing slavery has spread through the world, is asked by the Senator from Connecticut to adopt a doctrine of constitutional expansion on the principle that it is right to conquer, buy, and subject a whole nation if we happen to deem it for their good—for their good as we conceive it, and not as they conceive it.

Mr. President, Abraham Lincoln said: "No man was ever created good enough to own another." No nation was ever created good enough to own another.

No single American workman, no humble American home, will ever be better or happier for the constitutional doctrine which the Senator from Connecticut proclaims. If it be adopted here, not only the workman's wages will be diminished, not only will the burden of taxation be increased, not only, like the peasant of Europe, will he be born with a heavy debt about his neck and will stagger with an armed soldier upon his back, but his dignity will be dishonored and his manhood discredited by the act of his own Government.

I do not agree, Mr. President, that the lesson of our first hundred years is that the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution are a failure, and that America is to begin the twentieth century where Spain began the sixteenth.

The Monroe Doctrine is gone. Every European nation, every European alliance, has the right to acquire dominion in this hemisphere when we acquire it in the other. The Senator's doctrine put anywhere in practice will make of our beloved country a cheap-jack country, raking after the cart for theavings of European tyranny.

Our fathers dreaded a standing army; but the Senator's doctrine, put in practice anywhere, now or hereafter, renders necessary a standing army, to be reinforced by a powerful navy. Our fathers denounced the subjection of any people whose judges were appointed or whose salaries were paid by a foreign power; but the Senator's doctrine requires us to send to a foreign people judges, not of their own selection, appointed and paid by us. The Senator's doctrine, whenever it shall be put in practice, will entail upon us a national debt larger than any now existing on the face of the earth, larger than any ever known in history.

Our fathers dreaded the national taxgatherer; but the doctrine of the Senator from Connecticut, if it be adopted, is sure to make our national taxgatherer the most familiar visitant to every American home.

Our fathers respected above all the dignity of labor and rights of human nature. The one thing created by God a little lower than the angels was a man. And they meant to send abroad the American flag bearing upon its folds, invisible perhaps to the bodily eye, but visible to the spiritual discernment, the legend of the dignity of pure manhood. That legend, that character, that fundamental truth, is written in the opening sentences of the great Declaration, and now the Senator from Connecticut would repeal them. He would repeal the great charter of our covenant. No longer, as the flag floats over distant seas, shall it bear on its folds to the downtrodden and oppressed among men the glad tidings that there is at least one spot where that beautiful dream is a living reality. The poor Malay, the poor African, the downtrodden workman of Europe, will exclaim, as he reads this new doctrine: "Good God! Is there not one place left on earth where in right of my manhood I can stand up and be a man?" Will you disregard every lesson of experience? No tropical colony was ever yet successfully administered without a system of contract labor strictly administered and enforced by the Government. I will not speak of the thirteenth amendment. In our parliamentary practice amendments fall with the original bill. This amendment will fall with the original Constitution.

Mr. President, this spasm of folly and delusion also, in my judgment, will surely pass by. Whether it pass by or no, I thank God I have done my duty, and that I have adhered to the great doctrines of righteousness and freedom which I learned from my fathers, and in whose service my life has been spent.

On January 10 William E. Mason (Illinois) spoke upon the following resolution which he had submitted on the 7th of the month:

Whereas, all just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Government of the United States of America will not attempt to govern the people of any other country in the world without the consent of the people themselves, or subject them by force to our dominion against their will.

SENATOR MASON.—Distinguished editors, writers, and statesmen tell me that this doctrine of governing people without their consent is a part of the platform of the Republican party, and they would discipline me because of my opposition. Who dares speak for the Republican party before its convention meets? Who holds in his hand the voice of that great body of liberty-loving men?

That party sprang from the womb of conscience; its great fight was for human liberty; and I prophesy that when the Republican party meets again in convention, if the delegates represent the conscience of its constituents, the old plank for human liberty will go in again, and the rafters of our convention hall will ring again and again, and yet again, when we declare, as we will, for independence in the Philippine Islands, as we did two years ago for independence for the people of Cuba.

Mr. President, I may be charged with speaking for rebels. When did they take the oath of allegiance to our flag? Name the hour when they have not claimed the right of independence. I am speaking one word for the Philippine Islands, but I am speaking two words for my own country. A boy treading upon an ant, his father said: "Don't, my boy; that is cruel." A learned man said: "The ant has no nerve centers and cannot suffer." "Ah," said the father, "I am speaking one word for the ant and two words for my boy." The one thing that has dwarfed the white race more than any other is its stooping to hold the black man down.

The law of compensation is as unfailing as the law of gravitation. There is no vicarious atonement for a nation's crime. For a hundred years in this country we piled up the wealth of unrequited toil of the slaves. We said, "This is the land of the free and the home of the brave," and sold women and children to the highest and best bidder for cash. We atoned for that crime with a bloody war.

You cannot govern the Philippine Islands without taxing them. You have not yet their consent to tax them. You propose again to tax without representation. Look out for tea parties. Those semi-social functions are liable to occur, for Yankee Doodle and Dixie and the Star Spangled Banner have been heard in the Archipelago.

But, Mr. President, we are told that the Filipinos can govern themselves. Where is the student of evolution who talks like this? Where is the man who has read who does not know that all government is made to fit the people and does not rise either above or below the people themselves? Who does not know the difference between "canned liberty," as the distinguished Speaker of the House [Thomas B. Reed] calls it, and the genuine liberty which we enjoy?

No, no; they cannot govern themselves. I was told so the other day by one of my beloved constituents, who never governs himself fifteen minutes at a time; but he was willing to take an assignment under the present Administration to govern all the Philippines at a fair salary. [Laughter.]

Cannot govern themselves! Every man who ever owned a slave always said: "Why, you poor, downtrodden slave, I own you for your own good, just to help you; I eat my bread in the sweat of your face just to keep you safe and sound from the ways of danger; and in order that I may continue to exercise this Christian duty do not let me catch you with a spelling book in your hand." [Laughter.]

Cannot govern themselves! And we are to say that to-day to the poor, God-forsaken, downtrodden people of the Philippine Islands; and, while we whisper the words of consolation into their ears that we are to give them liberty and life, we wink the other eye to the merchants of the country, and say: "We will extend commerce and sell more calico." [Laughter.] My distinguished friend suggested this morning that we ought to rake those islands with our guns and compel their people to wear shirts—not that they need the shirts, but to increase the demand for calico. [Laughter.]

We are to go to those people and say to them, notwithstanding Dewey said they are competent to govern themselves—he had handled them without guns; he had had no trouble with them; he had an understanding—we are to say to the people of the Philippine Islands, "You poor, God-forsaken creatures, this thing of sovereignty is a great thing; we bought yours somewhere across the water."

We are told by others that we must govern the Philippine Islands or abandon them and turn them back to Spain. Are we going to do that with Cuba? Oh, no. We have said to Cuba: "Go along, my little friend; there is your flag and there is your new republic; you are a friend of the great Republic and not its slave. We have helped to set your flag in the sky. Go on, my brave young republic, and while Yankee Doodle is whistled on this continent no foreign power shall ever invade your soil." Have we got to govern or abandon Cuba? Is that an honest excuse for grabbing something in violation of the common, honest law of nations?

Not one expansionist, not one who advocates the taking of these islands against the consent of the people, but what will tell you in the same breath: "Yes, it is going to be a great tax upon the people of the United States, but we will let the Filipinos pay that tax." They are to pay for our standing army. They are to pay the price of their own chains.

The Filipino is begging to treat with us. He knocks at our door to be heard. He loves his home as you love yours, sir, and as I love mine. He has breathed the inspiration of our history;

he asks only what our fathers fought for—the right to govern himself. There is no treaty of commercial value to the United States which could be suggested that he is not ready and willing to give us. Then it is not the expansion of commerce you want, but it is the expansion of the gewgaws and the tinsels of royalty.

Those of us who pointed out in the early summer this present situation knew that it meant war for expansion, war for conquest, war in the denial of our very proposition made in this Chamber when we declared war for the liberation of Cuba.

Let me give notice to you gentlemen who expect to be in politics that if this war goes on, and if we open the guns, as we threaten to do within ten days, upon the women and children in the island of Iloilo, the father in New England will begin to plead for the father in Manila, the mother in Illinois will begin to pray for the mother in the islands of the sea, and the fathers will vote as the mothers pray. God Almighty help the party that seeks to give civilization and Christian liberty hypodermically with 13-inch guns.

Are we to hear Aguinaldo called a cutthroat, a robber, as we did the poor Garcia within this very Chamber, because he fought for liberty and for his own country?

Oh, but they say Aguinaldo is a self-appointed chief. That is a way of their politics there. Look about the Senate, Mr. President, and who of us is here except originally upon his own invitation? [Laughter.]

Why, Mr. President, cannot we now make those people our friends, as Fox pleaded to make America England's friend a hundred years ago? Why not give them what they ask? Why should we stingily withhold the jewel of independence? Why should we not finish this war as we began it—for humanity's sake? Why not with a free and open hand give them what we have promised to give to Cuba, and say: "Go and obey the Divine injunction, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; go and learn by experience as we did. Profit by your mistakes, as we have done. Yes, we have saved your life, Filipino, and in the future we will protect it against all comers from within or without while our flag floats." Then we shall have kept our promise, and only then.

The insurgents held more territory than the Spaniards. We ourselves discredited the sovereign title of Spain. We ourselves have thrown a taint upon their possessions. We ourselves, in the face of the world, have thrown a taint upon all sovereignty claimed by Spain that was held by force. Yes, the insurgents held more than the Spaniards held within their grasp, but the Spanish were better traders. They knew how to buy and sell sovereignty better than the Filipinos, who, thank God, have not learned it, and we ought never to begin to teach them.

I am for the independence of the people of the Philippine Islands, as I am for independence of the people of Cuba. I am bound by a solemn promise made in this Chamber. Senators may higgie and say it is not nominated in the bond; but it is an implied promise, more sacred to an honorable gentleman than though it were written in blood.

Mr. President, let us say to them, as we have said to Cuba: "Go on your way; learn by evolution"—for that is the only way. "The use of power develops power. You cannot learn to swim outside of water. You may take lessons in swimming each summer, my dear Filipinos; we will send you 4,000 teachers of swimming; but you had better not get in out of your depth until you have taken a trial yourselves." Give them the independence they plead for, and we shall have kept our promise with the people of the world.

That we have assisted the Filipinos is undoubtedly true. That they assisted us is also true. We are told that Aguinaldo could not have got back there but for Dewey. Then Dewey put him back. Then under all the laws of common honesty he is an ally. Under all the laws of nations he is our ally.

What is the rule in ethics and good morals that leads us to take a different stand toward the people of the Philippines, who are more enlightened and better educated, have more newspapers and better schools, from that we take toward Cuba? Do you say, with the explosionists—I mean the expansionists: "We promised we would not steal Cuba, but we did not promise not to steal the Philippines?" Do you say, with Shylock: "Is it so nominated in the bond?" Will you tell me, please, how grand larceny and criminal aggression in Cuba become high Christian civilization in the Philippines? Is there some place in the Pacific Ocean where we change the code of ethics and good morals as we change the calendar and the ship's clock in crossing?

Mr. President, we cannot teach them to govern themselves. There is only one road to self-government. That is through the gate of responsibility, along the rough and rugged road of experience. You cannot teach liberty and self-government with a Mauser gun. Spain has tried it. She has believed in the expansion of territory, expansion of commerce by force, without the consent of the governed—and her ships are lying at the bottom of the sea.

My friends, have you forgotten the first rule proved by all history, without exception, that every square inch of territory taken by force has to be held by force? There is Alsace-Lorraine, between Germany and France. A standing army is kept there on both sides, and there is a continuing threat of war.

Driving in his carriage one day, President Lincoln alighted to turn a tumblebug to his legs. Replying to the cabinet minister within the carriage, he said: "I merely wanted to give him a show with all the other bugs of his class." He did not want to annex the bug or to tell him how to run his business. He did not seek to tax him or to tell him that he did not know how to govern his bugship. He set him along the highroad, along the line of the survival of the fittest.

Do you remember when Mexico was invaded by the French and Uncle Sam said: "Go; there is the Monroe Doctrine; Mexico is covered by the shadow of its wing," and the French soldiers left, and the brave little Republic of Mexico is slowly but surely climbing the ladder to a better education, a better civilization. Ah, Mr. President, that is the expansion I believe in. That is the imperialism the Fathers taught.

Venezuela, within three years, was assaulted by England—sought to be despoiled of her port of entry. Grover Cleveland was President of the United States, and he said to the greatest naval power of the world, "Stop!" You know the result. Venezuela, struggling along, improving in civil and religious liberty, is climbing higher and higher in the scale of civilization. We did not want to annex her when we spoke for her. We did not seek to tax and govern her, but we set her on the highroad of imperialism within herself, and that is the imperialism the Fathers taught, and that is the expansion I plead for.

Have you forgotten the scenes of twelve months ago within this Chamber, during the debate on Cuba? Do you remember when some of our distinguished colleagues read to us the charge by the Germans that we were seeking territory, that Uncle Sam was a sly dog, and that we were playing the part of the good Samaritan and had a compass under our wings to measure territory?

Have you forgotten how, in reply to this slander, we called upon the nations to look this way, and said: "Turn, all ye people of the world, turn and see America. She worshipeth at the shrine of Him who died to make men free. We unlimber our guns only for humanity's sake." Are we, by turning our guns upon the natives, to say by our conduct: "Look not this way; turn in shame from us; the money changers are in the temple of liberty; the jingle of gold and silver is heard within her walls; and we are now about to barter and dicker, to buy and sell the right to govern men and women and children without their consent."

But, Mr. President, we are told by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt]—"We are going to give them liberty, but we want them to have our kind of liberty. You must be happy, my dear Filipino, but happy in the way I tell you to be happy."

Let me read you the exact words of King George III, so that you may be sure to be on his side when next you spout for liberty for the Philippines. He was "desirous of restoring to the colonies the blessings of law and liberty." Oh, why was not Pecksniff born at that time to wear a crown? King George said exactly as the Senator from Connecticut said—he was going to give them the liberty of his kind; Connecticut liberty for the Philippine Islands. [Laughter.]

I am going to read you more about King George's liberty. You can insert it in the speech of the distinguished Senator yesterday, and you could not tell whether it was the Senator from Connecticut or King George who made it. "I am desirous of restoring to them the blessings of law and liberty equally enjoyed by every British subject."

You want to strike out the word "British" and insert "American" in the gentlemen's speech yesterday; that is all—"which they have fatally and desperately exchanged for the calamities of war and the arbitrary tyranny of their chiefs."

The king referred to Washington; the Senator to Aguinaldo. Was there not an answer on the same day from the lover of liberty, Fox—not because he loved us, but because he loved liberty? In answer to the King he said on the same day, rising in his place: "But, sir, how is this blessed system of liberty to be established? By the bayonets of disciplined Hessians?"

How is liberty to be established in the Philippines? You have answered by your proclamation. You say, peacefully if you can, but by powder if you must. I say that the boys in blue or gray, or whatever color they fight in, enlisted to make men free. They enlisted to fight the tyrant Spain. They did not enlist to fight the Filipinos, and the fairest thing you can do for the American youth before you set him to shooting the women and children of the island is to give him a chance to come home.

They are not Hessians. They are not hired as butchers. They heard the lofty talk of patriotism. We were all willing to die to make men free. You have no right, after having accomplished the liberty of Cuba, to send your officers 10,000 miles away to subjugate, to kill, and to destroy the innocent natives, whose only offence is the love of wife, the love of children, and the love of home.

I ask now for some one who shall follow me to answer, Did Aguinaldo go back there under the protection of our flag? If so, is he not an ally? If he is an ally, have we a right to settle terms of war and peace without consulting him and his people? Ah, but it was officially reported that our general in command [Miller] said to them, "Give up Iloilo," and they said, "No," and it is officially reported that our commander said, "Before we burn your town we will give you twenty-four hours to take your women and children out under the stars."

SENATOR HOAR.—I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question. Does not the same report, uncontradicted anywhere, say that at the time that notice was given the people of Iloilo had established orderly civil government, with courts, police officers, and means for the collection of customs and revenues in the islands?

SENATOR MASON.—Certainly.

SENATOR HOAR.—That is what they are going to overthrow.

SENATOR MASON.—We had never put our foot upon that island when the people drove the Spaniards out. Our flag has never been upon the island, either by conquest or in any other way. The people are governing themselves, and we are told that we are to give them twenty-four hours—that is not so long as Weyler gave them, in some instances—for men, women, and children to move out of their homes—homes as sacred as mine is to me or yours is to you. That is to be our action against people who have never offended us; against people who have been our allies in this struggle. At the point of a gun we are to conquer our allies, having defeated the main opponent of the fight. Shade of the immortal Washington, defend us! Tears of the martyred Lincoln, plead for this country at the throne of eternal justice!

But, Mr. President, we are told by certain distinguished gentlemen who are interested in commerce, and who talk one story in the counting-room and another one in the church, that we must civilize these people. "Thank God, we are not as other men. We must bring them up to our standard in civilization." I suppose that means clothes, religion, churches, schools, and the use of all the peculiar kinds of drinks that we indulge in. Food, raiment, and the color of the necktie must be involved.

How are we going to civilize them, Mr. President? Shall we show them how to run municipalities with boodle aldermen? I see that the great chief of that ethical society known as Tammany Hall has taken sides on this question. "Take the islands," says the Tammany chief. "Civilize them." Shall we send him over there to teach the untutored Filipino cleanliness and municipal reform? Shall we teach them to worship money and the man who has it, regardless of how he got it? Shall we send special instructors to teach them how to kill postmasters, their wives and children, if their complexion does not suit the populace? Shall we have illustrated pictures showing the works of the mob in Illinois, North Carolina, and South Carolina?

Why, Mr. President, since the signing of the protocol we have murdered more men in Illinois by the mob than they have in the Philippine Islands. Shall we take that branch of our civilization and force it upon them with a 13-inch gun? Shall we teach them how to organize trusts, so that when one gentleman is out on his yacht and is troubled with liver complaint or a trifle seasick he can float into Manila Bay and raise the price of sugar on 70,000,000 people?

Shall we teach them how to organize their legislature as we have this body, so that the minority can boss and not the majority? Shall we teach them the speech of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, that all just powers of government are derived from the consent of "some" of the governed? Shall we send them Lincoln's Gettysburg speech amended in that way—a government of some of the people, by a part of the people, for a few of the people?

Gentlemen may say I belittle my own institutions. I do not. I should like to call attention to a few of the beams in the eye of the Americano that he may not stretch and break his neck reaching 10,000 miles away to find the mote in the eye of the Filipino.

No; I am not afraid of the result so far as my country is concerned. The distinguished Senator who sounded a keynote, the like of which has not been heard in half a century in this hall, may have just grounds for apprehension, but I come from a younger community. We have stood many things, as our country has. We went through the Know-Nothing craze, the Greenback fever, the free-silver tempest, and we have come up out of it all brave and strong. Why?

Why, Mr. President? Because our Government was built right. The just powers of the Government have been derived from the consent of the people. It is built on a rock that cannot wash away. It has within itself the wellspring of eternal youth.

And why, Mr. President, in the name of all that is generous, should we refuse the Filipino the privilege of lighting his feeble taper at the light and heat of our flaming torch?

Mr. President, why is it that to-day in the happy land of Cuba they are preparing to celebrate their Fourth of July? Have you not read of the processions, the whites and the blacks, the men and the women and the children, the starving reconcentrados, marching and shouting, singing their Marseillaise, singing their Star Spangled Banner? Why? Because we promised them independence, and by implication we promised the same thing to the Philippine Islands.

Why is it not so to-day in the Philippine Islands? Why are they gathering their men and their guns around them? Are they not saying to us, "This war means something more than a change of masters"? Aye, Mr. President, when some gentleman who loves liberty takes this floor I beg him to tell me the reason for treating them differently from what we propose to treat the people in the island of Cuba.

Oh, but gentlemen say there is something in annexation. There is the sale of rum and tobacco and calico. If you want the land, there is Canada; that is nearer. Take Canada. They talk our language. But when I say that to my expansionist friend, he says, "That is different." Oh, yes; it is different, and I will tell you the difference. It is the difference between the fleet of Victoria and the fleet of Aguinaldo.

I have seen men dying in hospitals without a murmur. They said to me, "I am going to die; it is all right, old man." I have stood by the open graves. I have seen the mother's tears dry and her face light up with hope—aye, with pride—when it was said to her that he died in a noble cause; that he died like the Master, for others. I have seen the tears dry and the face light with pride because her son was there, having died in a cause as sacred as the Nazarene's.

But, Mr. President, when your ships come home laden from Manila with the putrid remains of our boys, and you take the coffin to the mother's door, you never will dry her tears, you never will soothe her heart by telling her that you have extended your commerce at the cost of her dead boy.

I had hoped for some power of language that the old masters had who stood within this forum in the past. I have almost prayed for some magnetic power that I could draw you so close that I could write in living letters upon your hearts the word "Liberty." Not liberty, Mr. President, for your family as I prescribe it, not liberty for me or my children by your dictation, not Austrian liberty for Hungary, not Spanish liberty for Cuba, not English liberty for the United States, ay, and not American liberty for the Philippines, but universal liberty—the universal liberty for which our fathers died. [Applause in the galleries.]

On January 11 Joseph B. Foraker (Ohio) spoke against both the Vest and the Mason resolutions.

First in order we have the speech of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Vest]. He has three main propositions he insists upon in support of his resolution.

In the first place, he tells us that there is a historical argument against this Government holding colonies and governing them as such. Then he tells us that our fathers rebelled against England, and that the war waged by them was for the purpose of destroying the colonial system, and that the circumstances were such that it cannot be reasonably assumed or believed that they could have contemplated, after having themselves broken away from the colonial system, a continuation of it, and that they could not have created a government and invested it with power to continue colonial governments.

Mr. President, it seems to me that when we recall the facts attending the inception of the war of the Revolution, the nature of it in its beginning, and how it was subsequently changed to a different purpose, we have one of the strongest possible arguments to the effect that there was at least no prejudice in the minds of the Fathers against the colonial system of government. Take the Declaration of Independence which has so frequently been alluded to in these debates in the last two or three days, and read the recitation of grievances there set forth by the framers of that document.

You will not find there any complaint against the colonial system of government proper, but only against abuses of that system.

But, Mr. President, I call attention to another matter which is sufficient of itself to show conclusively that the Fathers who framed our Government not only were not seeking to establish a government that could not continue the colonial system of government, but that they had in view as one of the express purposes of that government the acquisition of colonies and the government of them at will as colonies.

In a letter to Henry W. Livingston, dated the 4th of December, 1803, and written in answer to an inquiry as to the power of the Government under the Constitution to acquire territory and the power of the Congress after acquisition to govern it, Gouverneur Morris wrote:

In my opinion, they can not.

Here is one of the framers of the Constitution of the United States—indeed, the very author of the section concerning territories—saying that the unquestioned power to acquire territory could not be exercised with a view to incorporating that territory when acquired into the Union as States at all. What further does he say? He speaks next of this clause of section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution investing Congress with the power to govern territory when acquired, and says:

I always thought that when we should acquire Canada and Louisiana it would be proper to govern them as provinces and allow them no voice in our councils.

MARION BUTLER [N. C.].—Does not Gouverneur Morris in the same letter state that, while that was his view and desire, yet the language of the Constitution did not go that far? Did he not admit that he did not dare to put that sentiment in express words for fear the Constitutional Convention would vote it down?

SENATOR FORAKER.—It is hardly that strong. He does say that he thought there would be opposition to it. He says:

In wording the third section of the fourth article I went as far as circumstances would permit to establish the exclusion.

To exclude territory from statehood.

Candor obliges me to add my belief that had it been more pointedly expressed a strong opposition would have been made.

SENATOR BUTLER.—Will the Senator from Ohio pardon me? Gouverneur Morris's letter is really a confession that the Convention did not understand his language as he meant it.

SENATOR FORAKER.—So be it. There is his language. He seems to have got in his work anyhow. [Laughter.] The language employed by Gouverneur Morris has been held sufficient by Chief Justice Marshall and by the Supreme Court, without exception, every time that question has been before that tribunal, to confer upon the Government the power intended by Gouverneur Morris to be conferred, namely, the power to govern territory that might be acquired.

The second argument advanced by the Senator from Missouri in support of his resolution is based upon the Dred Scott decision.

Mr. President, I have not the time to take the opinions of the nine justices of the Supreme Court, for each gave an opinion in that case, and review them at length and in detail to show that the Senator from Missouri is mistaken when he says that the nine justices of the Supreme Court in that case concurred in this proposition; but I state it as confidently as his statement has been made, without fear of successful contradiction, that, instead of the nine justices of the Supreme Court of the United States agreeing to that proposition, only one associate justice, Mr. Justice Wayne, agreed to it.

Look through the language employed in the respective opinions and you will find that not another justice touched upon that proposition in any way or form, and why? It was not necessary for the decision of the case. That, Mr. President, was a political case, and the decision was a political decision. It was a battle to the finish in the contest between slavery and freedom.

No justice could prepare an opinion which a majority would accept and allow to be read as the opinion of the court; and after they became fully aware of that difficulty and situation, it was then by the justices agreed that each member of the court should write his own opinion, and the court would content itself with an agreement of a majority of the members upon the judgment that was to be rendered.

And it was deliberately, Mr. President, agreed, upon the suggestion of Mr. Justice Wayne, that when they found themselves unable otherwise to agree they should undertake to go beyond the necessities of the case and give obiter dicta with a view to settling the political questions which were then disturbing the American people. Therefore what the Senator relies upon as a decision of the Supreme Court in support of this resolution is no decision. It has never been so decided by that court, and has never been decided so by any other court in this land, either high or low, so far as I have been able to ascertain.

The next proposition of the Senator from Missouri I can dispose of rather briefly. It is predicated upon section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution. That section contains two clauses. The first relates to the admission of new States, and the second relates to the government of Territories. Without stopping to go over it in detail, it is sufficient to say that the Senator reverses these clauses and reads the last as though it were first and the first as though it were the second or the last.

The Senator from Missouri then concludes that because of the reading of the text of the Constitution when so arranged it is clear to every intelligent layman that it was intended by the framers of the Constitution that no territory should be acquired except only with the present intention of ultimately making it a State.

Mr. President, the whole of that argument, it seems to me, falls to the ground when we reverse the order and read it, not as the Senator has read it, but as the framers of the Constitution read it. They chose the order; and when you restore the proper order, the order in which they placed these provisions, no such deduction can be rightfully made as that which the Senator from Missouri has made.

I come now, Mr. President, to the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar]; and, before I undertake in my humble way to say in answer to it what I feel moved to say, that I listened to it with the very greatest interest, as I always listen to anything that is spoken in this Chamber by the Senator. It was a speech of great ability, a speech such as only few men could make. But, Mr. President, when it is all reduced to practical propositions, it amounted, as I understood it, to simply this, that the Government of the United States has no constitutional power to acquire territory except only for constitutional purposes, of which purposes the Senator from Massachusetts seems to constitute himself the sole and exclusive judge.

In other words, Mr. President, it must be a constitutional purpose according to the definition given by the Senator from Massachusetts of the purposes of the Constitution. He specifies that it is constitutional under the Constitution for the Government, in the exercise of its constitutional power with respect to the acquisition of territory, to secure a coaling station, a naval station, a place for a post office or a custom house, and, remembering our experience last summer at the last session, he thought it was constitutional to acquire Hawaii, because necessary to the national defence. I did not understand the Senator to say, but I understood him to admit, that when this Government acquires territory for one of these constitutional purposes it is not necessary to secure the consent of the people who may occupy that territory and who must by the acquisition pass under our jurisdiction and be governed by us.

SENATOR HOAR.—I did not make any such admission.

SENATOR FORAKER.—I rather thought he had in mind the fact that when we were debating the Hawaiian resolution there was a protest filed here in this chamber by the Senator from Massachusetts, signed by more than 14,000 of the Kanakas, or natives of that island, protesting against the acquisition by the United States Government of the Hawaiian Islands and the extension of our jurisdiction over them.

SENATOR HOAR.—The Senator, I am sure, will pardon me?

SENATOR FORAKER.—Certainly.

SENATOR HOAR.—The people of Hawaii voted upon a constitution, and in that constitution they expressly authorized their legislative body to make provision for their annexation to the United States. Thereupon, in pursuance of the constitution, which had been in force for six or seven years, they proceeded to do it. Now, it is true that I presented a paper purporting to be signed (I do not know whether the signatures were or were not in every case verified) by a pretty large number of the Kanakas, but I believed then and stated then, and I believe now, that a majority of the citizens of Hawaii desired annexation to the United States; and that, in addition to that, everything in that island which could be called the germ of a national life was on that side; and so did the Senator from Ohio believe, I am sure.

SENATOR FORAKER.—Surely, but I had no constitutional trouble about it. Now, all the Senator has said is quite true: but the fact remains, and that is what I am calling attention to, that he did not state in his speech—if he did it escaped me, and I allude to it now that he may correct me if I should be corrected—that when we acquire territory for a constitutional purpose the consent has anything to do with it. Suppose we acquire a coaling station that is situated upon an island in the sea. It is a constitutional purpose for which we have to acquire it. Suppose the inhabitants be of such a character that it is essential to the safety of our interests there that we acquire the whole island, though there be a thousand, or ten thousand, or one hundred thousand, as in the case of Hawaii, or a million people or more, as may be the case as to Luzon. Suppose we acquired it for a constitutional purpose, a purpose that is absolutely essential to the national welfare, for the purpose of national defence, must we stop in such a case and secure consent of the population? The Senator's statement was in regard to Hawaii. Would we stop and jeopardize the national interests, hesitating to acquire a place necessary to the national defence, because somebody there had not been consulted? And suppose we consult the population and they object, or some of them object. What then?

SENATOR HOAR.—If the Senator will pardon me, it was not appropriate or apt to what I had to say the other day to express an opinion on that subject, but I certainly affirm that if it were desirable, convenient, or we thought it essential for our national defence to annex outlying territory, and the people there possessing that territory objected, I should consider the claiming it, annexing it, subjecting it, under those circumstances as a great national crime to be repudiated, denounced; and I should consider that the United States had better go down beneath the waters of the Pacific in honor rather than disgrace itself by doing that thing.

SENATOR FORAKER.—We understand from the Senator from Massachusetts what we did not learn from his speech the day before yesterday. We have learned that, according to his interpretation of the Constitution, possessions may be acquired for constitutional purposes and they may be acquired for purposes that are not constitutional in the sense in which he has defined those purposes, but that in all cases where territory is acquired, whether for constitutional purposes or not, the consent of the inhabitants of that territory must be secured before we can acquire it.

SENATOR HOAR.—That is not what I said. I said where there is a people there governing it. I do not mean to say if there is a continent of 10,000,000 square miles, over which there are five or six thousand savages roaming, incapable of national life, incapable of civilized life, incapable of government, not a people, not the germ of a people, never to become a people, that civilization and Christian government are estopped at the threshold. But where there is, as there is in the Philippine Islands, a people possessing a country—

SENATOR FORAKER.—I am not talking about the Philippine Islands yet. I am talking about the abstract question, and I want to go on with it.

SENATOR HOAR.—So am I. When there is, as there clearly is in the case I am speaking of, in the Philippine Islands now, a people, or to take the case of Canada, which has been cited here, remonstrating, I say it would be a great national crime, and our fathers said it would be a great national crime, for us to undertake to subdue and occupy that territory for any purpose of our own; and if we cannot live as a nation without committing that crime we ought to die as a nation without committing it. That is my doctrine.

SENATOR FORAKER.—Mr. President, as I now understand the Senator from Massachusetts, he does not think the march of civilization ought to be estopped for the want of consent. I suppose the march of the French from the mouth of the Kongo across the dark continent of Africa to meet the British in their march up the Nile to Fashoda would meet with the approbation of the Senator, without regard to consent, because in those regions are to be found not the kind of civilization which he has depicted to us as being found in the Philippine Islands, but the character of civilization that has been described as existing on those islands by the Senator from Louisiana [Donelson Caffery].

However that may be, whatever the exceptions of the Senator from Massachusetts may be, I take issue with him upon the general proposition that when you acquire territory for a constitutional purpose you must secure the consent of the people in acquiring that territory; and I want to follow that with this proposition, that it is not only an acquisition of territory for a governmental purpose when you acquire it for a post office, a custom house, a naval station, or a coaling station, but it is equally the acquisition of territory for a governmental purpose when in war you take it by conquest to despoil, weaken, and destroy your enemy; and it is equally the acquisition of territory for a governmental purpose when, at the conclusion of a war with a bankrupt nation, they have nothing with which to indemnify you except only territory, and you take it on that account. These are all constitutional purposes, and no consent of the people is necessary in any of them.

Mr. President, is it possible that this great and powerful nation of ours, powerful in peace and powerful in war, and to be powerful, we trust, in the commercial world, has no power to subserve its own necessary and constitutional purposes except only by the consent of the people who may for the time being be affected? I utterly repudiate any such doctrine.

Why, Mr. President, this Government, as I have undertaken to point out, has unqualified and unrestricted power to acquire territory by treaty. When you acquire territory by treaty, is not that acquiring it for a constitutional purpose? If the Chief Executive of the nation sign and the Senate of the United States ratify a treaty agreeing that territory shall be acquired in a given case, are we to assume that it was not a constitutional purpose for which it was acquired and that they have violated the Constitution? Is the purpose in such case open to question?

We were talking about Canada this morning. Suppose, Mr. President, the cordial relations, with which we are all so much gratified, that are existing now between Canada and the mother country and this country should be changed, and hostilities should arise between us and them, and it should be necessary for this country to march its armies across the border and take Canada, or part of Canada, by way of indemnity or by conquest, I ask would not that be a constitutional acquisition of territory?

If that be a constitutional purpose, and it be so constitutionally acquired, can we not govern it without stopping to count how many people there are and to know whether or not, if consulted, they would give, formally or otherwise, their assent to the proposition? It seems to me, with all due deference to the distinguished Senators who advance the proposition, that it is absolutely untenable.

Again, a great deal was sought to be made of the fact that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] answered an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] by saying that "the just powers of government are derived from the consent of some of the governed." That is strictly true. True, as the Senator from Connecticut pointed out at the time when he remarked it, minors are citizens of the United States, and yet we do not stop to consult them as to government; women are citizens of the United States, and yet, so far as the exercise of the elective franchise at least is concerned, they are not consulted.

There are many other instances: Abraham Lincoln was elected President in 1860 by a minority vote, and eleven States of this Union undertook to go out of the Union, and fight their way out, rather than stay and be governed by him. But Mr. Lincoln marshaled the armies of the nation, and after four years of war compelled them to submit to the Government which he had been called upon to administer. We did not have the consent of those eleven States.

But now, Mr. President, I want to pass all that by and hurry to a conclusion by calling attention to the fact that what has so disturbed the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators is without any foundation whatever as I understand the facts.

What is the excuse for talking about our intending to take a people who are struggling for freedom and liberty and independence and with shot and shell and sword and bayonet subjecting them to our power and our institutions and despotically governing them against their will? I have not heard of anybody wishing or intending to do that.

Mr. President, the trouble with the gentlemen is that they are talking about a theory instead of the condition that exists. What is the practical condition about which we are concerned, and what have Senators on the other side offered for the solution of that situation? We had war with Spain. The fortunes of war carried us to the Philippines. When the war ended, those islands either had to be returned to Spain or they had to be taken by other nations, as other nations might see fit to take them, or the people of those islands had to be left in a state of anarchy, without government—for they had none then and have none yet—or else they had to be taken by the United States.

The first proposition was, Shall we return those islands to Spain? The Republican convention of Massachusetts answered that, and the Senator from Massachusetts time and again on the stump in the campaign, as I saw him reported in the newspapers, spoke in indorsement and approval of the declaration of the Republican convention of the State of Massachusetts when it said these islands should not be returned to Spain.

SENATOR HOAR.—I wrote it.

SENATOR FORAKER.—You wrote it? [Laughter.]

SENATOR HOAR.—Yes.

SENATOR FORAKER.—Then I presume it is safe to assume that we can quote the Senator from Massachusetts as opposed to the return of the Philippine Islands to Spain.

SENATOR HOAR.—Yes.

SENATOR FORAKER.—Then I am sure as to that proposition we are all agreed, and rightly. So the first thing settled was that the islands should not go back to Spain. What, then, was to be done was the practical question. We had to deal with it in a practical way. I saw it reported in the newspapers, and I saw it stated upon other authorities, that before the Peace Commission and elsewhere the statement was made, and made on behalf of Aguinaldo and the insurgents he represented, that, if the United States did not take them, there would be almost all Europe on their backs the next morning before breakfast.

We did not want that; we did not have any moral right to allow any such thing as that. We were not very well acquainted as yet with the Filipinos, but we at once decided against both of these propositions. Who will say our decision was unwise?

What, then, was left? We had left on our hands the choice of allowing to them their independence and the privilege of establishing a free republic, which I do not understand anybody intends to deny to them, except only temporarily at the most, and allowing them to run all the risks of disorder and tyranny and misrule and mob rule, or otherwise we had to accept them and take care of them ourselves.

I do not understand anybody to be proposing to take the Philippine Islands with the idea and view of permanently holding them and denying to the people there the right to have a government of their own if they are capable of it and want to establish it. I do not understand that anybody wants to do that. I have not heard of anybody who wants to do that. The President of the United States does not, I know, and no Senator in this chamber has made any such statement.

SENATOR HOAR.—Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he claims that we have the right to do what nobody proposes to do? I ask if we have the right to hold them without giving them their independence if we want to?

SENATOR FORAKER.—Unquestionably, if we take the Philippine Islands, so far as the question of power is concerned, I think there is no question whatever—

SENATOR HOAR.—I used the word "right."

SENATOR FORAKER.—I used the word "right" also. I am speaking, however, of the legal right; I am speaking of the power; I am speaking of the right; I am speaking of the authority of this Government. When it comes to the question of policy, I will tell you in a minute what I think about that. I am now telling you what we decided—and I think the Senator will agree with me—that those islands ought not to be given back to Spain or given to any other European power which would partition them out. Only two things were left—to leave them to themselves at once and retire immediately, taking no responsibility whatever for the condition there obtaining, or else take charge of them by cession from Spain, asking the world to have confidence in this great Government, which has ever sought to do right, that we will deal with them as they should be dealt with.

As a result, the commissioners representing the United States at Paris have agreed upon a treaty—it has been published in the newspapers, and, therefore, I may speak of it freely, although the ban of secrecy has not yet been removed formally—according to the terms of which we are to take possession of these islands. Spain has agreed to that, and I suppose that the treaty in the near future will be ratified.

AUGUSTUS O. BACON [Ga.]—What is there differing between the condition of the people of the Philippine Islands and the people of Cuba which would prevent our making the same stipulations and the same requirements in regard to the Philippine Islands that we have made in regard to Cuba?

SENATOR FORAKER.—Just this, Mr. President: In the case of Cuba there was no complication whatever involving any other power except only the powers of Spain and the United States, and in the case of the Philippine Islands there are complications which I cannot speak of here in this open chamber with propriety, but which you will hear of when we sit behind closed doors to consider this treaty, which justify in the most complete manner, as I understand it, the action of the President in pursuing the course which has been pursued. In fact, no other course would have been a safe course for this country to pursue, having in view the object and the end not only of justice to ourselves in this controversy, but especially justice and right and the promotion of the good of the Filipinos themselves.

SENATOR HOAR.—May I ask the Senator one question, and I will not ask him another on this particular point on which he is discoursing? He says, as I understand, that, after the pacification of these islands, they should be restored to the inhabitants if they desire it and are fit to take control. Now, in that case, is or is not the American flag to be hauled down?

SENATOR FORAKER.—Well, Mr. President, that is a question which we will answer when we come to it.

SENATOR HOAR.—I thought we had come to it now.

SENATOR FORAKER.—What I have said in answer to the Senator is in the Record, and will show that I do not know of anybody who wants to take possession of the Philippine Islands and govern the people of those islands indefinitely against their will, by force of arms. I believe that the President of the United States and those who are supporting his policy in this regard are as much lovers of liberty and justice as is the Senator from Massachusetts, and I believe their love of liberty and freedom and independence will go out in the future, as it goes out to-day, to the Filipinos and all the rest of mankind, as certainly and as unerringly as his.

SENATOR HOAR.—My question to the Senator was not put as a mere piece of rhetoric or word playing.

SENATOR FORAKER.—There was not much rhetoric about it, I will admit. [Laughter.]

SENATOR HOAR.—I understand, whether rightly or not, that the gentlemen who have said the American flag shall not be hauled down where it has been once raised mean to have it understood that we are to hold perpetual dominion over those people whether they consent or no. That is what I understood, and I wanted to see what was the Senator's view about that.

SENATOR FORAKER.—Well, Mr. President, I will tell the Senator what my view is—

SENATOR HOAR.—Does the Senator mean, if the people of the Philippine Islands think it is for their happiness to try to govern themselves, that we should withdraw the power of the United States and let them do it?

SENATOR FORAKER.—I think when we come to consider the question of policy with respect to the Philippines, with the conditions there existing, their feeling of friendship, or their feeling of consent or of objection, will have much to do with determining Congress in that respect. I say I do not know of anybody, from the President of the United States down to his humblest follower in this matter, who is proposing by force and violence to take and hold those islands for all time to come. That is all I can say in answer to the Senator.

I am willing to trust the Administration; I am willing to trust the institutions of this Government and the people of this Government to do justice by the Filipinos. I have no sympathy whatever, Mr. President, and I do not believe the Administration has, with the war which some people talk about making on Aguinaldo and his followers in their struggle for liberty and independence, and I have no sympathy whatever with the talk that is indulged in in some places about making war on Gomez and his followers who have been struggling for the liberation of Cuba. In due time all that will be reached and considered. But I say now that this case, as every other case, must stand or fall upon its own merits and be measured by its own facts, conditions, and circumstances.

I know whereof I speak when I say that of the four things we had the choice of doing—giving the islands back to Spain, giving them to other countries, leaving them to anarchy, or taking them ourselves—the President acted most wisely when he concluded that we should take them ourselves; and he comes now and says, when he submits this treaty, "You put me to war; here is the result; here are these people; do with them as you like." It is for the Congress of the United States to investigate and find out about the islands of the Philippines, what kind of inhabitants they may have, whether or not they are capable of government, and whether or not they want government, or whether or not only a few want government.

What is the feeling of the population? You cannot tell that in the short time we have had to deal with them. At least I have not been able to satisfy my mind about it. I hope in the near future to be able to do so, and I hope that in due course, at no distant day, we can act intelligently, and I know we will act justly.

I wish, in concluding, to submit and have printed at the close of my remarks the order made by the President with respect to the Philippine Islands, dated December 21, 1898. I shall not stop to read it, but I submit it and ask that it may go into the Record simply that the spirit with which he has undertaken to do what he is doing may be made manifest.

Mr. President, I thank you. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

On the same day (January 11) Augustus O. Bacon (Georgia) introduced in the Senate the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House: First. That the Government and people of the United States have not waged the recent war with Spain for conquest and for the acquisition of foreign territory, but solely for the purposes set forth in the resolution of Congress making the declaration of said war, the acquisition of such small tracts of land or harbors as may be necessary for governmental purposes being not deemed inconsistent with the same.

Second. That in demanding and in receiving the cession of the Philippine Islands it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to secure and maintain dominion over the same as a part of the territory of the United States, or to incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States, or to hold said inhabitants as vassals or subjects of this Government.

Third. That whereas at the time of the declaration of war by the United States against Spain, and prior thereto, the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands were actively engaged in a war with Spain to achieve their independence, and whereas said purpose and the military operations thereunder have not been abandoned, but are still being actively prosecuted thereunder, therefore, in recognition of and in obedience to the vital principle announced in the great declaration that governments derive "their just powers from the consent of the governed," the Government of the United States recognizes that the people of the Philippine Islands of a right ought to be free and independent; that, with this view and to give effect to the same, the Government of the United States has required the Government of Spain to relinquish its authority and government in the Philippine Islands and to withdraw its land and naval forces from the Philippine Islands and from the waters thereof.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands, and assert their determination, when a stable and independent government shall have been duly erected therein entitled to recognition as such, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights secured under the cession by Spain, and to thereupon leave the government and control of the islands to their people.

January 18 Senator Bacon spoke to this resolution.

Mr. President, many who are reluctant to relinquish the Philippine Islands and who are at the same time unwilling to commit themselves to the doctrine of forcible annexation, who at the same time are not willing to put the Government in the position of ruling a people and subjecting them against their will, endeavor to reconcile themselves by the proposition that the government which we propose to give to that country shall be a good government, that it shall be a government which will better their condition, and that it will be one which in its administration will be consistent with free institutions.

That proposition, while of course a very much more considerate one than the extreme of the subjugation of a people, is still inconsistent with free institutions. Wherever a people are required to render an obedience which is involuntary, that requirement is an enslavement of that people.

There are different degrees of enslavement. If we put our yoke upon a people, if we rule them arbitrarily, if we send them governors and judges, if we make laws for them without their participation, if we enforce obedience to such laws by our army, then it is an absolute enslavement. If, on the contrary, we allow them free institutions, but at the same time prescribe to them that they shall owe allegiance to a government against their will, it is none the less an enslavement, although less in degree.

Mr. President, there is but one government among the leading nations of the earth that recognizes the right of self-government in a people, that recognizes that the consent of a people is an essential to their government, and when this Government practically denies that right, in the march of free institutions the hand upon the dial of the clock of the world has been set back an hundred years.

It is impossible to conceive that this Government will knowingly and purposely deny to a people the right of self-government; it is incredible that the liberty-loving people of this country will by force of arms impose a government upon another people against their will—a people who owe us no allegiance—who are struggling to be free. There is no public man who will admit that he is in favor of that proposition; there is no official, no Senator, who would not repel the charge, if it were made against him, that he would thus violate the right of self-government.

Mr. President, Senators argue as to the power of the Government to acquire dominion over foreign territory; they argue as to the duty of the Government to exercise this authority; but when the question is squarely put to them, when the issue is put where it cannot be evaded, "Do you favor the subjection of another country and the imposition of the power of this Government without the consent of that people?" they shrink away from the acknowledgment of such a position.

Mr. President, when we declared war against Spain, there was no way by which we could reasonably anticipate what would be the nature and extent of the sacrifice we would be called upon to make. Our cities were unfortified, and the newspapers were burdened with accounts of the great number and power of the Spanish men-of-war. We knew the fact that our young men who would respond to the call of arms would have to march in Cuba against more than 100,000 seasoned and disciplined Spanish soldiers. There was every prospect that we would have to undergo great sacrifice. There was every prospect that the soil of Cuba would be enriched with the blood of thousands of our young men.

Mr. President, when in that solemn moment we stood forth to dare and meet the necessary sacrifice, we called upon God and men to witness the purity of our motives and the unselfishness of our intentions. We declared in language almost identical with the language of the resolutions which I have had the honor to introduce that we did not propose to wage this war for aggrandizement, that we did not wage it for conquest, but that we waged it, or proposed to wage it, in the interest of humanity. We declared that when a stable government was secured in Cuba we would withdraw from that island and leave the affairs of that country to its own inhabitants.

That war has practically passed; the sacrifice which we anticipated was not exacted of us; the sacrifice in life was comparatively trifling; a special danger which we anticipated did not come, for behind all of the anticipations of possible sacrifice of blood and treasure there was the specter, which we now remember, although we may in the hour of victory have forgotten it, of the possibility of European intervention and a consequent world's war. Not only has there been little sacrifice, but there has been no intervention, and there will be no intervention, and we now know not only that we are to do as we see fit in Cuba, but that we are to work our will with the Philippine Islands so far as other nations are concerned.

What I desire, Mr. President, by these resolutions is this: That now, in the hour of our victory, in the time of our undisputed physical power, we shall accord to the Philippine Islands exactly what we proposed in the beginning, when the matter was in doubt, we would accord to the Cubans.

When the declaration of war was made the Philippine Islands were not within the contemplation of Congress. We were thinking only of the Cubans. But suppose when the learned Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller] introduced his fourth resolution as an amendment to those resolutions, in which we declared substantially what is declared in these resolutions, that the war was not to be waged for aggrandizement or for conquest, but that we proposed at the proper time to surrender the control of Cuban affairs to the Cubans—suppose when that amendment was proposed there had been a further amendment proposed excepting the Philippine Islands, and suppose we had said that, while we did propose to deal thus with the Cubans, so far as the Philippine Islands were concerned, we proposed, if we could take them, to do so, and to appropriate them to ourselves. With the feeling then upon us, with the intention which we then had to exhibit to the world the purity of our motives, can there be any doubt as to the action of Congress in voting down those resolutions?

If we had passed resolutions and made the exception as to the Philippine Islands, it would have utterly defeated the purpose of the disclaimer in those resolutions. If, on the contrary, we had expressed at the time our intention with reference to Cuba, and purposely withheld our expression of intention with reference to the Philippine Islands, it would have been the practicing of an unworthy deceit; and there is no principle which was involved in the disclaimer with reference to the Cuban people which does not also apply to the Filipinos; and the object I have in these resolutions, Mr. President, is that we may put ourselves in that position.

If the ideals which we had at that time required that announcement with reference to Cuba, if our past history required it, if the recognized principles of our system of government required it, they all equally require it with reference to the Philippine Islands.

In the first place, if we make this declaration, in my opinion it will be a practical settlement of all the questions which grow out of the adjustment of matters with Spain; in the second place, what is not less important, and, indeed, more important, it will relieve the Government of the United States from a most embarrassing position now occupied in the Philippine Islands.

We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that there is danger of collision in the Philippine Islands; we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that there is there an American army and that there is there a Philippine army, and while there is no declaration of war between them, while there is no announcement of hostile intent, each is animated by a different purpose and a different resolve.

Whatever may be the intention of the civil officers of the Government, the thought and feeling is in the minds of the American army that they are to take possession of the Philippine Islands; and there can be no doubt that an equal determination and thought is in the minds, not only of the Philippine army, but of those who direct and control it, that our army shall not take possession of the Philippine Islands.

Why is it, Mr. President, that the Filipinos refuse to recognize the right of the American troops to occupy the islands? Is it because they are hostile to American troops? By no means. Is it because they are unwilling that the United States Government shall assist them in the establishment of a government? Certainly not. Is it because they are reluctant that the United States shall hold possession until it can be ascertained whether or not they can be safely left without becoming a prey to other foreign governments? Assuredly not.

They would be glad to have the United States troops there with the avowal of such purposes from the United States Government, but they are opposed to the occupation of their islands by the United States troops because of the apprehension that it is the purpose of the United States Government to maintain permanent dominion in those islands; and whenever we shall, by such resolutions as these, say solemnly to the world that such is not our purpose, there is no longer any danger of difficulty. Without it, even as we sit here to-day, there is very great danger of it.

It is a famous saying that the shot at Concord rang around the world.¹ If that shot, Mr. President, which we dread and fear, should be heard at Manila, or in any other part of the Philippine Islands, it also will ring around the world, but it will carry no cheer to the downtrodden and the oppressed.

We hear a great deal about the obligations which we owe to the Philippine Islands. Some curious logic has been evolved on this question. Ordinarily the man who is under obligation is the one who has to contribute something for the benefit of the man to whom he is under obligation. The obligor is the man who bears the burden; the obligor is the man who makes the sacri-the alliance of the Filipinos, we necessarily recognized that they were in the prosecution of a rightful rebellion; we necessarily practically recognized them as belligerents.

They were there engaged at that time in a rightful rebellion, or they were bandits; they were, in the latter case, outlaws, and the United States authorities had no right to accept of their co-operation and their alliance. There is no refinement of reasoning, there is no finesse of logic which can get away from the conclusion that when we sailed into Manila Bay and recognized those people as rightful belligerents, put arms and ammunition in their hands, and accepted of their co-operation and their alliance, we not only became, by every high and honorable obligation, bound to see to it that the power of Spain was broken in the Philippines, but we fell under an obligation, no less imperative, that when it was broken the Filipinos should get the benefit of it, and not the American people. My contention is that we certainly incurred that obligation, and that it is the only obligation.

We went to war with Spain not for the purpose of correcting all the evils with which her people were afflicted; we did not undertake to be the great universal benefactor and to right all the wrongs of all the world. We went to war with Spain because a particular colony which she was afflicting lay at our doors; we went to war because the disorders of that government affected the peace of our community and were injurious to our material interest. We said there was a condition of affairs which was unbearable and that we would put an end to it.

To that extent and to that alone we claimed and avowed the reason for the declaration of war. So it follows that the mere declaration of war did not affect in any manner our relations with the Philippine Islands except to put us in a state of war with them as a part of the Spanish domain, and in no manner laid any obligation upon us as to those islands. We were not charged with the duty of preserving order in Asia.

Another obligation that it is contended we owe to the islands is to see that no foreign government interferes with them. That is a very large undertaking on our part, because it has to extend to all the future. Mr. President, I do not admit any such obligation. We have nobler uses both for the treasure and the young manhood of this country.

The main question with me is, what is our duty to ourselves and how will our own people be affected by such a course?

What is the effect of the acquisition of the Philippine Islands? It will be an entirely new departure. It will commit fice; the obligor is the man who pays the debt. The obligee is the man who receives the benefit from the obligor.

Yet, in this instance, those who favor the acquisition of the Philippine Islands, and who try to put it upon the high ground that we are under obligation to the Filipinos, reason it out that we, the obligors, are to receive the islands in discharge of the obligation! Without stopping to analyze so untenable a proposition as that, I desire to ask the attention of the Senate to the consideration of the question, What are the obligations that we owe to the Philippine Islands or to their inhabitants?

Outside of one fact which I propose to mention, I do not think we owe any greater obligations to the Philippine Islands than we owe to any other possessions of Spain. But there is one fact which did devolve upon us a peculiar and special obligation. That fact is that at the time when we sent our fleet to the Philippine Islands the Filipinos were, and had been for years before, in active rebellion against the power of Spain.

When we went there to attack Spain we accepted of the co-operation and alliance of the Filipinos for the purpose of furthering our cause. We gave arms and we gave ammunition to them, and while the war progressed there was over a month after the battle of Manila during which there was not an American regiment upon the Philippine Islands, and during all of that time the Spaniards were beleaguered by Dewey on the sea and Aguinaldo on the land in co-operation and alliance.

Now, it is a sound proposition that that fact laid an obligation upon the United States, and only one obligation, and that obligation was that we would not make peace with Spain without breaking the power of Spain in the Philippine Islands. That obligation was laid upon us. It would have been a gross breach of faith if we had not required that Spain should relinquish her power in the Philippine Islands.

But what was the necessary corollary of the performance of that obligation? Could it be said that the obligation growing out of that co-operation and that alliance was discharged by requiring Spain to relinquish her power in the Philippine Islands, and by then taking those islands for ourselves?

Mr. President, if so, with equal force it might have been urged at the conclusion of our Revolutionary war that France should make a treaty with Great Britain and take thereunder a cession of the American colonies. The very same facts which laid upon us the obligation to break the power of Spain in the Philippines laid upon us the obligation to recognize the freedom of that people. When we accepted of the co-operation and us to a colonial policy necessarily, because it is not possible, it is not within the contemplation of the American people, that the Philippine Islands should ever be converted into a State or into States and admitted into participation in the affairs of this Government.

THE NEW MEMBER OF THE ORCHESTRA
From "Cartoons of our War with Spain, by Ch. Nolan"

The logic of the situation will be to acquire additional Asiatic territory, and after that to reach out for still more. There is no reason for the acquisition of the Philippines which will not apply to the acquisition of other parts of Asia, each acquisition furnishing a reason why another part still beyond should be also acquired. The acquisition of the Philippines will commit this Government to the colonial or imperial policy. The logic of that policy will certainly require that we actively enlarge our efforts and seek to bring under our dominion all countries whose people are too weak to resist our colossal power, and which have not already been added to the land-grabbing and nation-appropriating governments of Europe.

This reach-out for empire will inevitably lead to wars; not such wars as the little one, with its trifling sacrifices, through which we have just passed; but great wars, with all their sacrifices. It means vast armies, composed in large part of our young men, ready on a day's notice to cope in bloody conflict with the great military powers of the earth. It means peace at evening, perhaps, with no certainty but that the morrow will find us participants in a world's war.

Mr. President, if we are to enter into the struggle for foreign dominion and empire, we cannot escape the ever-present danger of war which, like an angry, never-disappearing cloud, year in and year out, hangs over Europe. The nations of Europe are watching with keen anxiety the course which the Government of the United States will take in this matter. England especially is showing the keenest interest and anxiety. Why is it? Why has England this interest? Why has she this anxiety that we shall take the Philippine Islands? Why is it that the London papers are daily burdened with exhortations to our people and to our Government to acquire and exercise dominion in the Philippine Islands? Is it because England is so anxious that we shall be aggrandized? Is it because England is so anxious that we shall increase our power, or has she a selfish motive in it?

Mr. President, an Associated Press dispatch which came from London on the 14th of this month, and which was published in our Sunday papers, shows what the motive is with England and why she has this anxiety. I read part of it:

LONDON, January 14.

When the American correspondents succeeded in impressing upon the British mind that Senator Foraker, in his recent speech in the United States Senate, spoke only for himself when he suggested that the United States might eventually withdraw from the Philippine Islands, a distinct sigh of relief might have been read between the lines of the British newspapers.

Everyone here assumed that because the Senator was from the President's State he was speaking for the President, and the declaration made not only succeeded in giving British public officialdom an unpleasant shock, but it felt like a dash of cold water on the ardor of the British for an Anglo-American understanding. They began to question what was the profit of this friendship if America did not propose to back up Great Britain's policy in the far East by retaining the most important base of operations in the event of a war over China.

of people in the Philippine Islands, nothing but the strong hand, nothing but cruelty, nothing but the iron rule will enable us to maintain that dominion.

Mr. President, I do not want any such transactions under the American flag. I do not want it to be that we will have to send governors and judges there to be brought back here to be tried for their oppressions of a people like them. I want no Warren Hastings arrayed before the bar of the Senate to be tried upon impeachment articles for oppressions of a people whom we are seeking to rule.

Mr. President, the greatest curse that can befall a people is war, even though that war be, as has been the last, an unbroken series of victories; not simply because it involves death and bloodshed, but because it accustoms our people and familiarizes them with scenes of violence and of blood; because it accustoms them to the idea of military rule rather than the peaceful agencies of civil government; because it weakens our reverence for and obedience to the great constitutional limitations which have been set up as the guardians of personal and political liberty; because there is no war but what, to a certain extent, works a revolution in the free institutions of the country; and because it is generally depraving and demoralizing to the public sentiment.

And, Mr. President, if I may be pardoned in this presence for saying it, I know of no greater illustration of the demoralizing and poisoning effects of war than we find in the fact that there are those who are now advocating a course which must lead to interminable wars, who but two short twelvemonths since stood here the very apostles of peace, the uncompromising opponents of war, and the extreme advocates of the establishment of a permanent board of arbitration which should forever make war impossible and settle all international disputes by arbitration.

And, Mr. President, as war is the greatest curse, peace is the greatest blessing. Peace is ours if we will have it; but if we do not have peace by our will, then we will have wars against our will.

Mr. President, as I close the thought which impresses my mind is the importance to us that we should preserve our institutions and the principles of our Government, and that at the same time we should preserve the peace of this people; and these things, Mr. President, are worth more to us than all the treasures gathered from subject peoples, and more than the dominion of all the islands of the seas.

Mr. President, if that war comes it will not be confined to the Orient. If that war comes it will involve every leading nation of the world. If that war comes, not only will our young men lay their bones upon the distant soil of Asia, but our own country will have to stand its defence. When that war comes, there is not a sea-coast city but that will be in danger of destruction from the allied navies of the world. This may be a remote possibility, but if so it is a possibility so fraught with disaster to the United States that I will do nothing to tempt so dire a fate.

Again, Mr. President, do Senators consider the Herculean task which we undertake when we say that we will maintain a military establishment in the Philippine Islands? Do they realize that even when not at war with a foreign power we must maintain there an army of at least 30,000 men? Do they for a moment realize what it is to transport a hundred thousand men across the sea? And yet, if we became involved in a war with a foreign power, we would have to transport more than a hundred thousand men across the Pacific Ocean.

If we become involved in a war with a foreign power, the Philippine Islands will be our weak spot. It was the weak spot of Spain, and we struck it first because it was the weak spot, and if we succeed to her dominion it will be our weak spot, and any foreign government with which we engaged in war would strike that first.

Mr. President, I am going to suggest but one more thought. It has been suggested by another portion of the dispatch from London which I read, which quotes the London Spectator. In speaking about the Americans and the Philippine Islands, the paper, which this dispatch calls "the solemn Spectator," says as follows:

Fifty years hence, under American control, the Filipinos will be orderly, law-abiding persons, like our own Hindoos.

Fifty years, Mr. President; fifty years of burden to the American people, fifty years of a great army and a great navy, fifty years of liability to world's wars to get them into the condition of the Hindoos!

Why, Mr. President, I was a schoolboy at the time of the Sepoy Rebellion, and I shall never forget the impression made upon me in looking at the pictorial newspapers, Harper's Weekly I recollect particularly, with the pictures of the sepoys bound to the mouths of cannon and blown to pieces. And, Mr. President, if we are to maintain dominion over these millions

On January 24 Henry Cabot Lodge (Massachusetts) supported the annexation of the Philippines.

I stand on the broad proposition laid down by Webster in debate in 1849, that the Territories are not part of the United States, but belong to the United States, as England's colonies belong to England. It does not alarm me to hold this doctrine of constitutional law merely because it can be easily pointed out that the supreme power which Congress may exercise over territory within its jurisdiction, but not within the limits of the United States, is capable of abuse.

Constitutions do not make people; people make constitutions. Our Constitution is great and admirable, because the men who made it were so and the people who ratified it and have lived under it were and are brave, intelligent, and lovers of liberty. There is a higher sanction and a surer protection to life and liberty, to the right of free speech and trial by jury, to justice and humanity, in the traditions, the beliefs, the habits of mind, and the character of the American people than any which can be afforded by any constitution, no matter how wisely drawn. If the American people were disposed to tyranny, injustice, and oppression, a constitution would offer but a temporary barrier to their ambitions, and the reverence for the Constitution and for law and justice grows out of the fact that the American people believe in freedom and humanity, in equal justice to all men, and in equal rights before the law, and while they so believe the great doctrines of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution will never be in peril.

Holding these views as to our constitutional powers, the great question now before the American people resolves itself, in my mind, to one of policy purely. There is only one question demanding actual and immediate decision now before Congress and the people, and that is whether the treaty with Spain shall be ratified or not.

I have heard no opposition expressed to any part of the treaty except such portion of it as relates to the Philippines, and that, therefore, is the sole point upon which I desire to touch. In our war with Spain we conquered the Philippines, or, to put it more exactly, we destroyed the power of Spain in those islands and took possession of their capital. The treaty cedes the Philippines to us. It is wisely and skillfully drawn. It commits us to no policy, to no course of action whatever in regard to the Philippines. When that treaty is ratified, we have full power and are absolutely free to do with those islands as we please; and the opposition to its ratification may be summed up in a single sentence, that the American people and the American Congress are not to be trusted with that power and with that freedom of action in regard to the inhabitants of those distant islands. Every one of the resolutions thus far offered on this subject is an expression of distrust in the character, ability, honesty, and wisdom of the American people and an attempt to make us promise to be good and wise and honest in the future and in our dealings with other people. It is a well-meant effort to make us give bonds to fate by means of a Congressional resolution.

We must either ratify the treaty or reject it, for I cannot suppose that anyone would seriously advance the proposition that we should amend the treaty in such a way as to make pledges to Spain, and to Spain alone, and give bonds to Spain, and to Spain alone, for our good conduct in a matter which will be wholly our own to decide. Let us look, then, at the two alternatives. Suppose we ratify the treaty. The islands pass from the possession of Spain into our possession without committing us to any policy. I believe we can be trusted as a people to deal honestly and justly with the islands and their inhabitants thus given to our care. What our precise policy shall be I do not know, because I for one am not sufficiently informed as to the conditions there to be able to say what it will be best to do, nor, I may add, do I think anyone is. But I believe that we shall have the wisdom not to attempt to incorporate those islands with our body politic, or make their inhabitants part of our citizenship, or set their labor alongside of ours and within our tariff to compete in any industry with American workmen. I believe that we shall have the courage not to depart from those islands fearfully, timidly, and unworthily and leave them to anarchy among themselves, to the brief and bloody domination of some self-constituted dictator, and to the quick conquest of other powers, who will have no such hesitation as we should feel in crushing them into subjection by harsh and repressive methods. It is for us to decide the destinies of the Philippines, not for Europe, and we can do it alone and without assistance. I believe that we shall have the wisdom, the self-restraint, and the ability to restore peace and order in those islands and give to their people an opportunity for self-government and for freedom under the protecting shield of the United States until the time shall come when they are able to stand alone, if such a thing be possible, and if they do not themselves desire to remain under our protection. This is a great, a difficult, and a noble task. I believe that American civilization is entirely capable of fulfilling it, and I should not have that profound faith which I now cherish in American civilization and American manhood if I did not think so.

Take now the other alternative. Suppose we reject the treaty or strike out the clause relating to the Philippines. That will hand the islands back to Spain; and I cannot conceive that any American should be willing to do that. Suppose we reject the treaty; what follows? Let us look at it practically. We continue the state of war, and every sensible man in the country, every business interest, desires the reestablishment of peace in law as well as in fact. At the same time we repudiate the President and his action before the whole world, and the repudiation of the President in such a matter as this is, to my mind, the humiliation of the United States in the eyes of civilized mankind and brands us as a people incapable of great affairs or of taking rank where we belong, as one of the greatest of the great world powers.

The President cannot be sent back across the Atlantic in the person of his commissioners, hat in hand, to say to Spain with bated breath, "I am here in obedience to the mandate of a minority of one-third of the Senate to tell you that we have been too victorious, and that you have yielded us too much, and that I am very sorry that I took the Philippines from you." I do not think that any American President would do that, or that any American would wish him to. Still less do I think that any American would withdraw General Otis and his soldiers and recall Admiral Dewey from the scene of his great victory, leaving it to be said of us that we had deserted our post without an effort to repair the ruin we had made or to save the people we had freed with—

One task more declined, one more footpath untrod,
One more devil's triumph and sorrow for angels,
One wrong more to man, one more insult to God.

Therefore, Mr. President, by rejecting the treaty we renew the state of war. The protocol is but the agreement of the commander-in-chief. When the treaty fails, it could be torn to pieces; but, whether it is thrown aside or not, still we are in a state of war, and the subjects of Spain, among whom are numbered to-day the Filipinos, would be the public enemies of the United States by all the laws of nations. There, then, would be the President, with the country at war with Spain, armed with the war power, which he can use unchecked as the commander-in-chief of the army and navy. The treaty commits the disposition of the Philippine Islands to Congress and to the ways and practices of peace. Its rejection leaves them in the sole power of the President, subject to the usages and practices of war alone.

There has been a great deal said, Mr. President, about the Declaration of Independence and its principles, and about conscience and morality. I am sure, Mr. President, that there is no Senator upon this floor, no matter what his views on this question may be, who would not cut off his hand sooner than be false to the principles of the Declaration of Independence and to the great traditions and ideas of American history; but I do not believe, Mr. President, that devotion to the Declaration of Independence is confined to the minority in this chamber any more than I believe that they have a monopoly of conscience or of morals. There is no magic in the word "minority." A minority is not necessarily wiser and better than the rest of mankind because it is a minority, any more than a majority is so by mere virtue of its name. I believe in the rule of the majority, because I believe that in the long run the majority is far more likely to be right than the minority, and I have no faith in Matthew Arnold's self-complacent doctrine of "the remnant." Great policies and great questions must be decided by higher standards and on grounds more relative than this. I have given a large part of my life to the study of the time when this country freed itself from England, and when this Government was established, and of the men who did the great work. No one has a greater reverence for those men and their deeds than I. Nobody loves better than I the ideals set forth in the Declaration of Independence; but my ideals do not stop there. Nor do they stop even with that greater period when the life of the nation was at stake. I have ideals and beliefs which pertain to the living present, and a faith in the future of my country. I believe in the American people as they are to-day, and in the civilization they have created. I believe not merely in what they have done, but in what they are yet to do.

To the American people and their Government I am ready to intrust my life, my liberty, my honor; and, what is far dearer to me than anything personal to myself, the lives and the liberty of my children and my children's children. If I am ready thus to trust my children to the Government which the American people create and sustain, am I to shrink from intrusting to that same people the fate and fortune of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands? I have beheld with amazement the specters of wrongdoing which have been conjured up here and charged as possible to the American people. I have been astonished to hear outside this chamber men who for three years watched unmoved the torture of Cuba pleading with fervid eloquence for the Filipinos, just rescued by us from Spain, against the possible cruelty which Americans might inflict upon them. Denunciations which might have been suitable to Weyler have been applied to imaginary deeds of cruelty to be performed at some future time, date not specified, by a humane and able American President and by American soldiers and sailors who have within six months shown themselves in the heat of battle as merciful and tender as they were brave and daring. Mr. President, all this is so inconceivable to me that I cannot comprehend it. I can look at this question in only one way. A great responsibility has come to us. If we are unfit for it and unequal to it, then we should shirk it and fly from it. But I believe that we are both fit and capable, and that therefore we should meet it and take it up.

On January 31 James H. Berry (Arkansas) opposed annexation of the Philippines.

Mr. President, if in November, 1896, it had been known or generally believed throughout the United States that within less than two years from the date of his inauguration the President of the United States would be asking Congress to grant a standing army of 100,000 men for the purpose of being used to subjugate and subdue a people 7,000 miles away from our territory, who were seeking to form a government of their own, he would not have received the electoral vote of a single State in this Union.

Mr. President, if less than one year ago, when the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] read from that desk to the Senate of the United States the Farewell Address of the Father of our Country, it had been asserted here that in less than twelve months from that time that Senator and a majority of his associates upon this floor would be advocating a policy which contradicts and disregards every word and every sentiment contained in that wonderful letter, that Senator would indignantly have denied it and resented it as an imputation upon his patriotism.

And yet we have gone forward, or backward, as you may choose to regard it, with such bewildering rapidity that to-day every man who dares to raise his voice in the way of protest against this radical departure from our time-honored beliefs, traditions, and professions is denounced as a traitor to his country, an ally, aider, and abettor of Malays, negroes, and savages.

When the protocol for peace was signed on the 12th day of last August, I think it could have been truthfully said that there had never been a time since the organization of the Government when the American Republic commanded so much respect from the nations of the world, and never a time when its own citizens felt for that Republic so much love, so much devotion, and so much admiration. Less than six months have passed and there are thousands and tens of thousands of intelligent and patriotic citizens who sincerely believe that the danger of the destruction and overthrow of our institutions has never been so great as it is to-day.

What has been the cause, Mr. President, of the remarkable change in the policy of our Government? What has been the mighty influence that has caused us to depart from the teachings of our fathers and to enter upon a course of action directly opposed to all that we have ever professed. Mr. President, men do not always agree as to causes and effects, but it seems to me that the all-powerful force that is pushing us on to destruction can be easily found. In 1896, for the first time since the organization of the Government, all of the great combinations of wealth, all of the great corporations, all of the trusts, all of the syndicates, boards of trade, merchants and manufacturers' associations and exchanges of the great cities, were united in the support of the same candidate for the Presidency. They were associated together as, and assumed for themselves, the name of the business men of the country. Many of them boldly claimed that the men who owned the wealth and property of the country had a right to dictate the policy of the Government and to name its Chief Magistrate. This powerful combination of wealth was able to control nearly all of the great daily newspapers, and they succeeded in electing William McKinley President of the United States.

Mr. President, it is largely the same element, the same mighty influence, which is to-day, under the plea that the United States must have a wider and broader field for trade and commerce, pushing us to a line of action that threatens the very foundation of the Republic.

The cause for the universal rejoicing of our people at the close of the late war can be easily understood. We had fought to make others free as we ourselves were free; we had disclaimed, in the act declaring war, any intention of acquiring territory in Cuba. The President himself had said that the forcible acquisition of territory would not be tolerated by the American people, and that such an attempt would be criminal aggression. The American people were proud because they had done a brave and generous and unselfish deed, which would be a gratification to them and to their children in all the years to come.

They had no thought then that the great combinations of wealth and greed would be able thereafter to unite and bring to bear such a mighty influence as would control the public press, to a large extent public sentiment, the President, and the Senate of the United States, and secure the adoption of a policy that would hereafter forever dim and obscure the glory that they had fairly won.

It has been often said, Mr. President, that we hold those islands and that we cannot turn them loose. That is not true. Except the city of Manila and the bay and harbor we do not hold those islands either in law or in fact, and, Mr. President, the city of Manila itself was never captured until after the protocol of peace was signed, under the terms of which our rights were confined to the defences of the city of Manila and its bay and its harbor.

Those who support the treaty urge this as a reason why there should be a speedy ratification of the treaty in order that General Otis may be at liberty to move forward his battalions to crush the Philippine government and slaughter those who resist. They insist that we must agree to a treaty by which we promise to pay Spain $20,000,000 in order to obtain her consent to make war upon those who were our allies in the recent contest; and we are told that any party or individual who refuses to give his consent to this proposition will meet with the indignation of the American people. Mr. President, it may be true; I do not know; but it seems to me that when the excitement of the hour has passed away and impartial history comes to be written the men who are urging the forcible acquisition of foreign territory will not be proud of the record they are making.

But it was said by the President of the United States in one of the speeches he made on his Western tour that it is destiny, and we must meet it and accept it. Mr. President, the plea of destiny as an excuse for any course of action is an admission that no other reason can be given. If destiny is a sufficient excuse for wrong, then there is no crime however great and no infamy however degrading that a nation may not commit under that name. And we are told again that we must conquer these people in the interests of humanity and for their own good, that we must entail enormous expense upon our own people, that we must drag our youth to that far-off land, and kill and slaughter hundreds and, it may be, thousands of these people, in order that we may civilize and Christianize the remainder.

Mr. President, this is the same excuse, the same false pretence, that has been given by every nation of the world which sought to impose its government upon another people. This is the same excuse that was given by Spain when Cortes marched through Mexico and Pizarro through Peru, leaving burning houses and murdered men and women and children in their pathway. When Lord Clive and Warren Hastings robbed India and committed outrages that shocked the civilized world, England said that this was done in the interest of humanity; that this was done in order to extend English commerce. So the same excuse was made by Austria and Prussia for the destruction of Hungary and Poland, and the same excuse was given by George the Third when he made war upon the colonies in this country.

But I am asked if I think our people are as bad as theirs. I answer no, Mr. President, I do not think they are; but the reason why I do not think they are is because they have never indulged in these practices in the past. But the very moment we attempt to govern foreign territory against the will of the inhabitants, the chances are, if history can be relied upon, that we shall grow worse year by year.

Mr. President, those of us who live in the States of the South have some knowledge of the wrongs and outrages that may be perpetrated even by Americans where they seek to govern by strangers and by military power an unwilling people. Fortunately for our Republic, the people of the North learned in time that such government could not be continued without danger to every part of the Union, and I remember what universal applause from every part of the country greeted the statement made by the Hon. Charles Foster, of Ohio, when he said in the House of Representatives in 1877 that thereafter the flag of the country should wave over States and not provinces.

No, Mr. President, the plea of humanity is not the true cause of this movement. It doubtless has controlled the judgment of some, but the all-powerful force behind it is the desire of extending trade and commerce.

But it is said that the disposition of the Philippines will be a matter for determination after the treaty is ratified; that, after we have concluded the bargain by which we purchase the sovereignty of the islands and the right to control these people, after we have paid Spain $20,000,000 for these people, and after we have, by force, if need be, destroyed their present government, we may conclude at some time in the far distant future to give them a chance to form a new government, and we will then cease to control. Does any man believe that such is the purpose? Has the President of the United States ever avowed such a purpose? Does not the treaty itself show that it is not the purpose? The language of the treaty in the case of Cuba and that of the Philippines is purposely different. Cuba is not ceded to the United States, but Spain simply relinquishes her sovereignty. The Philippine Islands are ceded. Do you not today refuse absolutely to amend the treaty so as to make the promise to the people of those islands the same as that which we have given to Cuba? And have you not day by day refused to pass a joint resolution containing any kind of promise to those people? And yet we have men who are sufficiently credulous to believe, after the bond has been signed and sealed and the money paid, that in the far-off future you will do then what you even refuse to promise to do to-day.

In addition to this, Mr. President, it has been urged upon us that, if we do not at once ratify the treaty, in all probability there will be a collision between our people and the people of the Philippine Islands; and it has been said that those on this floor who oppose this policy would be responsible. Mr. President, it seems to me that, if we ratify the treaty and give the authority to General Otis to move forward with troops, a collision will be inevitable; and if that collision comes I want it understood now that the responsibility will rest upon those who have changed a war begun for humanity into one that is being prosecuted and carried out for the sake of the acquisition of territory.

SENATOR PLATT.—I wish to say here that I believe the negotiation of this treaty reflects the greatest honor upon the diplomacy of the United States of any treaty that has ever been negotiated. It is a diplomacy which honors the United States, which honors its armies, which honors its navy, which honors its traditions, which honors its Declaration of Independence, which honors free government and the cause of humanity in the world.

But, Mr. President, while this treaty has been in process of negotiation an ambitious leader in the Philippine Islands has been raising revolt, and I say revolt against the United States and its Government and its navy and its army. He is to-day a Spanish citizen arraying Spanish subjects against the United States. He had a great opportunity to do so, because by the terms of the protocol, by the operation of international law, he had a free field for his operations. We had taken all effective Spanish soldiers in the island prisoners, so that Spain could not resist him. We had tied our hands by the protocol until a treaty of peace should be declared, so that the United States could not resist him.

the treaty, unless a minority of the Senate can compel the majority to vote for them.

With the passage of the joint resolution and the ratification of the treaty secured, as they tell us it may be by the passage of the joint resolution, how is the United States going to maintain the slightest authority thereafter in the Philippine Islands for any purpose, either in the city of Manila or elsewhere, except by consent of Aguinaldo and his insurgent band and his shadowy congress? Is the Senate of the United States going to place itself in that position?

On February 2 John C. Spooner (Wisconsin) upheld annexation.

A great point is made against the ratification of the treaty upon the theory that it violates the Declaration of Independence, particularly that phrase in the Declaration which asserts that "all government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed." No one, I presume, will deny the philosophical truth of that declaration.

It is like the declaration "All men are born equal." Philosophically and in a subtle and abstract sense that is true. In the world, in the practical life of the world, it is not true, and it never has been true. "In the corrupted currents of this world" it is impossible for men or for nations in all their conduct to be governed by strict abstract right.

Never since the foundation of this Government have we in the acquisition of territory paid the slightest attention to the "consent of the governed." Thomas Jefferson, who, as the author of that great Declaration, won undying fame, was the first man under our Government to violate it by the acquisition of Louisiana. No one asked the consent of the inhabitants there to a transfer of their allegiance or a transfer of the territory.

The same thing was true of Florida. The same thing was true at the end of the Mexican war when we acquired California, Utah, and the territory west of the Missouri. Who ever asked the consent of those people?

There have been many instances in our history, not related entirely to territory, either, in which as a matter of practical affairs that abstraction could not be regarded. I cannot stop to mention them, nor do I care to. It never can be until the millennium comes. It never can be while government is intrusted to men and holds sway over men. It never can be until perfection comes into life, and until the weaknesses, the passions, the vio-

By reason of the situation free course was given him in all his operations. He has gathered an insurgent band and to-day gives notice to the United States that unless he is recognized as the ruler of that territory he will contest his right by armed attack upon the armies of the United States. The situation is critical. He is in arms, using the arms which the United States furnished him, and in arms against the United States authority. That is the situation. Against whom else is Aguinaldo in arms? Against whom else are the threats of warfare? The ratification of a peace treaty will give the United States rights which it does not possess now. It will give the United States the right then to say, "We are in control of these islands, attack us if you dare," and in a very short time, without warfare, this insurgent band will melt away, better counsels will prevail, and a government superior, immensely superior, to anything which Aguinaldo could establish there will bless the inhabitants of those islands.

To defeat this treaty relegates us to a state of war legally. What will happen then no human being knows or can foresee. Whether actual warfare will go on, or whether Spain will submit to what she will consider a game of the United States played upon her and say to us, "We have no more treaties to make; we made one and you refused it; do your worst"; and thus keep us interminably in a state of legal war, or whether she may negotiate some new treaty, no human being knows. It is probable, Mr. President, that she would insist, as I think she might have a right to insist, in morals if not in law, that if we do not take the Philippines, which she has agreed to cede to us, we shall at least restore her to the position which she occupied in the Philippines at the time the peace commissioners met. That would be nothing but fairness, Mr. President. I do not say whether it would be law or not.

Will some Senator who wishes these resolutions passed tell me what he proposes, when the treaty is rejected, to have the Government of the United States do, what he proposes to have the commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States do?

SENATOR BACON.—I simply desire to say that the object of these resolutions is not to defeat the treaty, but to secure its ratification.

SENATOR PLATT.—This treaty, then, is to be voted against unless the Senate, whether it believes in these resolutions or no, will adopt them. I do not see how that differs from the introduction of these resolutions for the purpose of defeating lence, the faults, and the foibles of our common humanity are eliminated.

Take the case of Hawaii. I was not in favor, as I have said, of the annexation of Hawaii. It was done by a joint resolution of Congress. Did anyone pay any attention to the consent of the governed? A protest by the inhabitants of those islands, numbering, I think, 14,000 or thereabouts, was presented by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] against annexation. They loved their own country; they wanted their own little independent republic out on those islands in the Pacific sea; they sought no annexation to the United States. But, Mr. President, without regard to this Declaration of Independence, our people annexed those islands and transferred their allegiance to us. More than that, The Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon] offered an amendment to the annexation resolutions, providing for a popular vote of the natives on the question.

That was voted down. I announced that if not paired I should vote for it. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] is recorded as voting against it. I do not call attention to that to reflect upon any Senator or any Member of Congress. I call attention to it only as warrant for my proposition, that never has this Government in the acquisition of territory paid the slightest attention to "the consent of the governed."

But there is another thing about it. The doctrine that no territory shall be acquired without the consent of the governed never has been and never can be admitted into international law. It never has been, and so long as the law of conquest exists it never can be permitted a place in peace negotiation or treaty. It is said by Hall:

The rights of a State with respect to property consist of the right to acquire territory, in being entitled to peaceable possession and enjoyment of that which it has duly obtained, and in the faculty of using its property as it chooses and alienating it at will. . . . The principle that the wishes of the population are to be consulted when the territory which they inhabit is ceded has not yet been adopted into international law, and can not be adopted into it until title by conquest has disappeared.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] the other day, in his speech, when asked whether government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed, said, "From some of the governed"; and he was called to account for that—I was about to say lampooned—not once, but many times. I dare to assert here to-day that the Senator's answer was absolutely accurate. It is some of the governed who consent to government everywhere. There is only one place in the world I know of where the exercise of power depends upon the unanimous consent of the governed, and that is the Senate of the United States. [Laughter.]

We must not shackle ourselves. War is wicked. War is brutal. Some one has said it is "organized brutality." It is pitiless. But nations sometimes must engage in it. This Republic was obliged to engage in it, in the opinion of Congress, since sustained, I think, by the public opinion of the United States. When it is waged we, as other nations, must be free to deal with the conditions of peace as best protects our interests.

This is true, too, Mr. President, after all, that, as wicked and wasteful and desolating as it is, it has many times happened, and will happen many times again, that only out of the soil made rich by the blood and the ashes of war can the beautiful flowers of liberty blossom.

And so, not looking at it from the philosophical standpoint, not dealing with it as a mere abstraction, dealing with it as practical men, the servants of a practical people, with a momentous duty imposed upon us, I say that in this case the doctrine invoked from the Declaration of Independence has no place.

It has been asked, Why did not the treaty deal with the Philippines as it does with Cuba? and my understanding is that if such were the form of the treaty it would be generally unobjectionable. What would have been in that event the situation? In my judgment it would have put the Government of the United States in an impossible situation. Let us analyze it for a moment. By this treaty Spain relinquishes her sovereignty over Cuba and her title to Cuba, with the statement, hardly an agreement, that we are to occupy the island, and an agreement that while we occupy it we shall discharge the duties imposed by international law upon a military occupant. Note also that Spain relinquishes sovereignty and title not to any particular grantee.

The President and our commissioners would not accept the cession of Cuba to the United States for obvious reasons. Upon our theory of government it must be true that the sovereignty and title thus relinquished by Spain vest in the people of Cuba. Certainly if they do not vest in the people of Cuba they remain in the kingdom of Spain. They cannot be in nubibus. They must be somewhere. I assume that, the title being abandoned by Spain, and the sovereignty relinquished by Spain, they are not relinquished to the world, but are relinquished to the people vitaly interested in them. Suppose the same provision were incorporated in the treaty as to the Philippines.

What would be the situation? The Filipinos, except the individuals who aided us, have been our enemies in contemplation of law, because the subjects of a power with which we were at war, and the moment a treaty was signed and ratified, relinquishing the title and sovereignty to the Philippine Archipelago, that sovereignty and title, upon my contention, would vest, if it passed from Spain, in the people of the archipelago. That moment, ceasing to be the subjects of Spain, they would, of course, cease to be the enemies of the United States. In fact, the ratification of that treaty would bring peace between Spain and the United States, and, therefore, in law, peace with Spain and her subjects everywhere.

In this condition how would we obtain the right for one moment in law to do what our people feel should be done to save the Filipinos, to maintain order among them, to help them to establish a government, to protect them from anarchy among themselves and spoliation by other governments, and, in addition, what should not be forgotten, the right in the long run to take care of the commercial and other interests of the United States in the archipelago? I can see in that event but one thing that we could rightfully do unless the people acquiesced in our plans, and that would be to withdraw our troops and sail away from the archipelago and leave that people abandoned. Leave them to anarchy. War is bad enough, God knows. It is pitiless enough, but, after all, it is conducted on rules based on justice and framed in the interest of civilization. Anarchy is unspeakably worse than war. Anarchy gives full play to all the passions and bloodthirstiness of men unrestrained by law. War is cruel and bitter, but anarchy is hell let loose upon the earth.

We do not yet know, nor does anyone yet know, I think, what we will deem it wise to do in the Philippine Archipelago. No one can well doubt that the purpose of the United States in accepting this cession is one of benevolence and good will to that people.

But, Mr. President, an acceptance of this cession does not determine at all, in my view, the future policy of the United States as to the Philippines. I am not in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Georgia, not because I differ from the sentiment expressed in the last one, but I am not in favor of tying the hands of this Government as to the future. It is our business to make laws, not to formulate policies.

The irrevocable policy of the American people is to be determined by the American people, not by their uninstructed temporary servants. When they have had time to consider this subject, not when the flags are fluttering and the bands are playing and the troops are marching, but in the calm of their firesides, in the light of debate upon the rostrum, they will render a judgment which must be controlling.

One who is not willing, Mr. President, to rely upon the sober second thought of our people upon this question, and all questions, impeaches the success of republican government. I have no fear that the people who went to war to give liberty to Cuba will in the end arrive at a conclusion which will oppress the Filipinos, or which will violate the Declaration of Independence in the Philippine Archipelago. The ideals upon which this Government is founded are the ideals of the American people. We have not the power to commit them to an unchangeable policy. We have neither right nor reason to doubt that their conclusion will religiously maintain the best ideals of the Republic, and will be in harmony with justice, generosity, and the highest civilization.

John W. Daniel (Virginia) opposed annexation.

The obligation that we owe to the Filipinos is the obligation of comradeship. It is the obligation of fraternity. It is not pecuniary; it is honorary. It comes under that class of obligations which has as its touchstone and its watchword noblesse oblige. Having accepted comradeship—call it ally, coadjutor, coöperator, or what not—having accepted the fact of friendship and clasped hands on the perilous edge of battle, we cannot renounce the hand that we there clasped and treat the man or the men who gave us those hands otherwise than as friends.

What is it, Mr. President, if you strike the gun out of the hand in which you put the gun and aim the gun at the breast which touched elbow with your elbow when you went down to battle? What is that? I name it not, but it is not noblesse oblige. We cannot leave the Filipinos in the hands of Spain. No, no, no. Americans cannot so treat those who were their comrades.

What next? Recognize their independence as a nation? I say, "No." They have not yet made themselves an independent nation. We do not know whether they can or whether they will make themselves such a nation as can assume international obligations and maintain themselves in the great family of states. Recognize them and come away from the islands? No; we cannot now come away from the islands. We need only look skyward to see that the birds of prey are circling around the Philippine Islands. We can leave them neither in the hands of Spain nor to become the prey of the first vulture that sweeps upon them.

What next? The face of the treaty tells us how to treat them. Exactly as we have treated Cuba. We are now in military occupation of the Philippine Islands. Let us stay in military occupation of the Philippine Islands until such time as we know more about them than we do, until we have assisted them with our kind offices and with our national prestige and with our force of arms into such destiny as may fitly and justly await them, into such destiny as they have projected for themselves.

What is the difference between doing that, Mr. President, and ratifying this treaty? It is the difference between planting an empire there and maintaining the temporary ascendancy of American power there.

The one thing, such as we have proposed and are doing in Cuba, is essentially transitory; it is ambulatory; it admits of a moment's change. The President of the United States, as the commander in chief of our armies, can withdraw in honor, in propriety, in justice the troops from Cuba whenever good sense and sound policy dictate. Why not leave him to do the same as to the Philippine Islands? With far more reason may we do that as to the Philippine Islands than with respect to Cuba.

Cuba is a natural part of the American continent. It has been, ever since we ourselves have been a nation, within the range and under the sphere of influence of the American Republic. As the Hon. Thomas Francis Bayard said when he was Secretary of State in the first Administration of Mr. Cleveland, we have established a protectorate over the Western World. It has always been and it is to-day under the wing of the people of the United States out of the necessity of our geographical situation. The Philippine Islands have never been and naturally can never so be. Why not, then, leave them in that situation in which we may determine our policy at leisure, studiously, sedately, with full comprehension of all those facts and conditions of which we now claim to know and of which we do know so little?

We stand to-day by the bank of a broader and a deeper Rubicon than ever Caesar meditated beside. At our feet we hear the swash of the great Pacific Ocean, and beyond lies the expansionists' dream—Cæsar's Rome. Cæsar never did wrong without just cause. That is the imperialistic plea. America will not do wrong without a great temptation. That to-day is the emancipationists' plea. For my country I hope that she will ne'er do wrong.

Let no glittering temptation of trade, let no gold from the gorgeous East tempt her eye or her hand. She stands to-day the foremost nation of the world. She stands to-day the foremost nation that ever the world has seen. Let her tread with secure and steady steps along her own highways, respecting nations and respecting men, putting into the dream of every child that goes to school that vision of liberty of which the Declaration is the great figure and of which the Constitution is the rock-bound foundation. Let her to the tempter of expansion to-day say, as He said who stood upon the mount when the glories of the earth were stretched before Him: "Get thee behind me, Satan."

Mr. President, peace! Peace! This treaty is not a treaty of peace except in formal ceremony with Spain. It is a declaration of war against the Philippine people, not by Congress, but in necessary and logical effect. We know that the Filipinos are in arms. We know that they have an army of from 12,000 to 30,000. We know that they are seeking to work out their own destiny. The moment that this treaty is adopted the Filipinos are made citizens, and the moment they are made citizens, if they do not instantly lay down their arms, they become rebels. The tie of allegiance is created with this Government, and when the President or commander-in-chief says, "Our sovereignty is here; lay down your arms," they bear them no longer, under the penalty of death.

Mr. President, my country—may she ever be right; but my country, right or wrong. That is my doctrine. If the treaty is passed, I believe it is constitutional and authoritative. I do not deny the legal or constitutional right. I accept the fate and the decree of my country, and I stand with my people and my kind. At the same time I know what it means. I would that this cup might pass from us. There is a line of battle in the Philippine Islands of a dusky race, who have reared a flag and who have asked that they might be free. The moment this treaty passes, if they do not lay down their arms, it is the duty of the American President to order it, and it is the duty of the American soldier to shoot them to death and to make them lay down their arms under the penalty of execution in battle.

I hope that may not happen. I pray it may not happen. But, oh, if it should happen, what a conclusion is that of a holy and a righteous war begun for humanity and for liberty, and what justification has this nation before God and man?

Mr. President, there be those who see an American scepter in the eastern sky. It may be that that scepter is there; but if that scepter be there, it is not a scepter that sparkles by the side of the star that shone over the manger of Bethlehem when the shepherds watched their flocks at night and when the wise men, looking for the Messiah, came.

No, Mr. President; I would rather invoke to-day that star which hovered over old Independence Hall on the morning of that 4th of July, 1776, when the world waited the deliverance of a mighty message; I would point to that star, the star of the great northern Republic, founded by the great white race of the northern nations; I would say we go on no war of conquest; I would say that we respect the weakest and the most helpless of mankind; I would say to the men who are fighting for their freedom, be they many or be they few, be they in Cuba or be they in the Philippine Islands, that to them the great American Republic gives the salute of honor and dares not condescend to put her foot upon their necks.

I would point again, Mr. President, to that bright star that beamed over Independence Hall in the bright morning of our birthright, and I would hope that ever hereafter we might say of it that of its—

. . . true-fix'd and resting quality
There is no fellow in the firmament.

[Applause in the galleries.]

On February 4 hostilities broke out at Manila between the Filipino and the American troops. The news of the battle reported in Washington contributed greatly to the ratification of the Treaty of Paris two days later by the Senate.

On this day (February 6) Samuel D. McEnery [La.] moved the following joint resolution:

Resolved, That by the ratification of the pending treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of said islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States. But it is the intention of the United States to establish on said islands a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants of said islands, to prepare them for local self-government, and in due time to make such disposition of said islands as will best promote the interests of the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands.

SENATOR HOAR.—I move to amend the joint resolution by inserting, after the words "the inhabitants of said islands," and before the words "a government," the words "with the consent of the people thereof."

The amendment was tabled by a vote of 45 to 34.

SENATOR HOAR.—I move to amend the resolution by inserting after the words "territory of the United States" the words "or to force a government upon them against their will."

This amendment was tabled by a vote of 46 to 30.

Senator Bacon then proposed the following amendment:

Resolved further, That the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands, and assert their determination, when a stable and independent government shall have been erected therein, entitled, in the judgment of the Government of the United States, to recognition as such, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights secured under the cession by Spain, and to thereupon leave the government and control of the islands to their people.

On February 14 the Bacon amendment came to vote. There were 29 yeas and 29 nays, and the Chair (Vice-President Hobart) cast the deciding vote in the negative. The McEnery joint resolution was then passed by a vote of 26 to 22.

The subject of the annexation of the Philippines was discussed at even greater length in the House of Representatives in connection with various appropriation bills and a bill for the reorganization of the army, but no material points were elicited beyond those brought out in the Senate debate.

As has transpired in the debate in January, 1899, President McKinley appointed a commission consisting of President Jacob Gould Schurman of Cornell University, Admiral George Dewey, General E. S. Otis, Charles Denby, and Dean C. Worcester to investigate conditions in the Philippines, and to work for the acceptance of American rule by the natives. The commission began its work in March, and on April 5 issued a proclamation to the Filipinos explaining the purpose of their mission.

The proclamation had little effect. Skirmishes continued about Manila, little headway being made in subduing the Filipino forces until late in the year, and early in 1900, when these were driven to the mountains.

In February, 1900, the President intrusted the provisional government of the islands to five civil commissioners: Judge William H. Taft (chief), Dean C. Worcester, Luke E. Wright, Henry C. Ide and Bernard Moses. By January, 1901, the chief local governments were reorganized, an electoral system was adopted with educational and property qualifications, and a constitution provided for each province with autonomy limited by consent of the commission.

On March 23, 1901, Aguinaldo was captured, and forcible opposition to American rule virtually brought to an end. In June the civil and military administrations of the islands were separated, Judge Taft becoming Civil Governor, and courts were created, each consisting of both American and Filipino judges. In September other departments of government were established.

On June 1, 1902, the United States Government enacted a bill for the temporary government of the Philippines, confirming the previous executive orders and extending to the Filipinos the Bill of Rights in the United States Constitution, with the exception of the right to maintain a militia, and the right of trial by jury. By the act a legislature was established, the commission constituting the upper house, and delegates chosen by the qualified electors the lower.

Up to the establishment of civil rule the cost of the Philippine war to the United States was over $170,000,000.

In the Presidential campaign of 1900 the question of "Anti-Imperialism" was declared to be the "paramount issue" by the Democratic party and its candidate, William J. Bryan. A number of influential Republicans, including Senator Hoar, supported Bryan on this issue. The reelection of William McKinley was affirmed by the other Republicans to indicate that in the deliberate opinion of the American people the United States had a sound title to the islands and that the government of colonies was not inherently antagonistic to our republican system.

In later Presidential campaigns the Democratic party reiterated its position. Its platform of 1912 favored "an immediate declaration of the nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established—such independence to be guaranteed by us until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers." It added that in recognizing this independence our Government should retain such land as might be necessary for coaling stations and naval bases.

The Republican platform of 1912 declared that the Philippine policy of the party was "inspired by the belief that our duty toward the Filipino people is a national obligation which should remain entirely free from partisan politics."

CHAPTER VII

NEUTRALITY OF THE ISTHMIAN CANAL

THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY

Early Isthmian Canal Projects—The Clayton-Bulwer Treaty—Debate in the Senate on the Treaty: in Favor, John M. Clayton [Del.]; Opposed, Stephen A. Douglas [Ill.]—Later History of the Treaty—Contention of Secretaries of State James G. Blaine and Frederick T. Frelinghuysen That the Treaty Was Obsolete; Lord Granville Declares It in Force.

THE question of an interoceanic canal across Central America arose in the United States and the Latin-American countries shortly after the latter had established their independence, and were seeking an alliance between themselves and with the United States for protection against aggression from European monarchies.

The project formed one of the subjects proposed for discussion at the Panama Congress of American republics, held in 1826 [see Vol. II, page 234]. Henry Clay, Secretary of State, instructed the United States commissioners to the Congress to investigate the practicability and the probable expense of the undertaking along the routes which afforded the greatest facilities.

On March 3, 1835, the Senate unanimously recommended to President Jackson that he open negotiations with the governments of other nations, particularly the Central American states and New Granada (now Colombia), to protect by treaty private companies undertaking to construct an isthmian canal, the treaty stipulations to secure also free and equal navigation forever to the contracting nations on the payment of reasonable tolls to the capitalists.

In a speech on the resolution John M. Clayton (Delaware) declared:

"If, in completing such a work, fifty or a hundred millions (aye, one-half the money vainly expended in attempting to discover the Northwest Passage) should be expended, it would be a cheaper outlay, and render more benefits to the world, than an equal expenditure in any other enterprise that had ever been or could be undertaken by man."

President Jackson heartily approved the resolution, and on May 1, 1835, sent Charles Biddle of Philadelphia to examine first the Nicaragua route and then the Panama route. Mr. Biddle, acting in his own interests, disobeyed instructions, never visiting Nicaragua, but going to New Granada, where he obtained for himself and other capitalists of the United States an exclusive grant of the right of way across Panama. Returning, he coolly informed John Forsyth, the Secretary of State, that it was "unnecessary to enter into any negotiations with other nations upon the subject."

The President was highly displeased, and Secretary Forsyth, on September 23, 1836, disavowed to New Granada the contract.

The project of an isthmian canal was taken up in 1839 in the House, a memorial on the subject having been presented by the merchants of New York and Philadelphia. The House unanimously passed a recommendation to President Van Buren almost identical with the Senate's recommendation to President Jackson on March 3, 1835.

In 1847 President Polk negotiated a treaty with New Granada in regard to an interoceanic canal or railroad. In his executive message of February 10, 1847, communicating the fact to the Senate he approved the policy adopted by his predecessors and Congress, repudiated the idea of an exclusive grant to the American people, vindicated the principle of equal rights to all nations, and asserted that the canal or railroad should be treated purely as a commercial and not a political project. The treaty was ratified by 29 yeas to 7 nays, every Democrat voting for it.

Zachary Taylor, upon coming to the Presidency in 1849, called Senator Clayton to the office of Secretary of State. Secretary Clayton found that two rival companies, one British and one American (led by Cornelius Vanderbilt), were planning for a canal across Nicaragua. The British company based its claims for the grant upon the pretension that Great Britain was a political power in Central America, being the protector of the Mosquito coast. The American capitalists appealed to their Government for aid in obtaining the grant. President Taylor, in response, sent E. George Squier as chargé d'affaires to Central America, superseding the incumbent, Elijah Hise. Squier's instructions, dated May 1, 1849, were to aid the Vanderbilt syndicate to obtain the grant from Nicaragua. They reiterated the canal policy now traditional with the United States Government.

Mr. Hise at once bestirred himself before he should be superseded by the advent of Squier, and, on June 21, 1849, negotiated a treaty with Nicaragua granting to the United States or a company of its citizens the right across the isthmus, not only for a canal, but for a railroad or turnpike.

The Taylor Administration refused to send this treaty to the Senate for ratification, although it held it in suspense for a time as a means of influencing the action of Great Britain in negotiations then in progress to settle the British claims to the Mosquito protectorate.

As the claims of Great Britain involved the territory around the mouth of the San Juan River, the proposed eastern terminus of the canal, and it was thought too serious an undertaking to dislodge her, it was resolved to secure her coöperation in guaranteeing the neutrality of the canal. This was accomplished on April 19, 1850, in a treaty made between Secretary Clayton and Sir Henry L. Bulwer, special ambassador of Great Britain to the United States.

The main provisions of the treaty were:

(1) Neither power was to exercise exclusive control over the canal; (2) or to "occupy or fortify, or colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua or any other part of Central America"; (3) both parties guaranteed the protection and neutrality of the canal; (4) agreed to invite other friendly powers to join in the foregoing stipulations, and (5) to form treaties with the Central American countries in order to secure the construction of the canal; (6) British and American vessels were to be exempt from detention, blockade, or capture while traversing the canal; and (7) the two powers were to extend their protection to any other system of transportation, such as a railroad, across the isthmus.

The treaty was ratified by the contracting governments on July 4, 1850. Shortly after the execution of the treaty renewed complaints were made from Central America of British occupation of territory there.

A debate upon the treaty occurred in the Senate during a special session in March, 1853.

THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY

SENATE, MARCH 9-21, 1853

In the preceding session Senator Stephen A. Douglas (Illinois) had attacked the Clayton-Bulwer treaty on the ground that it abandoned the Monroe Doctrine.

On the first day of the special session (March 9) Senator Clayton made an extended speech in which he repudiated and endeavored to refute the charge as well as to vindicate the treaty.

He denied that the treaty violated the Monroe Doctrine, and pointed to the unanimous affirmation of its principles by President Jackson and the Senate in 1823, and the unanimous affirmation of them by President Polk and the Democratic Senators in 1847. "The Senator from Illinois, it would seem, is not of that school," commented Senator Clayton.

Senator Douglas having criticized him for his action on the Hise treaty, Senator Clayton then proceeded to justify himself in the matter.

Mr. Hise's treaty proposed, first, that the Government of the United States should undertake and construct the canal in Nicaragua; and, secondly, if it should decide not to do so, then either the President or Congress should issue a charter or act of incorporation for the purpose. As to the first proposition, I have never yet met with any man of any party who supposed that our Government had power to make improvements outside the United States and their territories. Mr. Polk denied that it had power to make internal improvements, and Mr. Buchanan, his Secretary of State, was of the same strict-construction school. As to the second proposition, to confer upon the President or Congress the power to issue a charter or act of incorporation for the purpose of cutting a canal in Nicaragua, I need not ask the question, Who believes that either of them could exercise such a power under the Constitution? No foreign government could confer a greater power upon our President or our Congress than the Constitution delegates to them. The power of Congress to create a corporation within the limits of the United States was denied by Mr. Polk. But if there be any man (except the Senator from Illinois, Mr. Douglas) who thinks that either the President (who has no legislative power) or Congress, or both combined, have power to issue a charter incorporating a company to make a canal in Nicaragua, or a railroad in China, I have not yet seen him.

By the twelfth article of Mr. Hise's treaty it is provided, in consideration of the monopoly granted and the other grants in the preceding articles, that—

"The United States of America doth solemnly agree and undertake to protect and defend the State of Nicaragua in the possession and exercise of the sovereignty and dominion of all the country that may be rightfully under the jurisdiction of the said state, and when the circumstances and condition of the country may require it the United States shall employ their naval and military force to preserve the peace and maintain the neutrality of the said territories, and to hold and keep the same under the dominion and sovereignty of the Government of Nicaragua."

Does any man here defend such a treaty as that? This is one of the first instances since the ancient entangling alliance made with France by the treaties of 1778, in which any minister of this Government has attempted to disobey the solemn injunction of the Father of his Country to avoid all such political connections. For this is a political, not a mere commercial, alliance. It is difficult to perceive how it could have failed to plunge us into a war. Mr. Polk, in his message to the Senate, when transmitting the treaty which provides for the protection of the Panama railroad, that the Province of Panama shall be neutral territory, justifies that treaty on the ground that it is a treaty for commercial purposes merely, and not a treaty for a political alliance, which he admits would have been fatal to its confirmation. On the very principles laid down by Mr. Polk in that message it is impossible that he could have ever consented to the ratification of Mr. Hise's treaty.

There are other articles in this treaty sufficiently absurd to condemn it. But if I have not already shown enough for that purpose I feel that it would be useless to refer to any others. Is there a man in this Senate who will dare to stand up and say he would have voted for it? Not one! And if the whole Senate had voted for such a treaty it could never have been ratified either by President Polk or by President Taylor.

It was under these circumstances that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] made a charge against me on the floor of the Senate, on the 14th day of February last, that I had suppressed Mr. Hise's treaty. What right had he to say that I had suppressed the treaty? As a Senator he ought to have known, and if he attended to his duty, and read the correspondence transmitted to the Senate by the President, he did know that it was utterly untrue; for General Taylor himself informed the Senate that he had declined sending it to the Senate for ratification, for reasons which I have already given. If the Senator meant to say that I had concealed the treaty then his statement was equally destitute of truth, for he knew well that I had sent that treaty to Congress on the 18th day of July, 1850, and that it was among the published documents when he made the statement.

Mr. Douglas here said he meant only that the treaty had not been sent to the Senate for ratification. Senator Clayton continued:

The Senator has been on many occasions engaged in making charges against the Administration of President Taylor that this treaty was not submitted to the Senate for ratification. I have read publications of some of his stump speeches in regard to this treaty—has he any complaint to make now? Dare he now say that he would, under any possible circumstances, have voted for that treaty? Would he desire me to send such a treaty as that to the Senate for ratification? Would he ratify it? He cannot say that he would; and, if he cannot, with what show of propriety did he arraign me or President Taylor for declining to offer it to the Senate for ratification?

The Senator is shocked that we cannot annex the Central American Republics to the United States; yet he himself professes, almost in the same breath, to be opposed to the annexation. He amuses us with the assertion that the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, is a negation of the Monroe Doctrine in every particular; yet in the next breath he asserts that the treaty and the Monroe Doctrine are so identical that a violation of one is a violation of both. And he urges us to make an issue with the British Government about the colony of the Bay Islands, which he says is a striking infraction of the treaty as well as the Monroe Doctrine, and presents a very pretty quarrel as it stands. He is a great advocate of the Monroe Doctrine, yet refuses to vote for that doctrine when asserted in a resolution presented by one of his own party.

As he declared that his reason for opposing the treaty of the 19th of April, 1850, was its "negation of the Monroe Doctrine," I propose to examine the history of that doctrine, with a view to show not only that his assertion is unfounded, but that, while the policy indicated by the treaty has been the established policy of this Government for more than twenty years, the Monroe Doctrine never has been established as a principle to regulate the action of this Government, and has been repudiated as often as an effort has been made in Congress to sustain it. In saying this I do not mean to be understood that the executive branch of the Government has not recommended it to Congress for effect or to attain a special object, nor do I mean to censure any President for doing so, but the President does not constitute the Government; and I mean to say that neither the President and Senate, by any treaty, nor Congress, by any vote or resolution, have ever sustained it.

Mr. Monroe's declaration was made in his seventh annual message to Congress, on the 2d of December, 1823.

This celebrated declaration, which is often quoted as a pledge to go to war with any European nation which shall attempt to colonize any part of this hemisphere, is not a declaration by the President to a foreign country, but a mere recommendation to Congress. Congress utterly refused to adopt the recommendation at the time, and has ever since refused to make any such declaration. Mr. Clay, who was an ardent supporter of Mr. Monroe's Administration, did, at the time, propose a resolution to the House of Representatives, which was intended to approach the declaration, but even that failed. His resolution was, "that the people of these States would not see, without serious inquietude, any forcible interposition by the allied powers of Europe, in the behalf of Spain, to reduce to their former subjection those parts of the continent of America which have proclaimed and established for themselves, respectively, independent governments, and which have been solemnly recognized by the United States." Even had this passed it was but a poor response to the recommendation. It did not adopt Mr. Monroe's language or its equivalent, and it restricted "the serious inquietude" we should feel to the case of a forcible interposition by the allied powers to aid Spain! But Mr. Clay's resolution, even when thus diluted, backed by all the influence which he and Mr. Webster exerted on the occasion, never passed the House of Representatives. The Hon. James K. Polk, during the debate on the Panama mission, tells us the fate of Mr. Clay's resolution, and of Mr. Webster's kindred Greek resolution, which was defeated by a large majority at the same session. As Mr. Polk is often cited as an advocate of the opinion that Mr. Monroe's presidential message had pledged the nation to adopt the policy which Mr. Monroe merely recommended I beg to refer to his speech on the Panama mission, in 1826, as showing that he did not consider such recommendations as he and Mr. Monroe gave to Congress as in any sense binding upon this Government, without the consent of Congress.

In the same debate on the Panama mission James Buchanan opposed the mission on the same grounds.

Mr. Buchanan's complaint against Mr. Clay, which, he thought, went to show the weakness of Mr. Clay's head, was this: that he had instructed Mr. Poinsett to bring to the notice of the Mexican Government the message of Mr. Monroe, and that Mr. Poinsett had said to the Mexican Government that "the United States had pledged themselves not to permit any other power to interfere with the independence or form of government of the Spanish-American Republics." I know it is claimed that in Mr. Buchanan's instructions to Mr. Hise he asserted the Monroe Doctrine; but on a careful examination of his language it will be found that he did not instruct Mr. Hise to make any such declaration, and only said that European interference with the domestic concerns of the American republics would "jeopard their independence and ruin their interests," and in the very next sentence he assigns a reason why the United States decline to resist such interference. In the same instructions he tells Mr. Hise "it is our intention to maintain our established policy of non-intervention in concerns of foreign nations."

The most impassioned eloquence, urging again and again that Nicaragua was about to fall a victim to British aggression, and entreating the United States to interfere on the very principles advanced by Mr. Polk himself, in his message at the first session of the Twenty-ninth Congress, and reiterated in his Yucatan message, was of no avail. There seemed to be no chord in the bosom of that Administration which vibrated to the touch of those who kneeled and begged for succor in this dark hour of their distress. The Monroe Doctrine was laid aside; the President's own recommendation to Congress had, we must suppose, also, like Mr. Monroe's, "performed its office." The British, in their ships of war Alarm and Vixen, entered the San Juan river without even a remonstrance from our Government, on the 8th of January, 1848, and while Mr. Polk and Mr. Buchanan slumbered over all these forewarnings of the fate of Nicaragua, took the town of San Juan, and changed its name to "Greytown," stormed the fort of Serapacui, and, in the island of Cuba, in the midst of the magnificent lake of Nicaragua, dictated their own terms as conquerors to the unhappy people, who, relying upon our supposed promises of help contained in the President's previous public avowal of the Monroe Doctrine, had dared to wage war and expend their blood in defence of their native land. The documents before Congress exhibit on the part of our Government the most cold and contemptuous silence—a perfect indifference to all the appeals of our weak sister republic, and her letters were never answered until they were answered by Zachary Taylor, who has been so much abused for not carrying out the Monroe Doctrine! His letter to the President and mine to the Secretary of the State of Nicaragua are among the published documents before you; and how fully they refute the calumnies which, for three years, have filled a portion of the party press of this country and disgraced its character for veracity all men are now free to judge.

It is very remarkable that the Democracy, at the very origin of their present party, totally repudiated the whole Monroe Doctrine and came into power on the principle of Washington's doctrine of non-intervention. It has been often said, and there is much reason to believe, that Mr. Adams, who was Secretary of State at the time Mr. Monroe proposed the doctrine, was entitled to the paternity of it. Mr. Calhoun once intimated so much in the Senate. It was the principal topic of discussion in Congress during the administration of Mr. Adams, and it was generally believed at the time that the reassertion of the Monroe principle in Mr. Poinsett's instructions, and in the course adopted by the advocates of Mr. Adams in favor of the Panama mission, drove Mr. Adams from power and secured the election of President Jackson, whose party, shortly after his election, assumed the name of the Democratic party. Among his most ardent advocates was Mr. Van Buren, the great Coryphæus of that party, who, in a speech in the Senate, opposed the Panama mission and the Monroe Doctrine.

This speech was pronounced the ablest delivered in Congress since Mr. Pinkney's reply to Mr. King.¹ I could fill volumes from the speeches of Mr. Hayne, Mr. Rives, Mr. McLane, Mr. Calhoun, and all the ancient leaders of the Democratic party against this Monroe Doctrine. The Senator from Michigan [Lewis Cass] was perfectly correct when he said that this declaration of Mr. Monroe had lain, ever since its origin, a dead letter on our records. His recent attempt to revive it by his resolution at the last session [see Vol. II, page 286], closes the history of the Monroe doctrines. That resolution met with such violent opposition from his own party as to give us the assurance that no President who should undertake to act upon it could be sustained. With all similar resolutions, recommendations, and declarations, it was consigned to "that same ancient vault where all the kindred of the Capulets lie."

With this history before us, I would leave the Senator from Illinois the full benefit of his objection to the treaty of the 19th April, 1850, if I could. He said, and repeatedly said, that every article of that treaty is predicated upon a negation and repudiation of the Monroe declaration in relation to European colonization on this continent. The Senator does not understand the distinction between an alliance for political purposes and a compact to carry out a commercial enterprise. Every word of objection which he made to this treaty was equally applicable to Mr. Polk's treaty with New Granada to protect the province of Panama, and to Mr. Buchanan's proposition to Mr. Crampton to invite not only Great Britain, but France and other commercial powers, to enter into the same treaty stipulations which we had contracted in regard to a canal or railroad at Panama, and his opposition is founded on principles which would overthrow every commercial treaty we ever made.

But, notwithstanding his assertion that the treaty is a negation of the Monroe Doctrine in every particular, I must tell him that it presents the only instance in which an European power, which had attempted to colonize a portion of this hemisphere, and to extend the European system here, has been induced by the action of this Government to abandon the attempt. Impartial history will distinguish between such action and that mere noisy declamation to frighten the vulture from his victim, which has generally carried more consternation into the ranks of friends at home than of foes abroad.

Senator Douglas replied to Senator Clayton.

The Senator has assigned various reasons for withholding the Hise treaty from the consideration of the Senate. The first is that it was concluded by Mr. Hise without the authority of this Government. That may be true, but it is the first time I have ever heard it urged as a valid reason for withholding from the consideration of the Senate a treaty the objects and provisions of which were desirable.

The Hise treaty furnished conclusive evidence that the Government of Nicaragua was willing and anxious to confer upon the United States the exclusive and perpetual privilege of controlling the canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, instead of a partnership between us and the European powers. The Senator from Delaware (then Secretary of State) had the opportunity of securing to his own country that inestimable privilege, either by submitting the Hise treaty to the Senate, with the recommendation that it be so modified as to obviate all the objections which he deemed to exist to some of its provisions, or by making a new treaty which should embrace the principle of an exclusive and perpetual privilege without any of the obnoxious provisions. He did not do either. He suppressed the treaty—refused to accept of an exclusive privilege to his own country—and caused a new treaty to be made, which should lay the foundation of a partnership between the United States and Great Britain and the other European powers.

The Senator's object seems to be to glorify himself and General Taylor, at the expense of Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Polk, by accusing the latter of having tamely submitted to British aggressions of great enormity, which the former promptly rebuked by expelling the British from Central America. Let me ask him the question—did the Clayton and Bulwer treaty expel the British from Central America? Has England abandoned her protectorate? What power has she surrendered? What functionary has she recalled? What portion of the country—what inch of territory has she given up? I can show the Senator from Delaware where she has extended her possessions since the date of that treaty, and in contempt of its stipulations, notably in the case of the Bay Island colony.

Are we going to submit tamely to this? If we acquiesce we submit to a double wrong—a contravention of our avowed policy in regard to European colonization on this continent; and, secondly, a palpable and open violation of the terms and stipulations of the Clayton and Bulwer treaty. If we tamely submit to this twofold wrong, the less we say henceforth in regard to European colonization on the American continent the better for our own credit.

Here is a case where we must act if we ever intend to act. The act was done in contempt of our avowed policy. She cannot justify it before the civilized world and, therefore, dare not fight upon such an issue. England will fight us when her honor compels her to do it, and she will fight us for no other cause. And, sir, when England backs out of one colony upon our remonstrance, it will be a long time before she will establish another upon this continent without consulting us. And, sir, when England shall have refrained from interfering in the affairs of the American continent without consulting the wishes of this Government, what other power on earth will be willing to stand forward and do that which England concedes it prudent not to attempt?

One word upon the point made by the Senator that the Hise treaty was unconstitutional. If you have no right to accept an exclusive privilege to us under the Constitution, what right had you to take a partnership privilege in company with Great Britain? I choose to put the Senator upon the defensive, and let him demonstrate his right to do this thing jointly with England, and then I will draw from his argument my right to do it for the benefit of America alone. He, in his treaty, exercised the power. I have not. And he, having exercised the power, having pledged the faith of the nation to do an act, I have a right to call upon him to show the authority, under the Constitution of the United States, to make a guaranty jointly with England for the benefit of English subjects as well as American citizens.

Could we not open the canal to the commerce of the world as well by our volition as England could in conjunction with us? Would it not be as creditable to us as a nation to have acquired it ourselves, and then opened it freely, as to have gone into a partnership by which we should have no control in prescribing the terms upon which it should be opened? And, besides, if the grant had been made to us, and we had accepted it and then thrown it open to the commerce of all nations on our own terms and conditions, we held in our hands a right which would have been ample security for every nation under heaven to keep the peace with the United States. The moment England abused the privilege by seizing any more islands, by establishing any more colonies, by invading any more rights, or by violating any more treaties, we would use our privilege, shut up the canal, and exclude her commerce from the Pacific. Sir, when the time has arrived when we will not be told any more that Europe will not consent to this, and England will not consent to that. I heard that argument till I got tired of it when we were discussing the resolutions for the annexation of Texas. I heard it again on the Oregon question, and I heard it on the California question. It has been said on every occasion whenever we have had an issue about foreign relations, that England would not consent; yet she has acquiesced in whatever we have had the courage and the justice to do. And why? Because we kept ourselves in the right. England was so situated with her possessions on this continent that she dare not fight in an unjust cause. We would have been in the right to have accepted the privilege of making this canal, and England would never have dared to provoke a controversy with us. I think the time has come when America should perform her duty according to our own judgment, and our own sense of justice, without regard to what European powers might say with respect to it. I think this nation is about of age.

You may make as many treaties as you please to fetter the limits of this giant Republic, and she will burst them all from her, and her course will be onward to a limit which I will not venture to prescribe. What is the use of your guaranty that you will never erect any fortifications in Central America; never annex, occupy, or colonize any portion of that country? How do you know that you can avoid doing it? If you make the canal, I ask you if American citizens will not settle along its line; whether they will not build up towns at each terminus; whether they will not spread over that country and convert it into an American State; whether American principles and American institutions will not be firmly planted there? And I ask you how many years you think will pass away before you will find the same necessity to extend your laws over your own kindred that you found in the case of Texas? How long will it be before that day arrives? It may not occur in the Senator's day, nor mine. But so certain as this Republic exists, so certain as we remain a united people, so certain as the laws of progress which have raised us from a mere handful to a mighty nation shall continue to govern our action, just so certain are these events to be worked out, and you will be compelled to extend your protection in that direction.

Sir, when you look at the whole history of that question you will see that England, with her farseeing, sagacious policy, has attempted to circumscribe and restrict and restrain the free action of this Government. When was it that Great Britain you surrendered that exclusive right, you surrendered a great element of power which, in our hands, would have been wielded in the cause of justice for the benefit of mankind.

I was not for such a restrictive policy as would exclude British vessels from going through the canal, or the vessels of any other nation which should respect our rights. I would let them all pass freely, as long as they did not abuse the privilege; close it against them when they did. I insist that the American people occupy a position on this continent which rendered it natural and proper that we should exercise that power. I had no fear of a war with England. I have none now. War should be avoided as long as possible. But, sir, you need have no apprehension of a war with her, for the reason that, if we keep in the right, she dare not fight us, and she will not, especially for anything relating to American affairs. She knows she has given a bond to keep the peace, with a mortgage on all her real estate in America as collateral security, and she knows she forfeits her title to the whole, without hope of redemption, if she commits a breach of the bond. She will not fight unless compelled. Under the Hise treaty we could have fortified that canal at each end and, in time of war, could have closed it against our enemies and opened it at our own pleasure.

Then, sir, what was the objection to the acceptance of that exclusive privilege? I do not see it, sir. I know what were the private arguments urged in times which have gone by, and which, I trust, never will return; and that is, that England and other European powers never would consent that the United States should have an exclusive right to the canal. Well, sir, I do not know that they would have consented; but of one thing I am certain: I would never have asked their consent. When Nicaragua desired to confer the privilege, and when we were willing to accept it, it was purely an American question with which England had no right to interfere. Are we under any more obligation to consult European powers about an American question than the allied powers were, in their congress, to consult us when establishing the equilibrium of Europe by the agency of the Holy Alliance? It was a European question about which it was presumed America had nothing to say. This question of a canal in Nicaragua, when negotiations were pending to give it to us, was so much an American question that the English Government was not entitled to be consulted. England not consent! She will consent to allow you to do that just so long as you consent to allow her to hold Canada, the Bermudas, Jamaica, and her other American possessions. I hope seized the possession of the terminus of this canal? Just six days after the signing of the treaty which secured to us California! The moment that England saw that, by the pending negotiations with Mexico, California was to be acquired, she collected her fleets and made preparations for the seizure of the port of San Juan in order that she might be gate-keeper on the public highway to our own possessions on the Pacific. Hence I do not sympathize with that feeling which the Senator expressed yesterday that it was a pity to have a difference with a nation so friendly to us as England. Sir, I do not see the evidence of her friendship. It is not in the nature of things that she can be our friend. It is impossible she can love us. I do not blame her for not loving us. Sir, we have wounded her vanity and humbled her pride. She can never forgive us. But for us, she would be the first power on the face of the earth. She is jealous of us, and jealousy forbids the idea of friendship. England does not love us; she cannot love us, and we do not love her either. We have some things in the past to remember that are not agreeable. She has more in the present to humiliate her that she cannot forgive.

I do not wish to administer to the feeling of jealousy and rivalry that exists between us and England. I wish to soften and smooth it down as much as possible; but why close our eyes to the fact that friendship is impossible while jealousy exists? Hence England seizes every island in the sea and rock upon our coast where she can plant a gun to intimidate us or to annoy our commerce. Why is she at the expense to keep her position on that little barren island Bermuda, and the miserable Bahamas, and all the other islands along our coast, except as sentinels upon our actions? Why, then, talk about the friendly bearing of England toward us when she is extending that policy every day? New treaties of friendship, seizure of islands, and erection of new colonies in violation of her treaties seem to be the order of the day. In view of this state of things, I am in favor of meeting England as we meet a rival; meet her boldly, treat her justly and fairly, but make no humiliating concession even for the sake of peace. She has as much reason to make concessions to us as we have to make them to her. I would not willingly disturb the peace of the world; but, sir, the Bay Island colony must be discontinued. It violates the treaty.

On March 14 Senator Clayton spoke in rebuttal. Senator Douglas, he said, had recklessly asserted that Great Britain had not surrendered an inch of the territory she had seized in Central America. If the Senator had read the official papers he would have seen that the British Government had expressly stated that it would not exert force to sustain its protectorate of the Mosquito king.

If they do attempt it that must inevitably involve us in a controversy which never can terminate honorably for us without their utter abandonment of any such claim. I do not pretend that either they or we cannot interfere with a Central American state which robs or plunders subjects of their country, or citizens of the other. Were any of these states to imprison our citizens, or rob them of their property, it is our duty to protect them, and, after all efforts of honorable diplomacy are exhausted, to compel a full indemnity for the wrong. Neither the law of reprisals for torts, nor the right of any government to interfere for the protection of its citizens or subjects against oppression and outrage, has been abolished by the treaty of 1850. We should be as prompt to demand reparation for wrongs done to an American citizen by Honduras as by any other state or country, without in any way violating the treaty. Let us wait patiently and learn how the facts really are before we proclaim the perfidy of any nation. But, without blustering, let us be firm in executing the observance of the whole treaty when our intervention is really necessary to enforce it.

The honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] addressed a speech to his partisans in the galleries on all the topics used to excite and inflame the populace. When defeated on one point he shifted to another. From glorifying Hise's treaty (as he has done for two years) he shrunk back, when its folly was exposed, to a mere assertion that he preferred it only because it gave us the exclusive right of way. What has become of his Monroe Doctrine, which was the chief objection he made to the treaty? He has abandoned it—fled from it, and has not a word to say in its defence! What answer has he made to the glaring evidence of the gross unconstitutionality of the Hise treaty creating a corporation to dig a canal more than a thousand miles from the utmost limits of the United States? Not a word! He is equally silent now on every other topic connected with the treaty, upon which he harangued the populace for the last two years, except the single matter of the exclusive privilege. On that point he is yet sure he is right, and it is my duty to expose him.

to navigate it; that forts should be built at both ends to protect it; and, of course, that we should protect it by every other means necessary. When the Government shall have made it, and when the Government shall have established the forts, the canal, he says, will be open to everybody on the same terms; and thus he seeks the exclusive grant of a right of way! What does he want with it? Why does he prefer it to the plan adopted of opening the canal to all nations on the same terms? The Senator says he would hold it as a rod—yes, a rod, to compel other nations to keep the peace! He would have no more settling of islands on the coast of Central America! If any government attempted it he would shut his canal to them! He would also compel all foreign nations to treat us with all respect and regard by means of the tremendous rod which he would hold in his hands. Let us look a little into the justice of this thing as regards our own country.

It has been supposed that the construction of this great work will cost fifty or a hundred millions of dollars. I suppose we could not build a proper fortification at each end under less than a million of dollars for each fort. We would be compelled to maintain a garrison there; and, in the event of a war, to maintain a large navy, such a one as could resist the naval powers of the earth. If we were to go to war with France, or England, or any other great naval power, that, of course, would be one of the first points of attack. How convenient would it be for us to defend it at a distance of two thousand miles, and send troops to the different forts, and ships to protect our vessels that pass through the canal! We build it, and everybody is to have the benefit of the canal on the same terms, in time of peace! In war we alone are to defend it! The interest on a hundred millions would be six millions a year. The expenses of protecting and taking care of the canal and keeping it in good order would probably, when added to the interest, make an annual outlay from the treasury of the United States in that distant country of not less than ten millions of dollars. Now, why should we make such an expenditure? Because we want a rod—a rod! Sir, I think it would prove to be a rod to inflict injuries upon ourselves. We want nothing but the right of way there. We proposed that no nation should go through that canal unless she agreed to protect it. In case they agreed to protect it we should want no forts, no garrisons, and no naval force to guard what none could attack. But, on the other hand, if we were to adopt the plan of the Senator we should have to keep a standing army in that country to protect it in the event of a war between us and

The Senator from Illinois did not utter a word against the treaty when it passed. Three weeks afterward he had his name recorded against it. He was a candidate for the Presidency we all know. By taking ground against the treaty he placed himself in direct antagonism with all the other candidates for the Presidency of both parties. By making the treaty unpopular he killed off Cass, and Clay, and Webster, and Houston, and both the distinguished Senators from Virginia, and all the others who had ever been named for the Presidency. He fired into the whole flock of his rivals—shot dead, as he thought, all who could stand in his way. How persevering he has been in attacking the treaty since we all know. We know how many stump speeches he has made in opposition to it. It has been his theme by day and by night; his grand point which entitles him to preference over all others is just here. He is for annulling the treaty, and all the rest for it. He must kill the treaty, or it will kill him.

The Senator from Illinois complained that the treaty was a European partnership. This word "partnership" composed a large part of his address. He seemed to think that if he could only get the idea fixed in the American mind that we had gone into partnership with England that would make the treaty odious. So he exerts himself to rouse the ancient prejudice against England. He says she does not love us and we do not love her. Will he tell us what foreign nation he does love? An American statesman, when speaking or acting in a public capacity, has no right to love any country but his own. She furnishes an object large enough for all his affections. The great Father of his Country, in his farewell address, warns us of the folly and danger of either loving or hating any foreign nation. As to Englishmen, when we declared independence, we announced that we held them as we hold men of all other nations, "enemies in war—in peace friends." The policy pursued here by the Senator has shown him to be rather a lover than a hater of England and her people. There is just as much propriety in saying that all the men who travel on the highway are partners as that the contracting parties to this convention are such. He would view every commercial treaty with England as a partnership and therefore objectionable.

All the objections of the Senator dwindle down, I repeat, to a single point—that the treaty ought to have been a treaty for the exclusive right of way across the isthmus. He thinks that the Government of the United States should have obtained the grant—the right to make a canal, and an exclusive right foreign nations. What would be thought of a man who should purchase a farm and then, after he had gone to the expense of putting it in order, invite everybody to come and till it, but should direct them to take care that they should pay no part of the expense of keeping up the repairs, nor any part of the taxes upon the land? I do not know that this or any other illustration can make his proposition seem more preposterous than it does on its own mere statement.

The Senator from Illinois said "that treaties could not fetter or confine the limbs of this giant Republic." I do not know precisely the extent to which he meant to be understood; but the language and the manner in which the Senator applied it seemed to me to go to this extent: that we had a country exempt from the obligations of treaties, and that our limbs cannot be circumscribed by treaties. We were to disregard obligations of that description, being, like a "young giant," rising in power beyond anything that had been known in the history of the world before. The Senator made the same remark in reference to the treaty with Mexico. There is a clause in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo to which the Senator made great objection at the time of its ratification, in effect, that, without the consent of the governments of both countries, the line established by that treaty as the boundary between them should be the ultima thule—the utmost limit of our territory. Yes, sir, we plighted our faith and honor in that treaty, confirmed as it was by more than two-thirds of the American Senate, that beyond that limit we would never go. Yet the Senator from Illinois says that the day is coming when we shall be compelled to violate the treaty—that treaties cannot fetter our limbs or restrict our limits. Sir, I regretted to hear it, because of the influence of that Senator in his party, as one of their standing candidates for the Presidency. I should have regretted to have heard it from any Senator. We form the body that is to ratify all the treaties of the United States. We are the constitutional advisers of the President. We are a part of the treaty-making power.

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—What I said was that the steady, regular growth and expansion of this country would, in all probability, go ahead in the future as it has done in the past; that you might make as many treaties as you please, and still they would not check our growth, and, because they could not, it was useless to make treaties which must of necessity be violated; hence I argued against the making of treaties pledging our faith not to do that which inevitably would be done in the future. It was an argument in favor of the fidelity and observance of treaty stipulations, and that we should not, therefore, be so profuse in our pledges in cases where we could not fulfill them.

SENATOR CLAYTON.—An argument in favor of fidelity and observance of treaty stipulations, indeed! The idea is that we are incapable, from the nature of our institutions or our character as a people, of maintaining and observing treaties.

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—No, sir.

SENATOR CLAYTON (laughing).—We must grow, says the Senator. Our "manifest destiny," he means, is to extend our limits.

It was but the other day he told me we must annul the Central American treaty.

We cover a contiguous territory greater, perhaps, than ever was enjoyed by any civilized nation on earth. And yet we are told that we are not capable of binding ourselves even by treaty stipulations to observe our plighted faith and fulfill our solemn engagement of honor. I remonstrate against the declaration of such a principle, or rather of such a want of all principle. It is nothing more nor less than this: let there be as many explanations on the part of the Senator from Illinois as he may choose to make—that we are incapable of controlling our impulses and passions when our interests may lead us to violate our engagements. "Treaties cannot fetter us," says he. Sir, the plighted faith of every man of honor binds him at all times, no matter what his interest may be, and the plighted faith of nations equally binds them; and the last place from which a contrary principle should be promulgated is the Senate of the United States. Here, I repeat, we sit as the constitutional advisers of the President of the United States; and, if foreign nations come to understand that the position is taken by members holding a prominent party position here that treaties cannot be any restraint upon us, what foreign nation will ever make another treaty with us? If there be a country on earth that owes more than any other to treaties it is ours. We owe our national existence to the old French treaties of 1778. Sir, Washington, in the darkest period of the Revolution, was at Valley Forge, wintering with his suffering soldiers, when the intelligence reached them that France had entered into an alliance with us, and had guaranteed our independence. The glorious news ran through all the ranks of the American army, and the great "Father of his Country" stood up and waved his hat and shouted for joy in concert with his troops! Our destiny from that moment became fixed. Every American saw that we were free, whatever doubt he might have entertained about it before. We owe, I repeat, our national independence to treaties. And now, when we are becoming strong shall we forget it? Shall not an American statesman adhere to treaties with as much fidelity as an Englishman, or a Frenchman, or one of any other nation? Shall he not rejoice that his country does stand by her honor? I trust that no idea of our growing importance, or necessity of our enlargement will ever sink into the heart of any other American Senator to induce him to abandon that principle without which our country would become a byword and a hissing among the nations. The honor of our country is yet dearer to the true American than all the land that Mexico and Central America contain.

The Senator, after "swallowing Mexico," must take in all the other intermediate countries; and, as Great Britain owns many of the islands and dependencies to be devoured, he must include the British lion—a matter not quite so easy of digestion. What an intimation is it for us to make to the world that we may some day annex these weak little sister republics, thousands of miles away from us, with a population so different from ours, especially in laws, institutions, and usages! I would much rather other nations should know the fact that San Salvador, one of these very Central American states, once applied for admission into our Union, and that our Government not only declined to receive them but treated the application as one not worthy of a moment's serious regard.

I heard with pleasure and admiration that passage in the inaugural address of President Pierce which declared that his administration should leave no blot upon his country's record, and that no act within his constitutional control would be tolerated which could not challenge a ready justification before the tribunal of the civilized world. How great the difference between that and the sentiments of the Senator from Illinois! Let the President adhere to these principles and he will thereby disarm opposition; he will make of those who have heretofore been strong political opponents some of the warmest friends he has in the world. I put this declaration in contrast with all these gigantic ideas [laughter] of breaking treaties and going beyond the limits of the country in defiance of them. But if the President should, in opposition to all our hopes and belief, be induced to disregard the faith of treaties, he will hardly progress through half the period of his constitutional term before he will find the great heart of the American people, which is honest to the core, opposed to him, and the most sincere of his present friends will vindicate the justice of the sentence against him, while they sorrow for his fall.

The assumption of a protectorate over the Mosquito Indians was continued by Great Britain, who construed the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as permitting this form of territorial occupation. The United States refused to accept this construction. Finally, to settle the vexed questions, a new treaty, the Dallas-Clarendon, was negotiated in October, 1856, and was ratified soon afterwards by the Senate with the addition of certain amendments which Great Britain refused to accept.

In 1860 Great Britain concluded treaties with Honduras and Nicaragua which provided for the cession of the Bay Islands to the former, and the relinquishment of the British protectorate over the Mosquito Islands.

In 1881 the treaty became the subject of controversy between James G. Blaine, Secretary of State under President Garfield, and Lord Granville; Mr. Blaine contending that any isthmian canal should be under the political control of the United States, and declaring that this country would view with grave concern any interference by a European nation in this or any other American territorial affair. He asked that the treaty be made to conform to the conditions of the time, which had materially changed since 1850.

Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, who succeeded to Blaine's position soon after the accession of President Arthur, took a still stronger position, contending that the treaty was obsolete. Lord Granville asserted that the treaty, never having been abrogated, was still in force.

THE NICARAGUA CANAL

[HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY]

Hepburn [La.] Introduces in the House Bill to Complete Nicaragua Canal—Debate: in Favor, Mr. Hepburn, Champ Clark [Mo.], William L. Terry [Ark.], Jonathan P. Dolliver [Ia.], D. S. Alexander [N. Hitt [Ill.], Joseph G. Cannon [Ill.]; Bill Is Passed; It Is Postponed by the Senate—The Second Hay-Pauncefote Treaty.

THE route of the Nicaragua canal was surveyed in 1850 for the Vanderbilt syndicate by Colonel Orville Childs. The Vanderbilt concession lapsed in 1856, owing to non-fulfillment of conditions. The unsettled condition of domestic affairs preceding and during the Civil War diverted attention from the canal project. It was taken up again in 1867, and a treaty was concluded in June between Nicaragua and the United States, by which the right of free transit over any canal to be constructed through the former country was assured to the citizens of the latter.

In March, 1872, President Grant, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, appointed a commission of three military and naval engineers to investigate the route of an isthmian canal. After considering the Panama and Tehuantepec routes also, the commission, on February 7, 1876, reported unanimously in favor of the Nicaragua route from Greytown on the Atlantic coast by way of the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua to Brito on the Pacific coast.

In May, 1878, Lieutenant Lucien N. B. Wyse and others obtained a concession from the Government of Colombia, giving them the exclusive privilege of constructing and operating a ship canal across the State of Panama.

In May, 1879, an international congress of 135 delegates, mostly engineers, was held at Paris, under call of Ferdinand de Lesseps, the distinguished constructor of the Suez Canal, to consider the best route for the American isthmian canal. Eleven delegates were from the United States, and these ably presented the advantages of the Nicaragua route. Nevertheless the congress approved a sea-level canal between Colon and Panama. The "Compagnie Universelle du Canal Inter-océanique de Panamá" was organized under the laws of France, with de Lesseps as president. It purchased the Wyse concession for 10,000,000 francs ($2,000,000). De Lesseps estimated the cost of construction at $127,000,000, and the time at eight years, both considerably less than the estimates of the engineers' congress.

After the preliminary surveys the work of construction was begun in 1881. In a short time it was seen that the difficulties were greater than had been anticipated, and that the estimates were absurdly low, and the company turned its energies largely from construction to raising additional capital.

In 1884, during President Arthur's Administration, a treaty was concluded between the United States and Nicaragua by which our Government agreed to build a canal, to be owned jointly by the two countries, and to protect the integrity of Nicaragua. The treaty was still unratified when Grover Cleveland became President, and he withdrew it from the Senate on the ground that the construction and ownership of the canal under such conditions would be "inconsistent with its dedication to universal and neutral use," and would "entail measures for its realization beyond the scope of our national policy or present means."

In April, 1887, a syndicate of New York capitalists, under the name of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, secured from Nicaragua a grant (known as the Menocal concession) for the exclusive construction and operation of the canal. A bill was brought before the House to incorporate the company. It passed on January 4, 1889, by a vote of 102 to 75, after a spirited debate in which the opponents of the bill characterized the project as a "stock-jobbing" affair, and charged its promoters with endeavoring, by national incorporation of the company, to make foreign capitalists believe that the United States Government was guaranteeing the enterprise. Indeed, the advocates of the bill secured its adoption only by agreeing to an amendment of William S. Holman (Indiana) in which the United States Government explicitly repudiated any responsibility for the company, and to a further amendment of James E. Cobb (Alabama) in which this fact was ordered to be printed on all the bonds, stocks, contracts, and other obligations of the company.

The Senate non-concurred with the House amendments, and a conference was appointed. Their report was adopted by both chambers, and President Cleveland approved the bill on February 20.

The Nicaragua Canal Company under this charter of incorporation by Congress, with a capital of $100,000,000, and authority to increase this amount to $200,000,000, proceeded to the work of construction, expending within a year $2,000,000. Subscriptions to the capital stock were not forthcoming as expected, and the work was discontinued, while the company sought aid of Congress to guarantee an issue of $100,000,000 four per cent. construction bonds. This Congress refused to do.

EUROPEAN CONNECTION WITH THE ISTHMIAN CANAL

SENATE, DECEMBER 19, 1889-JANUARY 8, 1890

On December 19 George F. Edmunds (Vermont) introduced in the Senate a joint resolution declaring:

That the Government of the United States will look with serious concern and disapproval upon any connection of any European Government with the construction or control of any ship-canal across the Isthmus of Darien or across Central America, and must regard any such connection or control as injurious to the just rights and interests of the United States and as a menace to their welfare.

That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate this expression of the views of Congress to the governments of the countries of Europe.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which reported it back on January 4, 1889. It came forward for discussion on January 5.

John Sherman (Ohio) explained the occasion for the resolution.

Undoubtedly the Panama canal scheme is laboring under very great embarrassments. It has recently, in a measure, failed or suspended, and the authorities of France have provided for its suspension. A great many French people as well as Americans and Englishmen and people of other countries are interested in the building of the Panama canal under a local charter. The Government of France has hitherto always disclaimed any connection with the enterprise as a government, but it has been conducted by the private management of De Lesseps and others under a Central American company. However, recently, on account of the failure of De Lesseps and the necessity of large sums of money being raised, it has been proposed by a friendly power, the Government of France, that it should itself assume the construction of this canal, or undertake some control or ownership or jurisdiction over it, or exercise some power which is inconsistent with the established doctrine of the American Government.

We thought that under those circumstances it was but an act of friendly caution to express the opinion so often expressed in this country that the Government of the United States would not look with satisfaction upon the exercise of any such power.

Wilkinson Call (Florida) opposed adopting the resolution.

If there is any reason which can be vindicated upon argument and proper consideration for prohibiting any great work of beneficence to mankind I can not see how it can be brought to bear upon this question.

The construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama is a work that will promote the welfare of every human being in the world. That this Government should interpose obstacles upon the plea that it may promote the extension of monarchical institutions or the systems of government that prevail in Europe does not address itself to my mind with any kind of reasonableness.

The Monroe Doctrine was predicated entirely upon the assumption that the system of European governments might be promoted by their colonization upon this hemisphere. This country is now strong enough to defy without fear of results any efforts of that kind; and it can control the matter in its diplomatic relations without preventing or obstructing the construction of this great work necessary to the commerce of the world, necessary to the cheapening of the articles of necessity, of human consumption, to every human being in this country and in every other country.

Why should not the Panama canal be built? Does it interfere with the power of this country? Does it in any way interfere with any of its public policies? Does it increase the power of the French or any other government to restrict the extension of republican institutions or the colonization of this country by people of republican sympathy and friendly to our form of government? Its influence in that respect amounts to nothing.

In my judgment for us to interpose any obstacle, to say that any European nation shall not contribute as a government to the construction of a great public work, is going back to the barbarous ages.

Sir, for one I am free to say that I shall regard with pleasure any effort on the part of the French Government or any other associated power to build this great work, which can only promote the welfare of every family and every human being, and increase the number of their comforts, and cheapen the productions which are necessary for them.

Mr. President, I hope that we shall not be bound by the prejudices and fears which originated years ago when this country was weak now when we can defy the world, that we should be restricted within narrow limits by European colonization upon the Western Hemisphere. Sir, if France should establish a monarchical government in Panama or Central America, and this country should see fit to declare that it should not be done, it would disappear in a moment. But what connection has the construction of this great work with the establishment of monarchical systems or institutions on this hemisphere?

It is not difficult to see that it has none whatever. The question of the construction of a waterway over the Isthmus of Panama for the commerce of the world and the question of monarchy or republic, of aristocratic or democratic institutions, have no connection with each other. It is even difficult to see how any one can even make a pretence to that effect.

John T. Morgan (Alabama) opposed the second section of the resolution as unwarranted dictation to the President, cutting him off from diplomatic negotiation with France in the matter.

I am heartily in accord with the first part of the resolution and have no hesitancy in expressing the opinion, as it is expressed here, that it is the duty of the United States to intervene to prevent any foreign government from getting any such hold upon this Western Hemisphere as will give it, in consequence of its committal to a certain line of enterprise, governmental authority that it does not now possess. I very well understand, I think, that, if the Government of France should, for the purpose of relieving the necessities and distress of Mr. De Lesseps and of his coadjutors in this work, come in as a government to aid them by any assumption it may make of the responsibilities he has already incurred and under which he has failed so far—can very well understand that the Government of France in such a proceeding would necessarily exercise its governmental functions in Panama. You would have to make room for the authoritative action of two governments there before France could carry this enterprise into execution.

The Government of Colombia, with its present power and authority, its sovereignty over that country, would be forced to yield, either by treaty engagements, concession, or in some other way, to the governmental authority that France might choose to exercise in promoting this enterprise in Panama which the French Chamber would decree that government should engage in. That would necessarily, it seems to me, sooner or later bring about a conflict of authority between the governments; and I can not fail to understand that the weak power of Colombia would succumb to the greater military power of France in such an event as I have stated, and that the ultimate result would be French domination in Panama, and perhaps an extension of that domination to other states in what is now the Republic of Colombia.

American hemisphere, not to any mere effort to aid in an enterprise to develop the commerce of the world and promote the welfare of mankind.

SENATOR SHERMAN.—I am rather surprised that the Senator from Alabama should take the ground that we can not dictate the policy of the President so as to restrain him to some extent in the direction of his negotiations. We can not take from him the treaty-making power; no one proposes to do that; but Congress can define the policy of this Government upon any question within its power, clearly so; and it is rather surprising to me that the Senator from Alabama should seem to care so much for the power of the President, which is purely an executive power, sharing with us, it is true, the legislative power only to a certain extent. When Congress (which includes the President) declares a public policy, the President is bound to conform in his negotiations to that policy; otherwise he would violate the will of the people as expressed in Congress. There is not anything, therefore, in the point made by the Senator from Alabama as to the form of the resolution.

I am absolutely indifferent about it as a member of the committee, but as the committee reported it as a joint resolution I hope it will so stand, because it combines the strongest form of expression in which we can declare this public policy, that is, by a joint resolution of Congress instead of a mere concurrent resolution or a resolution of the Senate alone.

As to the matter to be declared, I am happy to say that the Senator from Alabama agrees with me entirely. I find that he introduced a resolution in 1881 which was finally reported unanimously from the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which he was then a member. I will read the first part of the report embodying the resolution:

That the subject embraced in the resolution is one of great national importance, and worthy of the most careful consideration.

This report was made by Mr. Burnside from the Committee on Foreign Relations May 16, 1881. I will say that was the time when De Lesseps was beginning his work on the Panama canal. It was the subject of discussion, and a correspondence had occurred between the then Secretary of State, now present, a member of the Senate [Mr. Evarts], and the Government of France, in which France disclaimed any purpose to exercise any power or control over the canal, and the matter proceeded upon that disclaimer. Then this resolution was introduced by the Senator from Alabama:

So I would resist in the beginning, I would resist always, the intrusion of a trans-Atlantic government into Panama for any purpose of a governmental character connected with the construction or, if you please, the operation of a canal.

JOHN H. REAGAN [Tex.].—Mr. President, the memories of a hundred years ago ought to inspire us with some respect for the French people. The knowledge that it is the only prominent republic in Europe ought to give us some sympathy with that republic. We ought not to be willing to offer an unnecessary offence to a government which has, under the greatest trials, proven itself the greatest friend of this republic.

It seems to me, sir, that the very broad general language used here would be calculated to offend the sense of right not only of France but of any other government or people, unless it is restricted so as to simply limit the declaration to political control.

I do not know how many millions have been spent in the construction of the Panama canal, but its completion will work a larger revolution upon the commerce of the world than the completion of the Suez canal did. I do not know to what extent there has been diplomatic correspondence with reference to the action of this company on that canal, or whether there has been any; but whether there has been or not is not material to the view I take now, that it would be going too far for us to make a pronunciamiento against any connection of that or any other government with the construction of a ship-canal—I will omit the word "control"—with the construction of a ship-canal across the isthmus. No country is so much interested in the success of that work as the United States. Here we stand on the half-way ground between western Europe with all her vast wealth and commerce and the teeming millions of Asia. It places our country in the gateway of that great commerce; and shall we uselessly, shall we unnecessarily, shall we officiously attempt to interfere with and arrest the progress of that work?

I feel very sure that the introducer of this resolution and the committee who reported it would not lend themselves to a mere stock-jobbing proposition to discredit that work in order to increase the value of the stock of an enterprise engaged in by another concern. I cannot conceive that they would be influenced by such a consideration as that. I am disposed to guard the rights of this Government upon the continent of North America as declared in what we call the Monroe Doctrine, but the Monroe Doctrine never went to the extent that this resolution goes. It looked to the exertion of political control on the

Resolved, That the interests of the people of the United States of America and the welfare and security of their Government are so involved in the subject of the construction of ship-canal and other ways for the transportation of sea-going vessels across the isthmus connecting North and South America that the Government of the United States, with the frankness which is due to all other peoples and governments, hereby asserts that it will insist that its consent is a necessary condition precedent to the execution of any such project, and also as to the rules and regulations under which other nations shall participate in the use of such canals or other ways, either in peace or in war.

It must be perceived that the resolution of the Senator from Alabama was much stronger, much more comprehensive, than the language of the resolution now before us.

I do not think that the passage of this resolution would have a bad influence. I think it would have a friendly influence. The Government of France evidently hesitates about action, and, if we only open the door a little wider they will step in, in sympathy with their citizens, who have invested their money here, and then you will have one of the great European powers planting its flag and its money and its commerce on that narrow isthmus between the Pacific and the Atlantic Oceans. That is against the policy declared by Mr. Monroe, reaffirmed by General Jackson, and in more or less distinct form by every President of the United States from that time to this, especially by Mr. Buchanan, who maintained it, and also by the Administration of President Hayes and by the declaration of General Garfield in his inaugural address. For one, I am ready, in any form in which it may be presented, whether in the form of a resolution of the Senate or of a concurrent resolution or a joint resolution, to declare that the public policy of our fathers shall be the policy of the future.

SENATOR CALL.—Have not the people of Central America the right to accept aid from a foreign government in the construction of this canal? Have they not the right to negotiate for a connection with France, as they have done, by the exercise of their sovereign power as a people? Who denies it? But this resolution says that it is a menace to the people of the United States that the people of Central America should, in their sovereign legislative national capacity, accept any connection of a foreign government in the construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Darien. That is the unquestionable language of the declaration, and what does that mean but a sovereign declaration of this people by the two Houses of Congress, unless it is a false declaration, that we will make war upon the people of any portion of this hemisphere, upon the people of Central America especially, who shall exercise their powers in such a way as to bring about a connection of that kind with a European government? And that is the declaration that we are told is the Monroe Doctrine. I deny it.

The doctrine of our fathers never asserted a proposition of this kind. They never asserted our absolute right of domination over the people of this hemisphere, over the people of Central America, and we know that this is a false declaration and is not intended and ought not to be intended, to be observed. We know that a European government has forcibly established its domination, since the Monroe Doctrine was proclaimed, over a part of Central America, and maintains it in full and absolute and undisturbed sovereign power to-day without war on the people of the United States, without our support of that declaration, if it was intended so to apply, and it has existed for years and years in British Honduras.

But, Mr. President, it is said if the Government of France expends its money in the construction of this canal it will have a right to defend the rights which it has so acquired. Well, that may lead to war. Has not the Government of France or the Government of England the right to defend the rights of their citizens in all these countries of Central and South America when they have invested their money there, as they have done under the treaty regulations with those countries, and would not that lead to war? There is nothing in it; whether it is the money of the people or the money of the government is the same thing, and South America and Central America and Mexico are full of the money of British subjects and French citizens and German subjects to-day, and there is none of the money of the people of the United States there. These European capitalists are doing the work of civilization under treaty regulations and under the exercise of the sovereign power of the people of those several governments to-day; and the assertion that we propose forcibly and by war to forbid it is equally unwise, equally untrue, and unjustifiable in every view of public policy.

The Monroe Doctrine has nothing to do with the question of the construction of a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Darien or Central America. The interest and dignity of the Government of the United States have nothing to do with it except that they should promote it, should expend their money for it, should encourage it. There may be some question of wise public policy in saying that it shall be controlled by an international commission, by regulations established by the nations of the world, and the resolution of the Senator from Alabama wisely so declared.

John Hay, Secretary of State, entered into diplomatic correspondence with the British Foreign Office with a view to making a new treaty on the subject to remove any objection which might arise out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The treaty was signed at Washington, D. C., on February 5, 1900, by Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote, the British Ambassador.

The important articles of the treaty were as follows:

THE FIRST HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY

"Article I. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares; and that, subject to the provisions of the present convention, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"Art. II. The high contracting parties desiring to preserve and maintain the 'general principle' of neutralization established in Article VIII of the Clayton-Bulwer convention adopt, as the basis of such neutralization, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople October 29, 1858, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal; that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary, and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be

But that is a different thing from this resolution and this enunciation.

This is the age of intellectual success. It is the age of benevolence and beneficence. For this country to undertake to say that we will deny the right of the people of Central America to accept of any aid, of any connection with any European government in the construction of the great works necessary for their industrial development and for the industrial development of all the peoples of the world is, I think, going back to the dark ages, and unworthy of that Government and that people which should be foremost in all that advances civilization, the arts of peace, the triumphs of mind over matter, and the subjugation of the earth and the seas and all the elements to the use and comfort and happiness of all nations and peoples of the earth.

The joint resolution was passed on January 8 by a vote of 49 to 3.

The House referred it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It was not acted upon during the session.

In 1895 Congress provided for three engineers, known from the chief, Colonel William Ludlow, U. S. A., as the Ludlow Commission, to investigate the feasibility and cost of completing the work done by the Nicaragua Canal Company. They reported in favor of completing the canal, and estimated the cost at $133,472,893—about twice the estimate of the company.

Congress then provided for a new commission, known as the Walker Commission from its chief, Rear-Admiral John G. Walker, to continue the investigation. After thorough surveys, in May, 1899, it confirmed the Ludlow report.

In the meantime, however, an international commission of experts had reported favorably upon completing the Panama canal, and so Congress added to the number of the Walker Commission and ordered it to report on the best route in Central America.

President McKinley's statement in his annual message in December, 1898, that the construction of an isthmian canal was a national necessity, met with such a favorable response from Congress and the country that in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than twenty-four hours at any one time except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible, but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within twenty-four hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this convention, and, in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"7. No fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

The President submitted the treaty at once to the Senate.

This was the canal situation when, on February 17, 1900, William P. Hepburn (Iowa) of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported to the House a bill "to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans." It authorized the appropriation of $140,000,000 to complete the Nicaragua canal.

On May 1 Mr. Hepburn supported the bill.

THE ISTHMIAN CANAL

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 1-2, 1900

He said that the objections to the Nicaragua canal from an engineering point of view had been thoroughly answered by the various investigating committees, particularly that under Admiral Walker.

They became satisfied that the route was entirely practicable. Now, we have the third commission—one not ready to report, and for which report we are told we must wait. But, Mr. Chairman, these difficulties thrown in the way of this enterprise by members of this House who have doubts in regard to the engineering features—and doubts are all they have upon these matters of engineering—these gentlemen are not the only opponents. We are met by another class of gentlemen who say that, while this route is practicable, while the canal is needed, while it should be an object of solicitude and fostering care and speedy completion by the Government, yet there are certain difficulties of a diplomatic nature that absolutely prevent us from doing anything.

They say truthfully that, in 1850, a treaty was negotiated between Great Britain and our country, popularly known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that one of its provisions declares that neither party alone, except in conjunction with the other, will secure this water route, or will attempt in any way to defend it without the consent of the other, and they say these provisions are a barrier, and until that is removed the Government of the United States can not, in good faith, undertake this work.

I would not be an authority upon a grave question like this, but I want to call your attention to names of a long list of statesmen who have declared that that instrument—the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—is not now of operative force against us; that it either had been violated by Great Britain in such degree as to justify us in no longer recognizing its potency or that it had become obsolete because of the object stated by that treaty having been abandoned by both parties, or that both parties had themselves abandoned it by making no effort to carry out its provisions.

In that list of statesmen that have taken one or the other of those positions all insist that at most or at the worst we had the right to declare it void and no longer binding. I name Secretary Marcy and President Pierce, Secretary Cass, and every President from Pierce down to the present incumbent, except Lincoln and Johnson. Douglas, Marcy, Frelinghuysen, Blaine, and others, all of them have united in saying that we stood to-day in the position, from the acts of other parties, that entitles us to declare we would no longer be bound by its provisions.

carry on the commerce of the United States to foreign ports. A gentleman yesterday on this floor spoke of the loss of three billions of money in a single decade that occurred to us in our commercial transactions by reason of this condition. In that estimate let me say that he lost sight entirely of the colossal sum of $2,000,000,000 that we have expended, or, in other words, placed in the pockets of foreign shipowners, for carrying that traffic which ought to be carried in American ships. Hundreds of gentlemen have expressed themselves in my hearing as utterly opposed to the doctrine of American subsidies for ships. And yet the whole country, without opposition, will unite with me, I know, in saying that this great canal as a means of stimulating shipbuilding in the shipyards in the United States is going to be, and must necessarily be, the most important item of legislation that this country has undertaken to enact in the last thirty years. [Applause.]

CHAMP CLARK [Mo.].—Your bill contemplates that we shall protect this canal. That is my understanding. My own version is that we have the right to fortify; to do as we please with it; that it is ours. Now, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty comes along and says that Great Britain shall have the same rights in that canal as we have. So where would that provision in your bill go to?

MR. HEPBURN.—I am afraid it would be unfortunate for the provision of my bill.

MR. CLARK.—So am I.

MR. HEPBURN.—But I understand this, that if this House of Representatives, by an almost unanimous vote, declares that it ought to be the policy of the American people to own that canal, untrammelled by entangling alliances with any nation or nations, there is no official in the United States that will dare to say nay to that. [Loud applause.]

MR. CLARK.—I am not certain about that.

JOHN S. WILLIAMS [Miss.].—In other words, we can repeal the treaty beforehand.

MR. HEPBURN.—No one will want to say nay to that.

MR. CLARK.—Well, now, does not the very fact that they persist in urging that treaty in the Senate demonstrate that there is an official somewhere that does not care what the House of Representatives does?

MR. HEPBURN.—I do not know that there is a party anywhere persisting in that. I remember that some weeks ago the matter came up, that, in another body, a provision, I suppose like that which the gentleman is talking about, came up for action and

But there is another route upon which there have been vast expenditures and which I have been told strikes the minds of some of our people as more favorable to the interests of the United States than the route I have been describing. That is the Panama route. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that, in my judgment, that route can never be made feasible for our purposes.

We are told that $256,000,000 already has been spent or squandered in the construction of that route; and we are told that but two-fifths of it is completed, and that two-fifths is two-fifths of the linear extent, not two-fifths of the work, but of that in the alluvial lands on the sea level. The great work of cutting through the divide, that stupendous work involving a cut of two or three hundred feet in depth and 8 miles in extent, that other wonderful feat in the engineering world, the control of the Chagres River, a torrential stream draining hundreds of square miles of mountain surface, that rises sometimes 70 feet in twenty-four hours, and that other engineering feat of supplying the summit level of the Panama canal, these have never been touched. This Herculean task, involving millions that are to be expended in subduing nature and overcoming its forces, has not yet passed the stage of engineering speculation and debate.

But aside from that there is no assurance that we could ever control that canal. I challenge any of the friends of the enterprise to show how we could do it. Two hundred and fifty-six million dollars of its stock is scattered all over the face of France. It was a favorite investment twenty years ago. The poor were induced to yield up their hoardings and take stock certificates in exchange. They hold them to-day. They are the dream of future competency. This stock which they will hold on to is represented in the new company to-day in such a manner that they can not dispose of it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I am correct I do not see how it is possible that the Panama canal can ever subserve our purposes. I want, and I think the American people want, an American canal to be built and controlled by our own people absolutely and exclusively. [Prolonged applause.] We want a canal that will discriminate, if discrimination is to be made, in favor of our own people. [Renewed applause.] In other words, we want to control the enterprise ourselves absolutely and entirely. [Applause.]

MR. CHAIRMAN, for years past we have been spending $200,000,000 annually in payment to the owners of foreign ships to that the expression was of that character—so unanimous and vigorous against affirmative action that the gentleman who had it in charge was glad to withdraw it.

MR. CLARK.—Well, if they do not intend to press that treaty, why do they not withdraw it from the attention of the Senate and be through with it?

MR. HEPBURN.—You know that nobody can answer that. What particular reason there may be for withdrawing it or withholding the withdrawal nobody knows except those that have charge of the subject.

MR. WILLIAMS.—Does not the gentleman think the passage of this bill would go a very long way in persuading gentlemen in some other body to withdraw that treaty?

MR. HEPBURN.—I should certainly hope that that would be so. But, gentlemen, are we going to stop now because of the fear that something may lie in the future? That is what we have been doing for fifty years.

MR. CLARK.—I will make one suggestion, if you will permit, If you will put back that word "fortify" into this bill and pass it here almost unanimously, and then if the conferees of this House will stand up to it, we do not care about the treaty. The word "protect" is hazy, and the word "fortify" is a definite word.

MR. HEPBURN.—Why, it seems to me that the word "protect" has the broader meaning. It means authorizing to defend.

MR. CLARK.—It might not.

WILLIAM L. TERRY [Ark.].—I want to call the attention of the gentlemen to this fact, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty specially prohibited any fortification; but, after striking out the word "defend" and the word "fortifications," you then use the very word used in that treaty, and you are proposing to use that word now.

MR. HEPBURN.—Yes, the treaty did; and yet you will remember that within ten years of that time Great Britain, in violation of that treaty, made a treaty with Nicaragua in which she reserved and secured the power, at her pleasure, to move her forces into Nicaraguan territory for the purpose of protecting and defending the canal.

JONATHAN P. DOLLIVER [Ia.].—Do I understand the gentleman to claim that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty might be abrogated by an act of Congress proceeding with the work, or does it require diplomatic negotiations?

MR. HEPBURN.—I suppose the orderly way would be to abrogate it through the State Department; but I have no doubt about our ability and our right by legislative enactment to abrogate it, or by doing publicly and above board that which would be diametrically inconsistent with its provisions. I want to call attention to the fact that the condition of the commerce of the whole world, especially of this country, with reference to the Western coast, has so changed since that time that it would be inequitable and unjust to hold us to a treaty fifty years old, if there was no other reason than simply the fact that necessity demands its abrogation.

D. S. Alexander (New York) advocated that the Nicaragua route be definitely selected, and without delay. Speaking for the merchants and capitalists of his great commercial State, he said:

Mr. Chairman, in matters of trade and commerce delay for a nation is as disastrous as delay for an individual. If America is to be one of the great forces in the Pacific, it must construct the Nicaragua Canal exclusively and with American money. What we own we have a right to control. Great Britain controls Suez. Let the United States own Nicaragua and control it.

Theodore E. Burton (Ohio) pleaded for delay until the investigating commission of engineers should report upon the relative advantages of the two routes, Panama and Nicaragua.

Suppose private parties were committed to the construction of an interoceanic waterway, is it within the bounds of belief that they would first select one of two routes and go to the owners of the right of way and say to them: "Now, we are in your hands; impose upon us whatever terms you please?" The builder of a house or great building does not first locate his structure and afterwards secure the land upon which to place it. He first makes sure of his title to the land, obtaining the most favorable terms he can. I fully appreciate the impatience because of the delay in the beginning of this work, but we should proceed in a businesslike manner, taking first the necessary preliminary steps.

Mr. Burton then discussed the question of the neutrality of the canal.

element of absurdity about this. To maintain and fortify the canal would cause an expense which, in the original construction, would vastly increase the amount required. In its maintenance thereafter, if thoroughly provided for, it would require an army as large as the standing army of the United States.

On the Nicaraguan route there are 190 miles through a wild country, in which guerilla bands, by the loosening of overhanging rocks, or the explosion of a stick of dynamite in the wall of a lock or in a large dam, could destroy the use of the canal as a waterway for a year. In that unsettled country the danger of an obstruction or disorder is very considerable at best. We should diminish it by international arrangement rather than increase it. The whole theory of protection by fortifications will not bear examination. The danger would be from within and not at the two ends. To seek to protect it by frowning fortresses on either end would be like locating two stalwart policemen at the front and rear doors of a china shop and letting Texas steers loose on the inside.

In the use of the canal it is very doubtful whether we could rely upon it as a channel for our own war ships after a declaration of war, though a great advantage would belong to us in the proper location of the different ships of our navy before the war should begin. It is not at all probable that in a time of war any war ship of any country at war with us would attempt to use it. Does anyone believe for a minute that, with this canal under the control of American engineers, every lock and passageway controlled by Americans, the country settled, as it will be, by citizens of the United States, a war ship of a country engaged in a contest with us would turn its prow into the canal at either end and take the chances of getting through?

It would require more courage than has ever been displayed by any naval commander on land or sea. We may dismiss the idea of fortifications as a backward step in the world's progress, as a chimera in its practical results, as unnecessarily expensive, as unworthy of our position among nations.

On the subject of fortifications Admiral Dewey recently said:

Fortifications? Why, of course not. As I understand it, the canal is to be and should be a neutralized commercial pathway between the two great oceans. To fortify it would simply result in making it a battleground in case of war. Fortifications would be enormously expensive and ought not to be erected. Our fleets will be a sufficient guaranty of the neutrality and safety of the canal in time of war as well as in peace.

If there is one policy toward which the uniform course of the United States may be said to point it is that of neutrality in Shall it be a neutral canal? To this question I say, decidedly, yes.

There never was a better time than now to repress the rampant spirit of jingoism in this country by declaring for an absolutely neutral canal. It is a time for scrupulous regard for the observance of treaty relations. This country has become too large, its trade relations are too wide, and its future growth and prosperity depend too much upon friendly relations with other countries to allow any selfish or narrow policy. The growth of our commerce, particularly of our exports, in recent years has been a marvel to the commercial world. Our future largely depends upon the continuing increase of this commerce. Nothing will stimulate its increase more than the respect and friendliness of other nations.

Just recently the Administration has gained a notable triumph in obtaining assurances from other powers of an open door in China;¹ yet in that country several European powers have squadrons and armies, fortresses, and spheres of influence established for many years. Is it consistent for us to ask this privilege there and yet say to the world that we will close an isthmian canal to other powers and seek to enjoy exclusive interests in it? We all must confess to a certain sentiment in favor of preferential advantages in peace and in war; but the advantages of action in comity with other powers outweigh any sentimental considerations. Practical advantages for such a policy of exclusion do not exist.

MR. HEPBURN.—Did not this Government specifically refuse to participate in that series of treaties that secured the neutralization of the Suez canal, being the only nation that specifically did refuse to do that?

MR. BURTON.—The refusal was not at all because we were opposed to the principle of neutralization. It was because it involved an implication of participation in the affairs of the Eastern Hemisphere in which we did not wish to engage.

MR. HEPBURN.—And, further, that it would imply that European nations would have a right to insist upon the neutralization of our canal.

MR. BURTON.—The gentleman can search the diplomatic correspondence, I think, and find not the faintest leaning in that direction; that that was any part of the reason.

First, in regard to fortifications, it seems to me there is an waterways, natural or artificial. Our country was among the most active in protesting against the sound dues imposed by the Government of Denmark, although ships had to pass within cannon shot of the shore. We insisted upon the continued neutralization of the Straits of Magellan. We secured by treaty stipulations the equal use of the St. Lawrence River through Canadian territory. We grant and receive equal privileges in canals near to the Canadian border.

The triumphs of our navy under Decatur, Bainbridge, and others against the Barbary pirates in the Mediterranean Sea injured not alone to our benefit, but to the safety of the commerce of the whole civilized world. In pursuance of this policy the general tenor of our diplomatic negotiations and legislation has been toward a neutral canal across the Isthmus. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was sought by us rather than by Great Britain. It is to-day as valid and subsisting an engagement as any statute or treaty of the United States.

Three points are readily established from our history:

First. That our general policy has been in favor of a neutral canal across the Isthmus. This policy was absolutely without dissent for the first eighty-five years of our national existence.

Second. That the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was in pursuance of such policy.

Third. That the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is still in force.

As to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, while I regard it as a triumph of diplomacy, removing obstructions which lay in the way, that is a matter which is now in a coördinate body, and I do not care to comment upon it. What should we do now? Congress should wait for this commission to finish its work; wait until it knows whether the dam shall be located in one place or another; wait until it shall know the approximate expense; wait until the route shall have been determined; wait until options on all the concessions required are obtained; wait until the State Department has concluded provisional treaties with those different nations, so that we may not be at the mercy of any nation that may desire to extort from us what it will. Our course should be for peace. The true American fosters no quarrels; he harbors no ill will; he resorts to war only as a last expedient, and will not, on light occasion, disturb the world's peace.

He is proud of his citizenship here and everywhere, but he recognizes that the growth of his country is part of a great world development without which his country could not have attained its present greatness. It is not because we are weak;

it is because we are strong that we can afford to make concessions. Though I stood alone, I would ask that this enterprise point toward neutrality and comity with other nations. I hope for results from the healing streams of commerce. Let the stains of bloodshed which have blackened the passing years of the nineteenth century disappear in the twentieth; and, in the coming era, just as in industry and growth of population, and in the many varied ways which belong to liberty and citizenship, we have taken the lead, so let us also take the lead in turning our faces to the dawn of a better day, in which peace shall prevail. [Applause.]

John B. Corliss (Michigan) supported the bill.

The expansion of our commerce, the life of our ever-expanding nation, must not be checked or circumscribed by the restriction of the ancient Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

This ancient agreement was abrogated by Great Britain over forty years ago, and was expressly repudiated by that matchless American statesman, Hon. James G. Blaine, while Secretary of State.

The unfortunate attempt of the present Secretary of State, Hon. John Hay, to resurrect this treaty, tie the hands of our military and naval power, and surrender the right of Congress to prescribe the conditions and uses of the canal, in my judgment, an infringement of the constitutional rights of Congress to govern and control the property and possessions of the United States, and should be speedily repudiated or permitted to sleep the sleep of death in the sacred archives of the Senate.

The gentleman from Ohio desires us to wait with the hope of acquiring some interest or control of the Panama Canal. This project was created by private interests and fostered by the French people through the distribution and sale of about $250,000,000 of stock distributed throughout the French Republic in the hands of private owners, and it is stated by their representatives before the committee that their object in seeking aid from the United States was simply to secure the necessary money to complete the canal. They admit that it will cost upward of $100,000,000 to complete it, and the only possible way our Government could become interested therein would be to become a partner in this project, which has ruined, both morally and financially, every prominent man ever connected with it.

The American people demand that this canal shall be owned, controlled, and operated by the United States Government without any association with any other interest in the world, and, consequently, the Panama canal project is impossible.

between the two countries became threatening. Thereupon Great Britain yielded and carried out, as President Buchanan says, their agreement to make treaties with the Central American states, fixing boundaries and titles and clearing the way for the canal.

Mr. Hitt then recounted diplomatic incidents showing that Secretaries of State Seward, Fish, Evarts, Blaine, Bayard, and Olney all had acted upon the theory that the treaty was in force.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of last February in its first words recognizes the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as in force. This bill directly disregards and defies it. It has been avowed here by the advocates of this bill that it is so intended. As the last gentleman on the floor said: "We will not recognize a treaty that stands in the way of something the people want."

Mr. Chairman, treaties are not at an end because they become onerous or burdensome to one of the parties. That is a reason for asking to change the terms, but not for violating national faith. If a treaty, owing to a change of circumstances, threatens the existence of a state which is a party to it; if the continuance of the treaty will overthrow its institutions and destroy it, then that prime law of necessity, to which Abraham Lincoln appealed in the war of the rebellion, which overrides the Constitution, can be appealed to. It is above all treaties and laws and constitutions; it is based on the necessity of actual existence. But not for light cause can a nation set aside a treaty, except through the wantonness of brutal power, the cynical disregard of moral law, the open perjury of a people. For can the solemnly pledged faith of a whole nation be lighter than any obligation an individual may take?

I would like to see this bill made efficient and this great work go on, but I can not give a vote to enact a bill which openly defies the plighted faith of my country, and such a measure is unnecessary. It is "periling our salvation gratis." The country that we propose to slap in the face in this manner is not so hostile as some gentlemen pretend. Why, sir, it is one of the reproaches—this is a presidential year, and therefore all invectives are in order—it is one of the reproaches urged against the present Administration, which is held responsible for everything everywhere, that this very country, Great Britain, is friendly and well disposed toward the United States.

If the amendments or new treaty provisions agreed upon between the representatives of the United States and those of Robert R. Hitt (Illinois) defended the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The public faith of a nation pledged in a treaty has its sanction and basis in that system of morals which underlies our civilization and our institutions. A nation that will not tell the truth and keep its word does not deserve to be free. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty is old—60 years old—and that has been mentioned many times as if it were a reproach, as if the obligation to keep faith and tell the truth was temporary.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made at our solicitation; it was done in pursuance of a long-established and often-proclaimed policy. In it we provided for the free use of the canal by all nations, and also for the extension to Central America of our own historical policy, called the Monroe Doctrine.

Our statesmen soon after the treaty had been ratified made complaint to Great Britain that she had not complied with its requirements. Those complaints were pressed with great force again and again, and in that correspondence it is demonstrated, I think, that Great Britain had failed to carry out the requirements of the treaty. Nevertheless we refused to abrogate it and held Great Britain to it.

The treaty provides that neither nation, the United States nor Great Britain, shall erect or maintain any fortification commanding the canal, or occupy or fortify or colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America.

We claimed that she had disregarded that provision by holding these places I have mentioned. After long urgent discussion on our side, she at last yielded, as Mr. Buchanan, President of the United States, communicated to this House in a message.

MR. HEPBURN.—Does the gentleman think he is making a fair statement when he quotes President Buchanan?

MR. HITT.—Will the gentleman wait until I am done? I understand what you want to bring up of subsequent correspondence; I am familiar with its history.

I listened to the gentleman without interrupting when he uttered things so cynical concerning public faith that it defied the moral sense of mankind. [Laughter.]

During that controversy the British proposed to us to modify the treaty and we refused. They offered to arbitrate, and Secretary Cass refused it. They proposed to abrogate it and we refused. We refused to amend, we refused to arbitrate, we refused to abrogate, and we pressed so closely that the relations

Great Britain, changing this treaty, are not satisfactory to us, we have a constitutional way of reaching our purpose—amend the treaty in the Senate, or reject it there, and begin again. We are not in such bitter mood with Great Britain or so near war that we have to proceed at once to insolent defiance. Take the case of Russia humiliated in the Crimean war.

By the terms of the treaty of peace to which she had to submit when worsted by the allies, the Black Sea was closed to the Russian fleet, and the Bosphorus was closed to any fleet. After the Emperor of France fell at Sedan, on the 4th of September, 1870, Russia, seizing the occasion, sent a circular in October, 1870, to all the powers, saying that she desired the abrogation of that treaty; that the necessities of her growth as a country required that she should have fleets on the Black Sea side of the empire. No one in that country, which we consider barbarous, thought of such a proceeding as is proposed in the House of Representatives to-day—to utterly defy and violate a treaty which is in full force, which we have ourselves invoked five times and enforced upon Great Britain, which Great Britain has never denied or questioned, and which is to-day as vital and as binding upon the conscience of every American as is the last treaty with Spain. [Applause.]

Joseph G. Cannon (Illinois) spoke against the bill.

Eight hundred people under pay—150 civil engineers—have been at work for months under the law to get you all the information as to which is the best route; and here is full power, with an appropriation which is available, to make an agreement with the Panama Canal Company to make an agreement with Colombia for the other route, and to modify the Panama Canal franchise, and to make an agreement with Nicaragua and Costa Rica, and you play them one against the other. You have a threefold competition and can choose the best offer. Oh, do you not know that we are awfully afraid of trusts? Why, the Lord knows that no arrangement could be adopted that would beget a greater trust than this bill, so far as affecting the price of the site from Nicaragua and Costa Rica to the United States on which to construct this canal.

Now, men openly charge that people who are not friendly to the construction of an isthmian canal are promoting this bill. I do not know whether that is true or not. But it is true that honesty, if it is zealous without wisdom and without caution, is sometimes as bad as dishonesty mingled with wisdom. [Laughter.] I do say, and believe here and now, that, if this bill is enacted into law at this session of Congress, it will absolutely put weights upon us and hinder by years the construction of an isthmian canal, and will cost this Government at least $50,000,000 more than it would if we waited until this report comes in, and if we get the agreement from the three parties as to the terms upon which they will part with their property, and play one against the other.

James R. Mann (Illinois) supported the bill. He particularly opposed the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to deal in perfect good faith with Great Britain. In whatever we do we should act in a manly way. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was an absolute betrayal or misunderstanding of the best interests of our country. It yielded up the strongest protection for defence which any nation was ever granted by nature. But it is still legally in force. We have had our attention more particularly called to that treaty recently by the new treaty which has been negotiated. In the effort to escape the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the present Secretary of State has negotiated a new treaty, now pending in the Senate for disposition and known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not remove any of the objectionable features of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. No right which was yielded up by the former treaty is recovered by the new treaty. Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it was the expectation and intention that the company which was then in existence and which had acquired a concession from Nicaragua, would proceed with the construction of the canal with funds to be raised largely in England. One of the reasons given for entering into that treaty at the time was that in an enterprise of such great vastness it was necessary to have the financial support of England as well as of the United States in order to complete it, and, when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty provided that neither the one Government nor the other would ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal, it was intended merely to provide that neither Government should so obtain control over a canal as to fortify it or as to give preferential rates to the shipping interests of its own country over those of the other country.

Such provision was not put in that treaty for the purpose of preventing either Government from expending its own funds in the mere construction of the canal. Either country would have been glad to have had the other country furnish the money with which to build the canal, provided it could be assured that the operation of the canal should be on even terms to the maritime interests of both countries.

There is not a single provision of any kind in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in the interest of the United States in any way, shape, or manner. Not a single preference can be given to the vessels of the United States, either in time of peace or war.

The proposition of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty simply is this:

It is desirable to have a canal built, but private capital is no longer willing to enter upon such an adventuresome undertaking. No European government is willing to advance funds out of its own treasury for that purpose; but by the grace of its overflowing treasury and the consent of Great Britain, the United States may run all the risks of the adventure without any possible hope of special reward. In the benign goodness of her heart England will grant us the authority to expend from one to two hundred millions or more in an enterprise, not for our own special benefit, but for the benefit of humanity, civilization, and English shipping. We are kindly given the consent of Europe to break down the barrier of defence which protects our Pacific coast and our interests in the Pacific Ocean, and to bring our possessions there 10,000 miles nearer to the guns of the navies of Europe.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to pass any adverse criticism upon the distinguished gentleman who presides over our Department of State. He has proven his ability and his farsightedness on many occasions. His triumph of diplomacy in the open-door policy of China earns him the gratitude of America present and America future. I can very well understand that, bewildered by the clear paper title which Great Britain had to the continuance of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the embarrassments which were constantly arising over the propositions made in Congress that the United States should aid or undertake the construction of the isthmian canal, Mr. Hay finally entered into this treaty, giving our country as much consent as could be granted if the Clayton-Bulwer treaty were to remain in force, in order that public sentiment might be tested throughout the nation.

I cannot believe that either the Secretary of State or the great man at the head of the nation has ever in heart advocated the ratification of this treaty, which would forever put an end to the rightful claim of supremacy for the United States in the Americas. But public sentiment has been tested. Our people do not favor the treaty. They do not wish it ratified. Speaking only for myself, I feel at liberty to say that, if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty should, by ratification, become a binding law upon this country, I should oppose in every way possible every proposition to construct an isthmian canal under its provisions.

Mr. Chairman, I favor an American canal, owned, controlled, fortified, and defended by the United States. Nature has granted to our country certain natural advantages for our own defence, which we ought not to destroy or in any way relinquish. We possess two great ocean coast lines, separated and far removed from each other. At the present time our Atlantic and Gulf coasts are the most vulnerable points of attack by a foreign sea foe. We have, in the past, at enormous expense attempted, and are now at still greater expense endeavoring, so to protect the points of attack on these two coast lines by land fortifications as to render them comparatively safe from assault and capture by the naval forces of an enemy.

But we have not been willing to trust to the land defences constructed through these great expenditures. In addition, we have proceeded on the line of policy of building up a navy which shall be equal in defence to any navy of the world. This the united wisdom of the country, without regard to party lines, has considered it necessary to do in order to protect our present points of attack and to maintain our power on the seas, as the condition of our hemisphere now exists.

Nature has provided us with a barrier of defence for California, Oregon, Washington, and Alaska which all the wealth, power, and ingenuity of man could not have erected. The fortifications erected by us on land may succumb before the assaults of the enemy or of time and neglect. But the barrier of distance—impassable space—can never be overcome except by a change of conditions. We are now free from attack in that quarter, except from Great Britain, and she could not use her present fleets with advantage to attack us there. From the other powers we are not only free from attack, but we are also free from even menace in that quarter. Sir, out on the Pacific will be the future great development of civilization, of progress, of commerce, of art and culture, of humanity itself. No one can measure the probabilities, much less the possibilities, of that region.

Shall we now maintain its splendid isolation from foreign invasion or attack or shall we, in our hunger for present commerce, barter away our birthright of safety for a mess of pottage of trade? Shall we, in our eagerness for riches, kill the goose which would lay for us the golden eggs?

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that there are eminent minds in our country who insist that a purely neutral canal can be as easily defended as, and will be much safer than, a fortified canal. The distinguished admiral of the navy, flushed with the ease and completeness of his victory at Manila, has recently stated that the proper way to defend the Nicaragua canal is by a naval fleet. It is natural for him to magnify the importance and power of his branch of the service. Every department and branch of the public service does the same. But Admiral Dewey would not have won his victory and his laurels if the bay of Manila had been provided with proper land fortifications. Spain chose to rely upon her fleet for defence there, and we all know the rest. It is said that to fortify the canal would simply result in making it a battleground in time of war. Mr. Chairman, the experience of all history shows that, if this canal be built unfortified and unprotected, it will then become not only the battleground in case of war, but the constant bone of contention and desire both in war and peace. To impregably fortify it at each end is to remove it from the field of battle.

TWO THINGS HE HAS LEARNED

Our recent war demonstrated the fact that the navy can not accomplish much against land fortifications. Sampson before San Juan, and Sampson and Schley combined before Santiago, should be sufficient proof that guns on land, properly protected, cannot be captured by guns on the sea.

And not only will land fortifications much better assure the protection of the canal, but that protection will be thus furnished at vastly less expense. Sufficient land fortifications can be erected at a small proportion of the cost of constructing and equipping a sufficient fleet.

The expense of care and maintenance will also be far less. If we propose to construct a canal as United States property, and then be prepared to guard and defend it with our navy only, we must contemplate the intention of providing a sufficient fleet at each end of the canal to withstand the assault, unprotected by guns on land, of any foreign fleet which may gather there. Such fleets could not be constructed, in the first instance, at a cost of less than $80,000,000, and could not be maintained at less than an annual cost of probably $5,000,000, in addition to the interest on the original cost. I protest, sir, against adding this heavy burden to the real and necessary cost of the Nicaragua canal.

Mr. Chairman, when the battleship Oregon was pursuing her historic trip from San Francisco to Santiago it seemed to be the common thought and expression of our country that if the isthmian canal had been in operation at that time the Oregon might have pursued her way through it unmolested to join our fleet hovering around Cuba or watching our own coast. Let us imagine, however, for the sake of a proper consideration of the subject, that an isthmian canal had been in operation at that time; that it was unfortified, absolutely neutral; that ships of war might pass into it, through it, out of it, unmolested and unattacked while so doing; and that because of the great marine interests of the other commercial nations of the world, which would thereby be so affected and injured, we would not have been willing to take possession of or close up the canal. What would have been the result?

If, under such circumstances, we had endeavored or attempt to be obtained by friendly methods, and upon terms which will insure to your commercial interests equal treatment with our own through the canal; but that, in any event, we do not intend to be forever bound by those provisions of the treaty which would prevent our building and operating the canal as a national enterprise, and from fortifying and protecting our own. This would be no act of moral turpitude on our part. Experience, justice, propriety, and civilization would all justify us.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty is worse for us than the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The latter at least contemplated that the people of both nations should join in furnishing funds for the enterprise. The former contemplates that our country shall foot all the bills without receiving a single particle of additional benefit thereby, and without even being permitted to secure protection to the money which we invest. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty ought to have no friends and supporters in this country. It flies in the face of the line of policy adopted by our country for years. It is an absolute surrender, in principle, of the Monroe Doctrine and "America for Americans." The passage of this bill will be the finishing strokes on its coffin.

Oscar W. Underwood (Alabama) supported the bill.

It is contended that, should we construct the Nicaragua canal under the present bill, it would be in violation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that no action should be taken until the Senate of the United States disposes of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty now pending in that body. I do not propose to discuss here the treaty rights in which we may be involved in constructing an isthmian canal, but I contend that it is a proposition on which the House of Representatives has no power to act.

Under the Constitution of the United States the power to make treaties with foreign countries is vested in the President and Senate of the United States. No matter what we write in this bill, except the mere appropriation of the money to construct the canal, all other limitations can be overthrown by a treaty made by the President and Senate of the United States.

Therefore, if we intend to construct the canal, if we believe that it will build up our commerce and develop our country and bring prosperity to our people, there is but one provision in the bill in which we are concerned, and that is the appropriation of the money for its construction, and there is no reason why we should delay making this appropriation on account of other tempted to interfere in any way with the free use of the canal by the vessels flying neutral flags, we would have been immediately interfered with ourselves and would have thereby enlisted on the Spanish side of the combat other nations of Europe, which only needed a reasonable excuse to take some part in the fray.

In my opinion, the lesson to be learned from the Spanish War and the naval operations therein is that it would be dangerous and unsafe for us to construct, or permit to be constructed, any isthmian canal through which a foreign foe could in time of war send its battleships.

I am not willing, sir, to lend my voice or vote in favor of our Government constructing, or permitting to be constructed, any canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific waters which shall be so neutralized as to permit a foreign foe at war with us to pass her battleships from ocean to ocean. I would as soon agree not to attack the war vessels of a foreign foe while passing up the Mississippi or the Hudson. It would be, in my opinion, absolute folly for us to permit a canal to be constructed upon such terms of neutrality. I think it would be criminal idiocy. It would be not only to invite foreign attack, but to expose ourselves to easy attack. The idea is abhorrent to my mind. Unless I am blinded, its future effects would be most disastrous if not fatal to us.

For us to permit the construction by others of such a neutral canal would be an act of monumental folly almost unequaled in the experience of the world. But for us to undertake the construction of an entirely neutral canal ourselves, with our own money, located in a distant country, with no means of defence or protection except a navy, and thereby double the exposure of our entire coast to attack from a foreign foe, would be an act of foolish folly beyond proper characterization.

Mr. Chairman, Great Britain possesses the mightiest navy in the world. All other navies seem like infants or dwarfs beside hers. But has anyone heard that Great Britain proposed to dismantle her fortifications at Gibraltar and hereafter rely upon her navy entirely for her control of the entrance to the Mediterranean? Has anybody heard that England proposed to make the St. Lawrence River and Welland Canal neutral to our battle ships in time of war with us?

I would now say to Great Britain: In view of the change of conditions and the increase to us of the value of the canal, we respectfully ask you to release us from the obligations of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, assuring you that we desire this stipulations contained in this bill. If we are not willing to trust the President and the Senate to look after the American interests in making these treaties, we should not pass this bill; but, if we wish to pass a bill, we of necessity must leave the foreign questions involved in the construction of the canal to the President and Senate of the United States.

I believe that the time for action has come, and that those who are earnestly and truly in favor of the construction of the canal will vote for the passage of this bill.

P. D. McCulloch (Arkansas) moved to amend the bill by inserting the words "fortify and garrison."

John Sharp Williams (Mississippi) supported the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if we can not insert the words contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, I do not think that the omission of them would make quite as much difference as he seems to think. I feel certain of the fact that seventy-five or eighty million people are not going to spend one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty million dollars for that great work and then tamely submit to its being taken away from them in case of war. I also feel certain of the fact that, whatever may be contained in any treaty now existing or hereafter to be entered into, a state of war would abrogate the treaty as between the belligerents, and that then the United States could and would, as against the other belligerent, assert its right of sovereignty, of control, of ownership of that canal, while, at the same time, allowing to neutral powers the passage of their vessels even during the time of war.

I feel not the slightest degree of hesitancy in trusting the American people to protect this canal, even under the language of this bill. I feel that even if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were to be confirmed—and I am almost certain in my own mind that it never will be—the power given in that treaty to "police" the line of that canal could be taken advantage of for the purpose of garrisoning it in the first place, and in the second place leaving it unfortified perhaps in time of peace, but the moment the tocsin of war was sounded I am certain we would proceed with a garrison then and there to throw up earthworks and fortifications necessary to protect the interests of our people and their money invested in the canal.

Mr. Chairman, when I think of this long route by Cape Horn; when I think of the Southern cotton lying upon the banks of the Mississippi on both sides; when I dwell upon the fact that the construction of this canal will virtually empty the Mississippi River into the Pacific Ocean, giving it a new mouth; when I think of the fact that the construction of this canal will realize the dream of Christopher Columbus and enable people to sail directly west from Europe to reach "far Cathay" and the "rich East where Prester John once ruled," it seems to me that all little matters in connection with the mere verbiage of the bill sink into absolute insignificance. [Applause.]

I shall vote for the amendment, and I hope it will not be defeated, because I think we ought to be plain about expressing beforehand what our undoubted intent is, and then if the amendment shall be defeated, I shall then vote for the bill, firmly believing that the mere fact of enabling the cotton goods of the South to reach Japan and China, Manchuria and Korea, with the obliteration of 10,000 miles of ocean transportation, will amount to something like a cent a pound of additional net receipts to every Southern planter upon every pound of cotton which he sells to those markets. I shall vote for the bill, because I believe it will carry Tennessee iron and coal entirely by waterway to a market where coal sells now for $14 a ton, coal that we can get out of the mines at a cost of a dollar and a quarter a ton. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will prevail. [Applause.]

The amendment was rejected by a vote of 66 yeas to 114 nays.

Benjamin F. Marsh (Illinois) wished to annex Nicaragua and Costa Rica.

It is rather humiliating to an American citizen that our Government should engage in the construction of this wonderful enterprise, involving an expenditure of one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty million dollars, as a tenant upon foreign soil. I would rather construct this canal as a landlord than as a tenant. [Applause.] In other words, I wish it were in the power of this Congress and this Administration to-day to annex to this country both Costa Rica and Nicaragua and make them a part of this glorious Union of ours.

And, Mr. Chairman, when those countries become a part of the United States, who will be afraid of them? Who is afraid of contamination of the blood of the people of Costa Rica and Nicaragua? There are 80,000,000 of people here and a few hundred thousand down there. The infusion of their blood into our veins and of our blood into their veins will Americanize them in two generations. [Laughter and applause.]

Jonathan P. Dolliver (Iowa) supported the bill.

I shall vote for this bill in obedience of what I believe to be the unanimous judgment of the American people. Yet I would not vote for it if it were not for the possibility, and I may say the certainty, that the bill in the course of legislation will lose some of the features which are objectionable. I do not like that feature of it which first locates the canal and then begins a negotiation with the States of Central America that are interested in the property to be taken and condemned. That feature of it I think ought to be guarded, and, I believe, will be before the legislation is finished. I do not believe either that the United States ought to set itself in a brutal way to ignore existing treaties.

I have read a good many of the treaties which we have with foreign countries, and about the only one of them I am able to thoroughly understand from the language of it is the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850. I have read the opinions of statesmen and diplomatists about that treaty, and my judgment fully concurs with the judgment spoken here yesterday by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. Hitt], that that treaty is in force and that no policy ought finally to be put into the form of law in this country which is not accompanied by a negotiation for the modification of that treaty. [Applause.] I believe also that this canal ought not to express merely the military prowess of the American people. I cherish the hope and the conviction that the world's civilization has advanced beyond that. I would have this canal express the aspiration of our people for a larger commerce and for a permanent peace among the civilized nations of the world. I take no interest in and give no consent to that argument, which is based upon a narrow view of patriotic duty, which claims that we should own this canal and operate it mainly as an instrument of war. As such an instrument it is not worthy of this age nor this nation. It is worthy of us only as it expresses the national aspiration for peace and for enlarged commerce which will reflect the progress and spirit of our age and of our civilization. [Applause.]

The bill was passed by a vote of 151 to 104.

The Senate referred the bill to the special committee on Interoceanic Canals, the chairman of which, John T. Morgan (Alabama), reported it without amendment on May 14. Its consideration was deferred until the next session.

The Senate ratified the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty on December 20, 1900, but with three amendments, providing (1) that neutralization should not prevent the United States taking such measures as it might find necessary for its own defence and the maintenance of public order; (2) that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty be explicitly abrogated, and (3) that no guaranties be asked of non-constructing powers.

Great Britain refused to ratify the treaty as amended, and it expired by limitation on March 5, 1901. A new convention was signed by Secretary Hay and Ambassador Pauncefote on November 18, 1901. It met with little opposition in the Senate, and was ratified by that body on December 16. Great Britain ratified it on January 20, 1902, and it was proclaimed in force on February 22.

THE FINAL HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY

Article I declared the present treaty superseded the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty.

Article II was Article I of the former Hay-Pauncefote Treaty [see page 358] unchanged.

Article III declared that the United States (not "the high contracting parties") adopted the rules of neutralization of the Suez Canal (repeated from the former treaty), with the following changes:

Sec. 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Sec. 2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

Sections 3 to 6 of the former treaty remained unchanged. Section 7, prohibiting fortification of the Canal, was omitted.

Article IV was added:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

CHAPTER IX

THE BATTLE OF THE CANAL ROUTES

William P. Hepburn [Ia.] Introduces Bill in House to Construct Isthmian Canal.—Debate: Mr. Hepburn, John F. Shafroth [Col.], Charles N. Fowler [N. J.], Allan L. McDermott [N. J.], Page Morris [Minn.], Robert Adams, Jr. [Pa.]; Bill Is Passed.—Debate in Senate on Panama or Nicaragua Route: In Favor of Panama, Marcus A. Hanna [O.], John C. Spooner [Wis.], Charles W. Fairbanks [Ind.]; in Favor of Nicaragua, John T. Morgan [A's.], John H. Mitchell [Ore.]; Panama Selected.

THE commission to investigate the rival canal routes reported in 1901. It declared both routes practicable, each possessing favorable features. Thereupon the French Panama company took heart and let it be known that they were ready to sell out to the United States Government or an American corporation.

On December 6, 1901, while the ratification of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was pending, but assured, William P. Hepburn (Iowa) introduced in the House a bill to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. It was referred to the Committee of Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Mr. Hepburn reported it, with amendments from the committee, on December 19, three days after ratification of the treaty. It came up for discussion on January 7, 1902.

THE ISTHMIAN CANAL

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 7, 1902

MR. HEPBURN.—The purpose of your committee—the leading thought, next to securing the execution of this great work—has been to concentrate authority and responsibility. Therefore the bill has invested the President with all the authority necessary to accomplish all that is preliminary and then to accomplish the enterprise. With us the object is commercial, industrial, political, and the benefits to be secured can be enumerated under all those heads. In the case of the Suez Canal the only motive in its operation and maintenance is the commercial idea. Those who control it want to make the most they can out of the tolls. They want their 19 per cent. per annum upon the fabulous cost of that sea-level ditch, built without masonry or concrete—dug out with a shovel—a work which a Chicago man will duplicate to-day for $5,000,000. Mr. Bates of Chicago, with one of those wonderful dredges of his, that removes to a distance of 1,000 yards 6,000 cubic yards of sand in every hour, would dig the whole canal in seven months, and do it for $5,000,000. And yet the engineers who constructed the Suez Canal expended $97,000,000 in its construction.

384

I believe that this House is to-day intent upon building the Nicaragua Canal. I ask that we now begin it. Gentlemen, has there not been talk enough in the years and centuries that have gone? Is it not time to do something? There are some interests in the United States which it is said will be harmed by the rivalry of this canal, and there are many gentlemen of honest purpose who think that either the time is not ripe, or that an enterprise of this kind should not be undertaken. There are men who are terrified by the specter of scandal, by the possibility of wrongdoing—men who feel that returns in money will not be ample. But I insist upon it that the American people have made their decree that the canal is to be built, and that now is the time to build it, and now is the time to commence it. [Applause.]

JOHN F. SHAFROTH [Col.].—What is your construction upon this bill and upon the late treaty that has been ratified as to the power of the United States to fortify the canal?

MR. HEPBURN.—I have not any doubt about the right of the United States to defend that canal and to do it in the way that seems wise to the United States. I know there are a great many gentlemen, skilled in the art of defence, who say that the proper place to defend this canal is upon the sea; who say that the works will be so expensive and difficult as to preclude their practicability; but I remember that we are spending millions of dollars every year in defending localities along our coast. The argument that can be made against the use of fortifications for the defence of this canal can be made against the use of fortifications at New York, at Philadelphia, at every point along the coast. If the navy is to be relied upon to defend the canal, why not rely upon the navy to defend New York and Philadelphia this great work. At the same time, somewhat relentlessly, perhaps, we have thrust upon that officer the entire responsibility of this work in its execution. There is no divided authority under the terms of this bill. There is no commission. There is no place made in this bill for the retirement of partially defunct statesmen. [Laughter.]

MR. CHAIRMAN, I believe that this is wise policy. The first section of the bill authorizes the President of the United States to secure the control over that strip of territory lying in the State of Nicaragua on which he will be enabled to construct, protect, and operate this canal. The word "control" has been used, because in this connection I know of none of broader signification. Control includes sovereignty, jurisdiction, all efforts in the exercise of power. And so the word has been selected and used. I am told by those who are in a position to speak and to know that that word will be satisfactory to that government with which we shall have to deal.

I think there is no question that this enterprise will be of value to us. I have hoped that this canal could be used as a subsidy in promoting the rehabilitation of American shipping. I sometimes despair as to whether we shall be able, with the preconceived notions of many of our associates, to secure that aid in the form in which other nations give it, to upbuilding the merchant marine of the United States. There is something in the word "subsidy," coming down from the days of Thomas Jefferson, that excites the fear and disturbs the heart pulses of some of our brethren. I had hoped that by calling this by some other name they would be able to take much more kindly to the project, and that by the use of this great waterway free of all charge to the American citizen who in an American shipyard built a ship from American material, manipulated by American workmen, sailed by American sailors, loaded with American products, he could have the use of this canal free of all charge. [Applause.]

If that might be done, what an impulse that would give in the direction that you so much desire. The Liverpool merchant to-day trading with Hongkong, using a 6,000-ton ship, using the Suez Canal, pays $24,000 of toll for the round voyage. What an infinite advantage would his American rival have, sailing his vessel from New York or New Orleans or Mobile, using this canal free of all tolls, as he goes upon his journey in competition with the English merchants.

The nation building this waterway removes all probability of cupidity on the part of a corporation that might control and New Orleans? But I do not take a great deal of stock in that kind of talk. I want to see the canal fortified whenever it is in peril.

CHARLES N. FOWLER [N. J.].—The gentleman stated in his remarks that it was possible that we could allow American ships to pass through the canal without charge. Is that his view in the light of the treaty?

MR. HEPBURN.—I said I had hoped that that would be the condition. I have no doubt but that the United States can use that canal in a manner advantageous to its own people above the advantage that it would be to other people, but I have not so carefully studied that treaty as the gentleman has done, perhaps. At all events, government ships will go through free, and at all events, there is that trend on the part of other nations toward yielding to the desires of the United States that makes me hopeful that if there was a barrier of that kind now we would brush it out of the way pretty soon. [Applause.]

ALLAN L. McDERMOTT [N. J.].—It is rumored that the Panama Canal can be purchased for the sum of $40,000,000. If that be true, we would have a fiscal aspect in favor of the Panama Canal. Now, as the commission have given the price as a reason, in the concluding paragraph of the report, why they declare the Nicaraguan as the most feasible route, I desire the gentleman to answer the question, whether, in his opinion, if the fiscal proposition had been equal, and if we could obtain the Panama Canal as at present constructed, the commission would have reported in favor of that canal?

MR. HEPBURN.—I can not say what the commission might have done under other circumstances, but I believe that I can say that every gentleman who absorbs that report will come to the conclusion to favor that canal which is 400 miles nearer this country, that brings New Orleans 560 miles nearer to San Francisco than this other, that brings New York 375 miles nearer to San Francisco than this other—that that would be the better one for us to construct. [Loud applause.] I believe so supremely in the superiority of the route that is nearest to us that I want to labor, if I can, to carry out the views of the committee that I represent [applause]; and I look upon any attempt to entangle us in any way with the Panama Canal as simply another effort in the direction of delay. [Applause.]

PAGE MORRIS [Minn.].—Would there be any objection to so amending this bill as to give to the President of the United States the alternative power to construct the canal along the line of the Panama route, provided the rights of the Panama Canal Company, free and clear of all incumbrance, could be obtained for $40,000,000, and provided further that we could get equally favorable concessions from the Government of the United States of Colombia—I believe that is the proper title—

MR. HEPBURN.—I think it is—to-day. [Laughter.]

MR. MORRIS (continuing).—As from Nicaragua and Costa Rica?

MR. HEPBURN.—To my mind there would be objection. I am in favor of our determining this matter. It has been under consideration for a long time. I believe that the Nicaragua Canal route is the better one; and yet here is a foreign corporation with a stake, they say of $109,000,000, our commission say of $40,000,000. They are playing for that stake. They have everything to gain and nothing to lose. If they gain the half of it they are $20,000,000 ahead.

MR. MORRIS.—You stated that it would take two years to get the harbors constructed and the railroad constructed before the work upon the Nicaragua Canal could be done.

MR. HEPBURN.—Yes, sir.

MR. MORRIS.—Now the harbors are already there on the other route. In view of this fact would there be any delay in allowing the President to institute negotiations and see whether these things can be accomplished or not, and letting him have power enough to select either route?

MR. HEPBURN.—I want to ask the gentleman a question. Would it not be better for us to go on and start this matter?

MR. MORRIS.—Decidedly.

MR. HEPBURN.—And if a proposition comes, tangible in its character, valuable in its essence, then during these two years there is ample time for that corrective legislation that the gentleman thinks ought to be initiated. [Loud applause.]

MR. MORRIS.—Possibly so; but in the meantime we could be making progress.

MR. HEPBURN.—In the meantime we are making progress now. We can not make any progress until a bill passes. And I confess that I do not want to have this great enterprise tarnished, tainted, by any connection with the discredited scheme of the Panama Canal. I do not want that kind of a heritage.

MR. MORRIS offered an amendment to the bill, the President to choose between Panama and Nicaragua.

Robert Adams, Jr. (Pennsylvania), supported the amendment.

buy from us because we have not sought their trade through proper channels or with proper energy.

The chairman of the committee held out an alluring bait that almost caught me in my earnestness for the building up of our merchant marine. He held out the vague hope that American ships might be allowed to pass through this canal without cost.

Why, Mr. Chairman, that would bring up a first principle of international law—that no government can levy a tax on the commerce of the high seas, and this canal with its neutrality preserved will occupy the same position as the high seas in relation to the commerce of other countries. And if perchance in our patriotism and our home policy we should undertake to maintain that for the rest of the world, the Panama Canal would be completed in the shortest possible time, for the combined wealth and ingenuity of Europe would be sent there and united together for its completion. They would be obliged to do it in self-defence.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will close with one suggestion. This country found itself bound by the Bulwer-Clayton treaty. Why? Because it had been drawn as a compact between two nations, with all the honor of them at stake for its preservation. I may say that there was an unwritten compact with this republic when it gave its tacit permission to the citizens of France to construct that canal across the Isthmus of Panama. They did go ahead with the expenditure with the result that they lost all their money, and yet we have no responsibility for their foolish conduct.

But in the present condition, we having seen their hopeless condition, having seen their recklessness in their management, their agents having returned to France and submitted the question to the stockholders, and they now come forward in that straight, business-like way which we American people understand, and are ready to negotiate; they offer to sell their canal, at what price? No haggling this time; no uncertainty as to the valuation. They have allowed the agents of this House to appraise their property and to submit their proposition. Now, I ask if in all fairness we should not give these people a hearing? I believe as strongly and as enthusiastically as the chairman of the committee himself that a canal must be built, and of necessity; but I do say, what is to be gained by the little time, the few weeks of difference it would make in giving a hearing to these people, and to authorize the President, or, if you choose, the commission, to give them the alternative of these two routes?

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me curious that such different conclusions should be reached by those who read the report of this commission. Some are impressed with the idea that the whole report is to be read and interpreted on the condition that we can not buy the Panama Canal. I am one of those who take that view, for bearing that proposition in mind, I think any man who will read that report carefully will come to the conclusion that the commission advocate the Panama route.

First, it is shorter by many miles; second, it takes less time in transit; third, there are harbors already constructed at either end; fourth, it has a fewer number of locks through which ships must pass, and, fifth, and to my mind the most important of all, it can be maintained at an annual cost of $1,300,000 less than the Nicaragua Canal can be maintained. I have as yet heard no one capitalize that cost and add it to the expense of construction of the canal.

Of course, none of us is responsible for the bad management and the fearful losses of the Panama Canal Company. With that we have nothing to do except to extend our sympathy to the unfortunate investors. The considerations which to my mind should control us here should be the benefit to the commerce of the world and the cost to the taxpayers of our country, and of these things, and of other facts which I will try to present to you, I shall have something to say.

The difference in the time of transit, according to the report of this commission, is the difference between twelve hours by the Panama route and thirty-three hours by the Nicaragua route. We are told that the Nicaragua Canal is a day nearer to San Francisco. My friends, if it takes a day longer, or twenty-two hours longer, to go through the Nicaragua Canal, where is the saving? The time will be exactly the same, within two hours. We are told that it is so much nearer San Francisco and the Orient as if that was the only trade that is to pass through the canal. Let me tell you that there is a trade in South America which our country has entirely neglected, which is simply waiting for American enterprise, waiting for our commerce to come, and we must not lose sight of the fact that the Panama Canal is twenty-four hours nearer to all that vast field for American exploitation. That country is not inhabited by Chinamen whose prejudices we must break down, whose wants we must cultivate in order to build up our commerce, but it is inhabited to-day by civilized people who have civilized wants already, who are buying from other countries, and who do not

I think it would be the part of sober action and of good judgment by this House.

MR. HEPBURN.—If it is true that the very setting of a day to consider this proposition by the House of Representatives induced this company to reduce their demands for the canal from $109,000,000 to $40,000,000, does not the gentleman think it would be wise for us to take another step and pass this bill with the possibility that they would take off another ten million? [Laughter and applause.]

MR. ADAMS.—I do not think so. I do not see very well, if we wish to treat our sister republic and its people with any show of fairness, why we should expect anything of the kind. I think that the amount that they have proposed is a fair price on what is left of this unfortunate enterprise, and I do not think the great American people, who have just given such evidence of their fairness and forced the rest of the world to treat China equitably, would be willing to occupy any such position; and I will say to the gentleman that it is the people of our sister republic who have made this loss, it is her people who helped to found this republic, it is her people that have been our allies throughout the existence of our country; and I will quote President Roosevelt in his message to this Congress, when he said the foreign policy was to be the Monroe Doctrine and the Golden Rule. I say if we wish to occupy that position toward our sister republic and the inhabitants of France, we of the United States must not press those unfortunate investors to the wall, for it is the widow and the orphan that are meeting the loss.

It was not the introduction of this bill that forced the French company to their present position. They knew this bill was coming. It had already passed the House of Representatives at the last Congress. They knew the sentiment of this House, and they knew it was going to prevail. The trouble was that their agents were in a most awkward position. They were sent out by the company, and if they asked too much they knew they would not get it, and if they asked too little they knew what would happen at home. What they anticipated has happened at home, and now under the new conditions their representatives are coming out to submit their proposition. I am informed by a gentleman on my left that they never asked one hundred and ninety millions; that they never asked anything, and so far as my own information goes they refused to make a definite proposition.

This is now purely a business proposition, and I think this House should go a little slow. A delay of a very few weeks would not be much when we are told that there is a difference of four years in the completion of the Panama Canal as against that of the Nicaragua route.

Mr. Morris's amendment and others of the same tenor were defeated, and the original bill was passed on January 9 by a vote of 308 to 2.

The Senate referred the bill to the Committee on Inter-oceanic Canals, which reported it without amendment on March 13. It came up for discussion on April 17.

THE ISTHMIAN CANAL

SENATE, APRIL 17-JUNE 19, 1902

John T. Morgan (Alabama), chairman of the committee, supported the bill. On its limitation to the Nicaragua route, he said:

This is a canal that we have demonstrated to be practicable, feasible, permanent, safe, useful, and necessary to the people and Government of the United States.

It is a canal route that, if we do not adopt it, will pass into other hands and will be constructed, beyond our power to prevent it, unless by the employment of force and the disgrace of our country. It will be a canal which, in the control of any other power, can be used against us as a heavy handicap on our coastwise trade, or as a sword thrust between our coast line and the right arm of our naval power engaged in protecting the Panama Canal, 500 miles distant.

There ought to be reasons that are imperative to cause us to surrender such a canal for a possible saving of $5,630,704, but there are none that are either imperative or valuable, or that are inviting or well founded. On the contrary, there are facts, stubborn and inevitable, that block the way to the acquisition and use of the Panama Canal and railroad by the United States, not one of which can be removed by the expenditure of $5,630,704.

The feasibility, practicability, usefulness, permanence, and commercial value of the Panama Canal to the United States are all clouded with many doubts, any one of which detracts more than that sum from its value, if there was no other possible route with which it could be compared.

Some of the gravest of these doubts, as to engineering results, are admitted to be beyond the limit of all engineering experience.

The Culebra cut is a question of doubt, with its landslides, and creeping clays, and its indurated clay, that melts in water.

Whether the Chagres River will repeat the floods of 1879 and remove, as it did then, the girders of the great steel bridge on the piers at Baracoa and flood the railroad track and the great swamps to the depth of 10 or 15 feet, and whether in such an event it can be shut out from the canal are matters of doubt. Whether any dam can stand such torrential floods and escape the fate of Johnston and Austin are questions that only the Chagres River will settle in the course of time.

A safe harbor at Colon and the safe passage of ships through a submerged channel three and one-half miles long at Panama when the wind rises and the tide is at the ebb are matters of doubt. They are matters in which doubts are apt to be resolved by destruction, as they have often been resolved at Colon. The abandoned anchors in the bay of Colon, left there by vessels that could not wait long enough to get them aboard when northerly winds drove heavy seas into the shallow bay, are mute witnesses to the reasons for such doubts.

The health of the Panama route can not be safely classed with the matters of doubt. It is a fixed condition that is in constant warfare with human life. It depends upon natural conditions that are beyond remedy, and as a fatal impediment to a successful gateway for the world it is beyond doubt.

The constant presence of yellow fever and Chagres fever is not alone due to the filthy condition of the cities of Panama and Colon or to the unclean habits of the people, nor is it due to mosquitoes. These are aggravations of fatal fevers that make them epidemic, but the seat, the habitat, the permanent home of yellow fever and dengue, or "Chagres fever," is in the city of Panama and the adjacent coasts.

From that center they spread through a fostering atmosphere and are transmitted by the constant and close association of a large number of people at work in a narrow space of country along the railroad and the canal diggings or traveling through it. Spreading from the principal breeding ground at Panama, these fevers permeate the atmosphere of the canal belt and spread through the hot depression leading to Colon, poisoning the people along the entire route, and from these seaports they move out on the ships and attack all other ports. The yellow fever at Panama is hostis humani generis, and all the world can not conquer it.

The reasons are obvious. They are, certainly, three in number: First. The tide of 20 feet that rushes into the bay twice in twenty-four hours, bearing the refuse of the sea and decaying animal matter and leaving it to rot on the hot beach when it recedes. Second. The exposure of thousands of acres of mud flats to the sun when the tide goes out, to give off their pernicious exhalations. Third. The absence of winds to scatter or take the poisonous exhalations away from the beach and the Bay of Panama.

When these natural causes are removed, Panama can be made comparatively as immune from yellow fever as Habana and Santiago de Cuba appear to be. But they are immovable.

Connected with the health conditions at Panama, in such a way that it is inseparable, is the question of police jurisdiction and control of the bays of Colon and Panama, and of these cities. A joint control of these places is indispensable to sanitation and the preservation of the peace.

A mixed or joint control is incongruous, irritating, and dangerous. In fact, it is utterly inadmissible.

Personal liberty, in its most personal and individual sense, is always involved in the execution of health regulations, and such occasions require the exertion of the most direct and arbitrary authority, backed by force in frequent instances.

Panama has always been averse to the union with Colombia, preferring independence or a union with the other isthmian states. They have no patriotic sentiment and no identity of business relations to support the union with the continental States of Colombia. Constant jealousy has, on four occasions, broken out into open wars of insurrection since 1846.

There have been and are still internecine wars, and are all political in character. Holding Panama in the leash bound to Colombia, as we have been compelled to do and are now doing, we incur the natural resentment of those people, nearly all of whose possessions of any real value are at the canal terminals or near to its line.

If we acquire control of those people, along with the bays, the cities, the railroad, and the canal, we will encounter the serious difficulty of using and operating them among an unfriendly people.

These political, sanitary, police and social conditions are quite the reverse on the Nicaragua route. There we have no natural causes of epidemic diseases to remove, and yellow fever has never been a visitor to the region in which the canal is located. It is a salubrious country, constantly fanned by the trade winds, with a temperature that varies only 30 degrees, between 56° and 96° Fahrenheit, with a lake system, 45 miles across and 140 miles long, in the center of the land, over which these winds move without obstruction.

The island of Ometepe, in Lake Nicaragua, has been selected by the common judgment of travelers as a sanitarium for seamen who will pass it on their long and weary voyages. The beautiful country is a place of refreshment for all voyagers, abounding in excellent fruits and supplies of fresh foods. The lake can be conveniently utilized for the repairs of vessels, even to the cleansing of the bottoms from the accumulation of sea grasses and barnacles that lower their speed while they are en voyage passing through its fresh waters.

But a much greater advantage as to sanitation and police is the fact that this fertile country is practically unoccupied, and, under our control, the future occupants will be subject to our selection. Bad characters can not congregate in the canal belt or in the ports, if we object. In Panama this vital question is one of expulsion. In Nicaragua it is a question of our permission. The difference is wide enough and sufficiently important to make it fundamental in the choice of a canal route.

There is no economic question connected with the future management of the canal of more importance than that of peopling the canal belt and the terminal cities with proper occupants.

On June 4 the minority of the committee presented a substitute bill authorizing the choice of the Panama route.

In their report the minority inveighed against the Nicaragua route as lying through a country liable to visitation of earthquakes.

Senator Morgan spoke against this report.

The part of the report of the minority that treats of volcanoes and earthquakes is so somber and threatening in its statements as to the awful danger of such disturbances, that I was dismayed when I first read it, and I wondered how the minority could so heroically declare that "First there must be a canal across the American isthmus." On further examination I saw that the minority have found a "hole in the sky" through which they have discovered that earthquakes and volcanoes can not ever disturb Panama and that all we have to do to get a canal is to pay the Panama Canal Company $40,000,000 for the privilege of constructing a canal at that heaven-favored location, and abandon the discussion as to the choice of routes.

If I were a prophet, as some Senators are assuming to be, I would prefer to be a prophet of good, instead of a prophet of evil, and to foretell that Mount Pelée and the Soufrière would expend their forces and cease to do evil; and I would point to the fact that they have not disturbed the isthmus at Colon, which is nearer to them than they are to Greytown, through any sympathy with their agitation, and that the recent great and disastrous earthquake in Guatemala has not made a ripple on the surface of Lake Nicaragua.

If the earthquake argument is the only way to defeat the Nicaragua route, I am very sorry that it will necessarily carry the Panama route down with it.

Senator Morgan renewed his objections to the Panama route because of the political complications likely to ensue.

If Colombia should oppress Panama, would we protect her against the revolt of the people of Panama on account of such wrongs? If we did so protect Colombia against such a revolt we would be interfering in her internal affairs, and if we did not compel the submission of Panama, without reference to her wrongs or sufferings, we would violate our treaty obligations to Colombia. It is a dangerous situation, in which Colombia can compel us to aid her in the oppression of her own people, and it is this that the proposed convention pledges us to do.

There is little doubt that Colombia would get rid of this thorn that has rankled in her bosom for sixty years and is now fighting her with gallant and determined energy if we would pay her the $40,000,000 we are asked to vote to the Panama Canal Company for a canal that it is not able to complete, and that France will not aid it to complete. With a claim of title that is strong enough only to excite discussion among the lawyers and to promote speculation among stock gamblers, and with a reputation that the Isthmian Canal Commission has stamped as criminal, in its final report to the President, we would purchase troubles and evils that we can neither foresee nor provide against if we purchase the Panama Canal.

without advice acquired from the finest experts in the world. For what did we need an Isthmian Canal Commission if not to advise us upon all these questions of technique of which we are not supposed to be masters?

Some of them are loyally serving their country as officers in the army and navy; all were bound by their oaths, when they appeared before the committee, to tell the truth, without fear and without favor; and we have their unanimous report in favor of accepting the proposition of the Panama Canal Company.

Volcanoes and earthquakes seem to be a burning question just now while Mount Pelée is discharging its fire, and they have led to a more careful consideration of that matter. I might go back to the great speech made by Senator Davis of Minnesota, upon the very bill which was mentioned here yesterday as being the crowning effort of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and quote from him what is here verified by the map to-day as to the number of active volcanoes within the immediate range of the proposed route of the Nicaragua Canal.

If we have waited as long as we can or ought to wait, let us show wisdom enough in discussing and deciding this question to provide for any contingency which may occur in the future.

Let us adopt a route where as the commission say it may be possible—aye, it is possible, being only a question of dollars and cents—that a sea-level canal can be built.

The Panama Canal was commenced and intended to be a sea-level canal, and it would have been a sea-level canal had the project been carried out. I am told by engineers that there is nothing in the way, even after the Panama Canal shall be completed with locks, during and while it is in operation even, to make it a sea-level canal by paralleling certain parts of it.

You will find when this subject opens up that not only the questions of distance and of curvature and of locks enter into it, but that, in regard to the Nicaragua route, the trade winds blow every day in the year from 16 to 20 knots across the Nicaragua route. At the low speed at which a vessel will be compelled to operate in passing through a narrow canal, those winds would make it an absolute physical impossibility to keep her off the banks without the aid of tugs. The more I have studied this question from the standpoint of the vessel, the more I have been convinced that we never have gone far enough in dealing with the successful operation of the canal, even when we had but the one route to consider.

If we must encounter these adverse and disreputable conditions in order to get a canal, let us clear the field of all doubt and all reproach by the annexation of Panama, for it will come to that at last.

On June 5 Marcus A. Hanna (Ohio) supported the minority bill.

Mr. President, we have dwelt upon the question of the Nicaragua Canal as a sentiment until we have grown to believe that there was no other route possible or available. But other people have not thought so. Is it not fair to suppose that De Lesseps considered every question which we are liable to discuss to-day before he invested the money of his people and risked his reputation as to the success of it?

I want to confess that, in common with all my fellow-citizens, I shared in their feeling and belief; and, as the necessity seemed to grow and demand an isthmian canal, I would have been prepared, under the influences which then existed, to give my hearty support to that project, but it seems as if the fates were guiding us in the right direction, when, for some reason or other, we were deterred from building that canal which would have been obsolete to-day, and we were deterred from embarking in a project that, in the light of subsequent events, it seems to me would have been a mistake.

Mr. President, without going into detail, I want to call attention to a few reasons for which we are supposed to construct the canal.

First, we want the best route. What is the best route? The shortest route under like conditions. The Panama Canal route is 49 miles long, as against the 183 miles of the Nicaragua route.

There are physical conditions connected with the operation of the canal which are just as important as its length. Although you might have an ideal canal in all the physical conditions for which a canal is to be built, there might be other conditions which would render its operation almost impossible.

You build your canal for what? For the passage of vessels from ocean to ocean in the shortest possible time, at the lowest possible risk, and also on the most economical lines. That means success.

I do not believe there is a member of this body, designing to vote unselfishly and correctly, who would undertake to say what we shall do upon his own responsibility and information

PHOTOGRAPH BY CLERK CO. N.Y.

W. A. Hanna

The annual cost of operating the Nicaragua Canal is $1,350,000, or, say, $1,300,000, in excess of the Panama route. That is the interest on $65,000,000. The extra expense of $1,300,000 would, of itself, to any individual or private corporation proposing to invest their money in an enterprise like this, decide; and why should not the United States Government conduct its business upon business principles?

While we may not be constructing the canal for the purpose, in the first instance, of making money, if we have an opportunity to have a canal, and one that will not be a burden to the Government, is it not better to choose that route when we have the choice?

Another feature connected with the expenses of the canal is that along the line of the Nicaragua route it is a very doubtful question whether either the Government of Nicaragua or of Costa Rica is the bona fide owner of all the land and whether it could, if it would, pass the control of it to this Government without damages to other parties.

It is a matter of record and of history that the Maritime Canal Company was started a number of years ago under the auspices of one Menocal, who was quoted here yesterday as an authority. They spent some three or four or five million dollars, and purchased rights from Lake Nicaragua to the Pacific, which they claim to own to-day. They obtained concessions from Nicaragua and Costa Rica, which concessions they claim to-day have not been forfeited, and the record of the Interior Department shows that the United States Government has defended them as their right.

Those matters are to be settled with.

I for one am not disturbed with reference to the unsettled condition on the isthmus, which it has been stated is a chronic condition in Colombia, and you might add that there are others in Central and South America. If this canal will do anything, in addition to accommodating commerce, it will be a peacemaker, because being owned and controlled and defended by the United States it will be a power for peace wherever it is built.

When our authority is placed anywhere along that isthmus I have no fear of interference with the canal or with any citizen of the United States who may have charge of the management or conduct of the canal.

John H. Mitchell (Oregon) opposed the Panama route. In his speech he referred to the Maritime Committee as "Hanna's Commission."

BATTLE OF THE CANAL ROUTES. 401

obtain a satisfactory title that then the way is open to construct the Nicaragua Canal. But let me tell you, Mr. President, the place and time to determine whether it is wise to have anything or nothing to do with this Panama venture is here and now.

On June 11 Charles W. Fairbanks (Indiana) explained and supported an amendment which had been offered by John C. Spooner (Wisconsin).

Senators have raised the question as to our ability to secure an unembarrassed title to the property of the new canal company. I do not believe their contention is well founded, but if I am in error in that view, and if those who believe with me are likewise mistaken, the Spooner amendment safeguards our interests.

The first section provides that the President may acquire on behalf of the United States the property of the new Panama Canal Company at a cost not exceeding $40,000,000.

Section 2 provides that the President may acquire from the Republic of Colombia control of property and rights adequate for the construction and maintenance of the canal and appropriate a sum sufficient to effect this purpose.

Section 3 provides that when the President shall have obtained a satisfactory title to the property of the new Panama Canal Company and has secured the necessary property from the Republic of Colombia, he is authorized to pay the sum necessary to secure the canal property and the requisite concessions from Colombia. Not until the question of title, both from the canal company and from the Republic of Colombia, has been carefully determined does the United States part with a solitary dollar from the treasury. After satisfactory title has been acquired the Secretary of War is directed to proceed with the work of constructing the canal.

It is further provided by section 4 that if the President shall be unable to secure a satisfactory title to the property of the canal company, and the control of proper concessions from the Republic of Colombia, then he is directed to go forward and secure concessions along the Nicaragua route, and in the same manner construct a canal upon that route.

I differ with the honorable Senator from Kansas [William A. Harris], that this amendment is intended to defeat the construction of an isthmian canal. It is intended in a frank, straightforward, and intelligent way to secure a canal. The

To this insinuation Senator Hanna indignantly replied on June 6.

"Hanna's Commission," indeed! Why, Mr. President, in discussing this proposition, important as it is to the country, I seek to discuss it upon a higher level than that; and, if the appeal I make to this body does not carry with it the conviction that the route for which I stand is the best for the United States, then I should not personally desire to have it adopted. I said yesterday that there was no politics in this proposition, no sentiment in it, no sectionalism in it, and certainly there is no personality in it.

I have heard it urged that we ought not to consider the commercial side of this question. Mr. President, the commercial side of this question is the one side which interests all the people, East and West, North and South.

Where will you look for inspiration upon any great public question if you eliminate the necessities of the people by sneeringly calling them "commerce" or "commercial value"?

Mr. President, there is nothing inconsistent from a national and patriotic standpoint with the ambition and the aims connected with this enterprise, if we at the same time consider on parallel lines the material benefits which it is going to bring to the whole people. If we had the canal built to-day, after passing through all these discussions, and if we found that we had made a mistake in our selection, we would feel that something personal or sectional or otherwise had influenced our decision as against the advice and the judgment and the information furnished us by the highest possible authorities in the United States or elsewhere.

On June 7 Senator Mitchell further opposed the Panama route, chiefly because its selection would involve the United States in the French "Panama Scandal." This scandal he related in full, and then remarked:

In view of all these complications, in view of the fact that both the old canal company and the new canal company are still in the French courts, would any wise man in his senses risk the venture of investing $40,000,000 in a property whose title is so clouded in so many different respects? Our friends on the other side may answer, and do answer, by saying that if the Spooner amendment is adopted and the President can not amendment is broad and liberal in its scope and purpose. It is founded upon the undivided judgment of a commission of eminent scientists and experts, patriotic citizens of the Republic.

I believe that after we have spent a million dollars and waited two and a half years for their report it would be utterly inexcusable if we should set their report aside as not worth the paper upon which it is written. That report is here. It means something. It is, sir, in my judgment, the only rational and safe predicate for the action of Congress upon this important subject.

On June 12 Senator Morgan opposed the Spooner amendment. He claimed that the new Panama company had nothing to sell; that they had forfeited the property to Colombia, who, after 1904, would have the right to take it over.

They commit an act of bankruptcy in falling from $109,000,000 to $40,000,000 in a proposition to sell that property. There is not a bankrupt court in the United States, nor in France, nor in the world that would sustain a sale made by an acknowledged bankrupt or by one who becomes a bankrupt and files his petition for a discharge when he claimed to hold a property worth $109,000,000 and had sold it for $40,000,000.

And yet upon technicalities our learned friends in the minority of this committee insist that that is a valid transaction and binding, not only upon Colombia, but upon the clean conscience of this great and noble Republic. I repudiate it. I deny the impeachment against my country, that it is capable of entering into as questionable a contract as that.

It is void, and not only void, but it is fraudulent, and the Colombian people represented by the Liberal Government repudiate it and give us notice that they intend in future to repudiate it. Are we still to persist in paying $40,000,000 to the Panama Canal Company for a contract that is thus assailed and proved to be not merely void, but fraudulent, for that is what these men charge?

The people will make points upon Senators on either side of this chamber who undertake to deal with a corporation that is denounced by the liberal party, now in arms and fighting around Panama, as being absolutely and unquestionably violative of the Constitution of Colombia of 1886.

SENATOR SPOONER.—If they win and in season do not ratify a treaty, this bill provides for the Nicaraguan Canal!

SENATOR MORGAN.—Yes, Mr. President; but if you cannot get a title, then when you turn to Costa Rica and Nicaragua they will say, "Excuse us, you would have no dealings with us. You refused to accept the protocol of McKinley. When you found out you could not get a contract with Colombia you wish to stand upon it now. We agreed to make terms with you and you would not do it."

On June 19 the Spooner amendment was passed by a vote of 42 to 34. Senator Morgan offered a substitute for the bill that authorized the selection of the Nicaragua route. It was rejected by a vote of 41 to 33. The bill was then passed by a vote of 67 to 6.

The House disagreeing to the Senate bill, a conference was appointed, which reported on June 25, advising that the House accept the Senate bill. This the House did on June 26 by a vote of 260 to 8. President Roosevelt approved the bill on June 30, 1902.

CHAPTER X

THE PANAMA REVOLUTION

[THE COLOMBIA AND PANAMA CANAL TREATIES]

The Hay-Herran Treaty [Colombia] Debate in the Senate on Its Ratification: in Favor, Shelby M. Cullom [Ill.]; Opposed, John T. Morgan [Ala.]; Treaty Is Ratified—The Hay-Varilla Treaty [Panama]—President Roosevelt's Message on the Treaty—Debates in the Senate on the President's Recognition of Panama: in Approval, Joseph B. Foraker [O.]; in Disapproval, George F. Hoar [Mass.], John T. Morgan [Ala.], Edmund W. Pettus [Ala.]; the President's Justification of His Action.

THE State Department, after finding upon investigation that the French company had a valid title, entered into negotiations with it and with Colombia to secure the canal.

On January 22, 1903, a treaty was signed with Colombia (Hay-Herran Treaty) securing to the United States the right to build the Panama Canal.

For consideration of this and other treaties which had not been given in the regular session the President summoned the Senate in special session on March 5, 1903.

CANAL TREATY WITH COLOMBIA

SENATE, MARCH 9-17, 1903

On March 9 John T. Morgan (Alabama) opposed ratification of the treaty.

In the first one hundred years of the lease, under this treaty, we are to pay Colombia $25,000,000 for the rent of the right of way for the canal and the railroad. In the same period we would have to pay Nicaragua $2,500,000 and Costa Rica $1,000,000, or $3,500,000—a difference in favor of the Nicaragua route of $21,500,000 for the use of the right of way for one hundred years.

404

We are required to pay Colombia and the canal company $50,000,000 spot cash for the property and the concessions. The interest on this sum, at 3 per cent. for one hundred years, is $150,000,000; total, $200,000,000.

We will pay Costa Rica and Nicaragua $7,000,000 spot cash, the interest on which at 3 per cent. for one hundred years is $21,090,000; total, $28,090,000.

The difference in favor of the Nicaragua route on account of right of way for one hundred years is $171,910,000, or about enough to build the canal if it was owned by private persons.

These figures can neither be disproved nor explained away, and they justify all that we can do to save the country from this bondage to Colombia and the fraud-infected and fever-cursed Panama Canal.

When the Spooner amendment was adopted a state of facts had been settled between the United States and Colombia that made this blackmail apparently impossible, and it is impossible if that law is obeyed and enforced.

I know of no personal or official obligation that is higher than honest and respectful obedience to the law. This is especially to be required at the hands of the President, both for the benefit of a high example and because of his official duty to see that the laws are enforced.

It is a duty to Congress also that Colombia should not be invited by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to assist in repealing the canal law of June 28, 1902, by a treaty with Colombia. That power was not given him for that purpose.

This treaty violates the spirit and the letter of every provision of that law which relates to the protection and defence of the canal, or of our people engaged in its construction and operation, and of our ships and commerce passing through the canal. Therefore the money appropriated in the act can not be paid out by the President for these new and different purposes.

Having stated some of the reasons why I can not support this treaty, and having prepared a substitute for it, by way of amendment, which accepts the Panama route and attempts to secure the rights that every American demands for his country, to which I respectfully ask for criticism or amendment, I will now proceed to state some objections to the manner in which this treaty is brought before the Senate and to the refusal of the President to reply to the request of the Senate for information touching the advice and consent he requests of the Senate, and which the Constitution requires this peculiar and powerful tribunal to give the President on such occasions.

I am well aware that some Presidents have regarded such advice and consent as intrusions upon some fancied prerogatives they have supposed that they possessed in virtue of the office. I have read our constitutional history amiss if there is a shred of the prerogatives of the English kings left to taint our constitutional system with the virus of this baneful pretension, and I hope our President is immune from that illusory imagination.

Whatever the President may have the right to withhold from the Houses of Congress, on grounds of public policy, he can not withhold from the Senate, when it is considering a treaty submitted by him, such information as he may possess, and especially such as is in the custody of the heads of departments and is found in the archives of the Government, when information is called for by a resolution of the Senate, without committing a distinct and grave breach of the privileges of the Senate.

In this case a question of serious importance that affects the honor of our dealings with the hostile factions in Colombia as well as the correct policy of the Government has been raised by two undisputed facts, namely, that the price of the concession provided for in the treaty before the Senate is greater by $3,000,000 than the sum which Colombia agreed to accept, in diplomatic notes exchanged between our Secretary of State and the minister of Colombia on the 18th, 21st, and 23d of April, 1902; and that at the capitulation of the insurgents in Panama the promise was made by the Colombian Government to pay them $3,000,000 of the money to be paid, as provided by this treaty, as the reward for their pacification.

I can not conceive of a treaty as being of undisputed validity which is made on behalf of a people who are in the distress and agitation of civil discord and which concedes vastly important rights to the United States, covering the perpetual control of a canal zone that cuts a department into two parts, when only a dictator holds the reins of power and one of its organic departments—the congress—is not in existence.

Much less can I believe that an acquisition of such territorial rights in Colombia will be accepted or endured by the present or the future generations of Colombia, and especially by the gallant and intrepid natives of Colombia who belong to the great Liberal party of Spanish America.

I insist that the treaty needs amendment, and Senators, including the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, admit that some of the amendments offered in the committee would improve the treaty and make it more acceptable to our people.

I have heard Senators announce that we must have this treaty, without amendment, no matter what its defects may be, because Colombia will reject it if any amendment is made to it.

If we lose this bargain, are there not others greatly to be preferred that await our acceptance? Do we suppose that the American people do not see the deception that we so cordially embrace? Being in no strait of necessity, we can not refuse to do what is right and dutiful as Senators, unless the Senate means to surrender its independence of thought and action to the arbitrary demand of the President.

I can not follow those who would sink the glorious prestige of the United States to the humiliation of a galley slave of Colombia. The desire of the President for what he may conceive to be a brilliant coup d'état, executed in company with Marroquin, the military dictator of Colombia, and the new Panama Canal Company, if he entertains that questionable ambition, suggests to me the need of a more patient conservatism among Senators as his constitutional advisers.

Turning to the treaty itself and the act of Congress that gave the President limited powers to treat with Colombia for canal concessions, and also to the convention agreed upon between Mr. Hay and Mr. Concha in April, 1902, I find all the light that is needed to reveal its deformities, its unworthy spirit, and its deep humiliation to the United States.

This treaty violates the letter and spirit of the act of June 28, 1902, in this:

(1) That it surrenders to Colombia 1,295,480 acres of land that is purchased under its provisions from the Panama Canal Company, at a cost of $3,624,033, as I have above shown.

(2) That it pledges the United States, as guarantor, of $1,000,000 to be paid to Colombia for canal stock, while we disclaim any liability on that account.

(3) That it yields to Colombia the concessionary right which we purchase from the Panama Canal Company of the exclusive right to construct in Colombia canals or railroads to connect the oceans.

its Pacific entrance, even to resist the fortress at Panama, which the act of Congress includes in the canal zone, or to protect the canal and the railroad against foreign assault, or from being raided by hostile parties in Colombia.

(13) That this treaty deprives the United States of all right to land military forces in the canal zone, except in cases of unforeseen and extreme danger to the canal, or to protect the canal against any foe unless Colombia is unwilling or unable to give such protection with her own forces, and it requires that our forces shall be instantly withdrawn from the canal zone when the forces of Colombia appear on the ground to take charge of the interruption.

On March 16 Shelby M. Cullom (Illinois) supported the treaty.

Mr. President: The consideration of the treaty with Colombia for the construction of a ship canal is about closed.

There can be no complaint from any source that a full and ample opportunity has not been given to each and every Senator to express his views at any length he desired on this important treaty. Numerous amendments have been proposed, freely discussed, and after full and fair consideration all of the amendments proposed have been disagreed to, and the question now is, shall the Senate, under its constitutional powers, advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty with Colombia for the construction of a ship canal?

In this last hour of the debate I deem it my duty to submit again, and have recorded, a brief statement giving my views as to the provisions of the treaty that have been most criticised in the Senate.

Since this treaty has been before the Senate we have heard a great deal about the character of the people of Colombia, and especially of the State of Panama. We have been told about the government of that country, and its President, and the conduct of affairs there generally. We have heard of the religion of the people of that country—of the church party and the antichurch party. It is not my purpose to in any way reflect on the Government of Colombia, its officers, or people. Whatever may be said of the religion of the people of Colombia and their internal affairs, I respectfully submit that that is a subject with which we have no particular concern.

It is not incumbent upon the Government of the United States to inquire into the election of executive officers in a republic with which we are attempting to negotiate a treaty. All

(4) That it pledges the United States to the perpetual obligation of the treaty of 1846-1848 with New Granada.

(5) That it prohibits the acquisition of territory by the United States in any part of Central or South America for all time to come, while it leaves Colombia under the civil or temporal supremacy of the Holy See of Rome by our silent acquiescence in the concordat of 1888 and its direct application to our citizens in Colombia and in the canal zone, whereby the foundation principle of the Monroe Doctrine is abandoned under our treaty obligations that our people should be subject to all the laws of Colombia while residing in that country or in the canal belt.

(6) That we are made to guarantee the autonomy and independence of every state in Central and South America.

(7) That we agree to pay Colombia $10,000,000 cash for the rental of the canal belt, for which she bound herself to accept $7,000,000 in April, 1902, by a diplomatic covenant, on which Congress acted in giving the preferential selection to the Panama route over the Nicaragua route, thereby ratifying and applauding an act of blackmail by a public treaty.

(8) That the treaty, in connection with the fifth article of the concession of 1878 to N. B. Wyse, prohibits us from sending our ships of war through the canal built with our money, without the express consent of Colombia, given by special treaty or by her act of congress, when we are at war with any other people or government.

(9) That, contrary to the act of June 28, 1902, the United States can only exercise police powers in the canal zone, in conjunction with Colombia, for the protection of the canal or our property there, or the property of the people of other nations there, or in preserving the peace or the health of that zone.

(10) That the cities of Panama and Colon are excluded from the canal zone, as the four islands in the Bay of Panama which belong to the canal company are excluded, when the act of June 28, 1902, included them in that zone.

(11) That Colombia reserves the right, in the canal zone fixed by said act, which extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans, to establish ports, under her exclusive jurisdiction, between the ports that the United States is allowed to open inland and the open ocean, thereby enabling Colombia to completely control those outside ports in ways that would, under this treaty, lawfully obstruct their free and convenient use as canal ports.

(12) That this treaty excludes the idea that the United States can erect fortifications at or near Colon, or on the four islands in the Bay of Panama that command the canal zone and that we desire is that there be a government, whether de facto or de jure, in such country, which government is apparently dealing with us in good faith in the making of a treaty.

Neither is it any concern of ours what Colombia intends to do with the $10,000,000 which we will pay her if this treaty is ratified. That is a matter in which we have no interest.

It is true that in the draft of an agreement which was submitted to Congress during the last session it appeared that Colombia was at that time willing to accept $7,000,000. But the simple fact is when the present treaty under authority of act of Congress was being negotiated Colombia declined absolutely to take $7,000,000 and insisted upon ten millions. If her former agreement to take $7,000,000 was at all binding, which I doubt, we were simply compelled to pay $10,000,000 or get no treaty.

All that can be said in reference to this is that Colombia insisted, as she had a perfect right to do, on being paid $10,000,000, and nothing remained for us to do except to pay her that amount of money or drop the negotiations.

Now, Mr. President, much has been said on the question whether the treaty before us is such a compliance with the Spooner Act as will authorize the President to pay the $40,000,000 to the Panama Canal Company and the $10,000,000 to Colombia, which we appropriated during the last Congress.

In my judgment, if this treaty is ratified the President will be advised by the Attorney-General that there has been a sufficient compliance with the Spooner Act.

Section 1 of the Spooner Act provides that the President is authorized to acquire, at a cost not exceeding $40,000,000, the rights, privileges, franchises, concessions, grants of land, right of way, unfinished work, etc., and other property, real, personal, and mixed, of every name and nature, owned by the new Panama Canal Company, including 68,863 shares of the Panama Railroad Company.

The President has complied with this section of the act by accepting the offer of the Panama Canal Company to sell its property to the United States at $40,000,000.

The second section provides in substance that the President is authorized to acquire from Colombia upon such terms as he may deem reasonable perpetual control of a strip of land, not less than six miles in width, extending from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, and the right to excavate, construct, operate and protect thereon a canal, including the right to perpetually operate and maintain the Panama Railroad Company, and also jurisdiction over said strip and the ports at the ends thereof, to make such police and sanitary regulations as shall be necessary to preserve order and health, and establish tribunals, etc.

The President has complied substantially with this section.

The first question in reference to this is, is the control for the term of one hundred years, renewable at our sole and absolute option for periods of similar duration so long as we may desire, "perpetual control"? I maintain that to all intents and purposes it is perpetual control. The treaty gives us control of the zone forever at our option. The word "perpetual," as used in this treaty, has no particular technical meaning in law. The word is given its ordinary meaning, which is: "Never ceasing; continuing forever in future time; destined to be eternal; continuing without interruption."

We obtain by this treaty a never-ceasing control of the canal zone; it will continue forever, by its very terms, if we so desire it; it is destined to be eternal, and it will continue without interruption. The intent of the Spooner Act in this respect is substantially complied with. All that was contemplated by that act was that we should have an irrevocable control, so far as Colombia is concerned, over the canal zone. We obtain such control by the treaty.

The next question is, Does the treaty give us a six-mile zone from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, as provided in the act?

I maintain that that provision has also been substantially complied with. We obtain by this treaty considerably more than a six-mile zone all along the route of the canal, excepting at two points—Panama and Colon. At Panama, for a very short distance, the zone is one and one-half miles wide on one side and a little over three miles on the other. At Colon it is less than three miles on one side and a little over three miles on the other. There has been such a substantial compliance with the act in respect to the zone that the exception of Panama and Colon is not important. In addition to this it must be remembered that we obtain more than a six-mile zone along all auxiliary canals. So, as a matter of fact, we obtain a wider zone and a greater zone (excepting at the two points I have mentioned) than the act provided. There is no fatal variance in this regard between the act and the treaty. The Spooner Act provides that the strip of territory shall extend from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean. The very terms of the treaty comply with the act in this respect.

We obtain the perpetual control of the railroad, as provided under consideration expressly says that such rights of Colombia to the said shares exist only as a stockholder, and that no obligation under this provision is imposed upon or assumed by the United States.

Reference has been made to the treaties of 1846-1848 between the United States and Colombia and to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Both of those treaties, as is well known, refer to neutrality.

The treaty of 1846, which the present treaty provides shall remain in full force as to the cities of Panama and Colon and elsewhere in Colombia, was a treaty of friendship entered into between the United States and Colombia in 1846. This treaty was entered into in contemplation of the construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. The present treaty provides that we shall continue to guarantee the neutrality of the isthmus, in conformity with the provisions of article 35 of the treaty of 1846.

By article 35 of that treaty we agreed to do two things in particular. We guaranteed the neutrality of the isthmus, and we guaranteed the rights of sovereignty and property which Colombia has and possesses over said territory. The treaty of 1846 is still in force between the United States and Colombia. We are still bound by it, and there is no objection to our continuing to be bound by it under the present treaty.

As to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, Article XVI of the treaty under consideration provides for the opening of the canal upon the terms provided for by section 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and in conformity with all the stipulations of that treaty.

The provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are very familiar to Senators. It abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; it provided for the neutrality of the canal, and it contained certain rules governing such neutrality.

There is no objection that I can see in incorporating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in the treaty before the Senate. That treaty is already a binding obligation upon us. We intend to observe it. We want a neutral canal. We want a canal that will be to the interest of the world to use and protect. The United States does not desire a canal for its own exclusive use.

In the discussion of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was well settled to the satisfaction of most Senators that there was nothing in that treaty which prevented our fortifying the canal if we so desired. There is not a word in this treaty that will prevent our fortifying and protecting this canal if an emergency arises which makes it necessary for us to do so.

in the act. We obtain jurisdiction over the strip, and substantially over the ports at the end thereof, to make police and sanitary regulations, as provided in the act. The treaty provides for the judicial tribunals, as stipulated in the act.

Section 3 of the act provides that when the President shall have done the things required of him in sections 1 and 2—namely, acquired the property of the new Panama Canal Company and obtained a satisfactory treaty with Colombia—he is authorized to pay for the property by warrants drawn by himself.

Now, Mr. President, as I have stated, there has been a substantial compliance with the Spooner Act. It is a primary rule of construction that in cases of this kind one treaty or one law must be construed with another, so that the whole may stand, if possible. Repeals by implication are not favored by the courts. The Supreme Court, before it will declare that a law repeals another law or a treaty repeals a law, will require that the later provision is certainly and clearly in hostility to the former, and if the two statutes or the treaty and statute can be construed so that they both can stand they will be so construed.

In connection with this particular branch of the subject I desire to take a very few minutes in talking about the public lands.

As I view this subject, we have obtained all and more than all the lands which we can possibly need. Most of the lands situated in the six-mile zone are now owned by the canal and railroad companies; and these lands we of course acquire under our contract with the canal company. The mere right of the canal and railroad companies to earn the said lands situated outside of the zone reverts to Colombia. The President had a perfect right to make this agreement providing that the rights to the public lands outside of the zone shall revert to Colombia.

It has been claimed that we assume obligations in reference to the shares of the Panama Canal Company which Colombia holds and which the treaty provides shall be paid their full nominal value at least.

By Article IV of the extension of 1890 of the Wyse concession of 1878 the Panama Canal Company agreed to issue to Colombia, gratis, 5,000,000 francs in 10,000 dividend-bearing shares of the new company.

These are the shares referred to in the treaty under consideration. The United States assumes no obligation or liability whatever in reference to these shares, as Article I of the treaty

Now, Mr. President, I desire to say a word about our guaranty of sovereignty of the Republic of Colombia.

Our guaranty is no greater than the guaranty which we gave her in the treaty of 1846. We are still bound by that treaty, and the reference to sovereignty of Colombia in this treaty is only a restatement of what we are already bound to acknowledge by a treaty made half a century ago.

As to the statement in reference to our intention not to increase our territory at the expense of any of the sister republics of Central or South America, but to strengthen them, and to promote and develop their prosperity and independence.

That statement is a mere recital, a mere reiteration, of a policy which is as old as the Government of the United States itself. It was to promote that policy that President Monroe promulgated the famous Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. President, the article about which there is more difference of opinion, as to the propriety of its remaining in the treaty, is the twenty-third article.

By that article Colombia agrees to provide the armed forces necessary for the protection of the canal, but if Colombia can not effectively do so, then, with her consent, the United States shall employ such forces as may be necessary.

If it were not for the clause which follows, the provision I have read would be objectionable. But the twenty-third article continues:

Under exceptional circumstances, however, on account of unforeseen or imminent danger to said canal, railways, or to the lives and property of the persons employed upon the canal, railways, etc., the Government of the United States is authorized to act in the interest of their protection without the necessity of obtaining the consent of Colombia beforehand.

This provision removes the objection from the so-called joint protectorate. The United States will determine what are exceptional circumstances and unforeseen or imminent danger. Those terms are susceptible of a very broad construction. I think I am safe in saying that, if it ever becomes necessary to fortify or protect the canal by armed forces, it will be a case of unforeseen or imminent danger, or an exceptional circumstance.

In addition to this, other articles in the treaty give us ample powers to protect the canal.

In addition to all this, there is no probability at all that Colombia desires to, or ever will, or ever will be able to protect the canal by armed forces. She is not able to do so if she desired, and the United States, of course, will have to and will protect the canal by armed forces whenever it is necessary, and we will do it without any violation of the twenty-third article of the treaty with Colombia.

Another suggestion in this connection: It must be remembered that the canal will be a neutral one. That was the purpose of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; that was the purpose of the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and the neutrality feature was retained in the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Now, Mr. President, a word as to Colombia's concessions under this treaty. Her concessions are not unimportant. She gives us the six-mile zone. She gives us the right to perpetually maintain and operate and protect thereon a canal. By the twenty-second article of the treaty she renounces all her rights under the concessionary contract she has with Wyse, with the Panama Canal Company, and with the railroad company.

For these important concessions we pay Colombia in cash $10,000,000, and at the end of nine years we commence paying her an annuity of $250,000, which is not changed during the life of the present treaty, and this treaty is a perpetual one.

Mr. President, one word in conclusion. The suggestion has been made here that it is humiliating for this great country to be compelled to yield in any degree to Colombia in the terms of this treaty. It has been suggested that Colombia is a small country, scarcely worthy of consideration. Whatever may be the facts in relation to the strength of Colombia or to its weakness, this Government is too great, too honorable to take advantage of the weakness of sister republics in any international dealings we may have with them. Colombia is an independent sovereign country. It should be treated with the same consideration as the greatest nation in the world. It has been the well-settled policy of the United States to deal with the great and small nations alike. The United States never has and never will demand more of a small, weak country than it would demand of the strongest under the same circumstances.

I desire in these last words to most unqualifiedly condemn any suggestions that the United States should take advantage of any country, great or small, in our dealings with them, either upon the question of a canal or any other question.

Senator Morgan closed the debate with a reiteration of the superior advantages of the Nicaragua route. Recognizing that Panama had been settled upon by the controlling spirits of the Government, his final appeal was a despairing one.

THE PANAMA TREATY

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

Last spring, under the act of June 28, 1902, a treaty concluded between the representatives of the Republic of Colombia and of our Government was ratified by the Senate. This treaty was entered into at the urgent solicitation of the people of Colombia. In drawing up this treaty every concession was made to the people and to the Government of Colombia. We were more than just in dealing with them. Our generosity was such as to make it a serious question whether we had not gone too far in their interest at the expense of our own; for in our scrupulous desire to pay all possible heed, not merely to the real but even to the fancied rights of our weaker neighbor, who already owed so much to our protection and forbearance, we yielded in all possible ways to her desires in drawing up the treaty. Nevertheless the Government of Colombia not merely repudiated the treaty, but repudiated it in such manner as to make it evident by the time the Colombian Congress adjourned that not the scantiest hope remained of ever getting a satisfactory treaty from them. The Government of Colombia made the treaty, and yet when the Colombian Congress was called to ratify it the vote against ratification was unanimous. It does not appear that the Government made any real effort to secure ratification.

Immediately after the adjournment of the Congress a revolution broke out in Panama. The people of Panama had long been discontented with the Republic of Colombia, and they had been kept quiet only by the prospect of the conclusion of the treaty, which was to them a matter of vital concern. When it became evident that the treaty was hopelessly lost, the people of Panama rose literally as one man. Not a shot was fired by a single man on the isthmus in the interest of the Colombian Government. Not a life was lost in the accomplishment of the revolution. The Colombian troops stationed on the isthmus, who had long been unpaid, made common cause with the people of Panama, and with astonishing unanimity the new republic was started. The duty of the United States in the premises was clear. In strict accordance with the principles laid down by Secretaries Cass and Seward, the United States gave notice that it would permit the landing of no expeditionary force, the arrival of which would mean chaos and destruction along the line of the railroad and of the proposed canal, and an interrup-

Mr. President, I leave this subject to take care of itself from this time forward. I will await a time to see whether or not there is a chance for the United States to accept that beautiful and inviting situation created in Nicaragua by the hand of nature, a location that is more convenient than any other place in the world for an isthmian canal; a healthy and fertile zone in a country of splendid agricultural, mineral, and forestry possibilities and resources, occupied by a quiet, gentle people, where the canal zone, from Greytown to Brito, would perhaps not include 3,000 inhabitants, and where, under the permissions given to us under the proposed treaties with Nicaragua and Costa Rica, we could admit or refuse the privilege of residence in that zone to any who might apply, a healthful and beautiful country, where Americans could gather with their industries and their trades in the very heart of the great equatorial belt that will pass around the world. We throw that all away. We throw away a canal for which we have spent nearly two millions in surveys, against which no breath of suspicion was ever raised by any survey or any commission of examination or by any engineer or explorer or traveler who has ever been there, which is absolutely free from all exceptions and objections. We cast it aside and plunge into the fever-laden morasses of Panama. Why, Mr. President, why? Because we are led or driven by some hidden impulse that there is no man in the Senate who is prepared to weigh or to measure, or to explain or account for.

The treaty was ratified by the Senate on March 18 by a vote of 73 to 5. Colombia, however, refused on her part to ratify the treaty, demanding a cash payment of $15,500,000. The result was the secession of the State of Panama from the United States of Colombia, the recognition of its independence by the United States, and the formation by the United States of a treaty (Hay-Varilla) with her on the terms formerly offered to Colombia, but with amendments substantially the same as those offered by Senator Morgan to the Colombia treaty (Hay-Herran).

On December 7, 1903, in his third annual message to Congress, President Roosevelt presented an account of the fate of the Hay-Herran treaty, and of the consequent actions of the United States Government, together with a justification of these actions.

tion of transit as an inevitable consequence. The de facto Government of Panama was recognized, and the Government of Colombia was notified of our action.

The control, in the interest of the commerce and traffic of the whole civilized world, of the means of undisturbed transit across the Isthmus of Panama has become of transcendent importance to the United States. We have repeatedly exercised this control by intervening in the course of domestic dissension, and by protecting the territory from foreign invasion. In 1853 Mr. Everett assured the Peruvian minister that we should not hesitate to maintain the neutrality of the isthmus in the case of war between Peru and Colombia. In 1864 Colombia, which has always been vigilant to avail itself of its privileges conferred by the treaty, expressed its expectation that in the event of war between Peru and Spain the United States would carry into effect the guaranty of neutrality. There have been few administrations of the State Department in which this treaty has not, either by the one side or the other, been used as a basis of more or less important demands. It was said by Mr. Fish in 1871 that the Department of State had reason to believe that an attack upon Colombian sovereignty on the isthmus had, on several occasions, been averted by warning from this Government. In 1886, when Colombia was under the menace of hostilities from Italy in the Cerruti case, Mr. Bayard expressed the serious concern that the United States could not but feel that a European power should resort to force against a sister republic of this hemisphere, as to the sovereign and uninterrupted use of a part of whose territory we are guarantors under the solemn faith of a treaty.

History establishes beyond question: First, that the United States has for over half a century patiently and in good faith carried out its obligations under the treaty of 1846; second, that when for the first time it became possible for Colombia to do anything in requital of the services thus repeatedly rendered to it for fifty-seven years by the United States, the Colombian Government peremptorily and offensively refused thus to do its part, even though to do so would have been to its advantage and immeasurably to the advantage of the State of Panama, at that time under its jurisdiction; third, that throughout this period revolutions, riots and factional disturbances of every kind have occurred one after the other in almost uninterrupted succession, some of them lasting for months and even for years, while the central government was unable to put them down or to make peace with the rebels; fourth, that these disturbances, jurisdiction over said strip and the ports at the ends thereof, to make such police and sanitary regulations as shall be necessary to preserve order and health, and establish tribunals, etc.

The President has complied substantially with this section.

The first question in reference to this is, is the control for the term of one hundred years, renewable at our sole and absolute option for periods of similar duration so long as we may desire, "perpetual control"? I maintain that to all intents and purposes it is perpetual control. The treaty gives us control of the zone forever at our option. The word "perpetual" as used in this treaty, has no particular technical meaning in law. The word is given its ordinary meaning, which is: "Never ceasing; continuing forever in future time; destined to be eternal; continuing without interruption."

We obtain by this treaty a never-ceasing control of the canal zone; it will continue forever, by its very terms, if we so desire it. It is destined to be eternal and it will continue without interruption. The intent of the Spooner Act in this respect is substantially complied with. All that was contemplated by that act was that we should have an irrevocable control so far as Colombia is concerned, over the canal zone. We obtain such control by the treaty.

The next question is, Does the treaty give us a six-mile zone from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, as provided in the act?

I maintain that that provision has also been substantially complied with. We obtain by this treaty considerably more than a six-mile zone all along the route of the canal, excepting at two points—Panama and Colon. At Panama for a very short distance the zone is one and one-half miles wide on one side and a little over three miles on the other. At Colon it is less than three miles on one side and a little over three miles on the other. There has been with a substantial compliance with the act in respect to the zone that the exception of Panama and Colon is not important. In addition to this it must be remembered that we obtain more than a six-mile zone along all auxiliary canals. So, as a matter of fact, we obtain a wider zone and a greater zone (excepting at the two points I have mentioned) than the act provided. There is no fatal variance in this regard between the act and the treaty. The Spooner Act provides that the strip of territory shall extend from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean. The very terms of the treaty comply with the act in this respect.

We obtain the perpetual control of the railroad, as provided in the act. We obtain jurisdiction over the strip, and substantially over the ports at the end thereof, to make police and sanitary regulations, as provided in the act. The treaty provides for the judicial tribunals, as stipulated in the act.

Section 3 of the act provides that when the President shall have done the things required of him in sections 1 and 2—namely, acquired the property of the new Panama Canal Company and obtained a satisfactory treaty with Colombia—he is authorized to pay for the property by mortgage loan by himself.

Now Mr. President, as I have stated, there has been a substantial compliance with the Spooner Act. It is a primary rule of construction that in case of this kind one treaty or one law must be construed with another, so that the words may stand, if possible. Repeals by implication are not favored by the courts. The Supreme Court, before it will declare that a law repeals another law or a treaty repeals a law, will require that the later provision is certainly and clearly in conflict to the former, and if the two statutes or the treaty and statute can be construed so that they both can stand they will be so construed.

In connection with this particular branch of the subject I desire to take a very few minutes in talking about the public lands.

As I view this subject, we have obtained all and more than all the lands which we can possibly need. By Article IV of the extension of 1896 of the Wyse concession of 1850 the Panama Canal Company agreed to issue to Colombia, gratis, $400,000 francs in 1900 dividend-bearing shares of the new company.

These are the shares referred to in the present under consideration. The United States assumes no obligation or liability whatever in reference to these shares, as Article 6 of the treaty under consideration expressly says that such rights of Colombia to the said shares exist only as a stockholder, and that no obligation under this provision is imposed upon or assumed by the United States.

Reference has been made to the treaties of 1846-1848 between the United States and Colombia and to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Both of those treaties, as is well known, refer to neutrality.

The treaty of 1846, which the present treaty provides shall remain in full force as to the cities of Panama and Colon and elsewhere in Colombia, was a treaty of friendship entered into between the United States and Colombia in 1846. This treaty was entered into in contemplation of the construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. The present treaty provides that we shall continue to guarantee the neutrality of the isthmus, in conformity with the provisions of article 35 of the treaty of 1846.

By article 35 of that treaty we agreed to do two things in particular. We guaranteed the neutrality of the isthmus, and we guaranteed the rights of sovereignty and property which Colombia has and possesses over said territory. The treaty of 1846 is still in force between the United States and Colombia. We are still bound by it, and there is no objection to our continuing to be bound by it under the present treaty.

As to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, Article XVI of the treaty under consideration provides for the opening of the canal upon the terms provided for by section 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and in conformity with all the stipulations of that treaty.

The provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are very familiar to Senators. It stipulated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; it provided for the neutrality of the canal, and it contained certain rules governing such neutrality.

There is no objection that I can see in incorporating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in the treaty before the Senate. That treaty is already a binding obligation upon us. We intend to observe it. We want a neutral canal. We want a canal that will be to the interest of the world to use and protect. The United States does not desire a canal for its own exclusive use.

In the discussion of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was well settled to the satisfaction of most Senators that there was nothing in that treaty which prevented our fortifying the canal if we so desired. There is not a word in this treaty that will prevent our fortifying and protecting this canal if an emergency arises which makes it necessary for us to do so.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to say a word about our guaranty of sovereignty of the Republic of Colombia.

Our guaranty is no greater than the guaranty which we gave her in the treaty of 1846. We are still bound by that treaty, and the reference to sovereignty of Colombia in this treaty is only a restatement of what we are already bound to acknowledge by a treaty made half a century ago.

If it were not for the clause which follows, the provision I have read would be objectionable. But the twenty-third article continues:

Under exceptional circumstances, however, on account of unforeseen common danger to said canal, railways, or to the free and property of the persons employed upon the canal, railways, etc., the Government of the United States is authorized to act in the interest of such government without the necessity of obtaining the consent of Colombia, beforehand.

This provision removes the objection from the so-called joint protestants. The United States will determine what are exceptional circumstances and unforeseen or imminent danger. Morgan closed the debate with a reiteration of the advantages of the Nicaragua route. Recalling that Panama had been settled upon by the committee of the Government, his final appeal was a plea for its adoption.

I will await a time to see whether or not there is a chance for the United States to accept that beautiful and inviting situation created in Nicaragua by the hand of nature, a location that is more convenient than any other place in the world for an isthmian canal; a healthy and fertile zone in a country of splendid agricultural, mineral, and forestry possibilities and resources, occupied by a quiet, gentle people, where the canal zone, from Greytown to Brito, would perhaps not include 3,000 inhabitants, and where, under the permissions given to us under the proposed treaties with Nicaragua and Costa Rica, we could admit or refuse the privilege of residence in that zone to any who might apply, a healthful and beautiful country, where Americans could gather with their industries and their trades in the very heart of the great equatorial belt that will pass around the world. We throw that all away. We throw away a canal for which we have spent nearly two millions in surveys, against which no breath of suspicion was ever raised by any survey or any commission of examination or by any engineer or explorer or traveler who has ever been there, which is absolutely free from all exceptions and objections. We cast it aside and plunge into the fever-laden morasses of Panama. Why, Mr. President, why? Because we are led or driven by some hidden impulse that there is no man in the Senate who is prepared to weigh or to measure, or to explain or account for.

The treaty was ratified by the Senate on March 18 by a vote of 73 to 5. Colombia, however, refused on her part to ratify the treaty, demanding a cash payment of $15,500,000. The result was the secession of the State of Panama from the United States of Colombia, the recognition of its independence by the United States, and the formation by the United States of a treaty (Hay-Varilla) with her on the terms formerly offered to Colombia, but with amendments substantially the same as those offered by Senator Morgan to the Colombia treaty (Hay-Herran).

On December 7, 1903, in his third annual message to Congress, President Roosevelt presented an account of the fate of the Hay-Herran treaty, and of the consequent actions of the United States Government, together with a justification of these actions.

tion of transit as an inevitable consequence. The de facto Government of Panama was recognized, and the Government of Colombia was notified of our action.

The control, in the interest of the commerce and traffic of the whole civilized world, of the means of undisturbed transit across the Isthmus of Panama has become of transcendent importance to the United States. We have repeatedly exercised this control by intervening in the course of domestic dissension, and by protecting the territory from foreign invasion. In 1853 Mr. Everett assured the Peruvian minister that we should not hesitate to maintain the neutrality of the isthmus in the case of war between Peru and Colombia. In 1864 Colombia, which has always been vigilant to avail itself of its privileges conferred by the treaty, expressed its expectation that in the event of war between Peru and Spain the United States would carry into effect the guaranty of neutrality. There have been few administrations of the State Department in which this treaty has not, either by the one side or the other, been used as a basis of more or less important demands. It was said by Mr. Fish in 1871 that the Department of State had reason to believe that an attack upon Colombian sovereignty on the isthmus had, on several occasions, been averted by warning from this Government. In 1886, when Colombia was under the menace of hostilities from Italy in the Cerruti case, Mr. Bayard expressed the serious concern that the United States could not but feel that a European power should resort to force against a sister republic of this hemisphere, as to the sovereign and uninterrupted use of a part of whose territory we are guarantors under the solemn faith of a treaty.

History establishes beyond question: First, that the United States has for over half a century patiently and in good faith carried out its obligations under the treaty of 1846; second, that when for the first time it became possible for Colombia to do anything in requital of the services thus repeatedly rendered to it for fifty-seven years by the United States, the Colombian Government peremptorily and offensively refused thus to do its part, even though to do so would have been to its advantage and immeasurably to the advantage of the State of Panama, at that time under its jurisdiction; third, that throughout this period revolutions, riots and factional disturbances of every kind have occurred one after the other in almost uninterrupted succession, some of them lasting for months and even for years, while the central government was unable to put them down or to make peace with the rebels; fourth, that these disturbances, instead of showing any sign of abating, have tended to grow more numerous and more serious in the immediate past; fifth, that the control of Colombia over the Isthmus of Panama could not be maintained without the armed intervention and assistance of the United States. In other words, the Government of Colombia, though wholly unable to maintain order on the Isthmus, has nevertheless declined to ratify a treaty the conclusion of which opened the only chance to secure its own stability and to guarantee permanent peace on, and the construction of a canal across, the Isthmus.

Under such circumstances the Government of the United States would have been guilty of folly and weakness, amounting in their sum to a crime against the nation, had it acted otherwise than it did when the revolution of November 3 last took place in Panama. This great enterprise of building the inter-oceanic canal can not be held up to gratify the whims, or out of respect to the governmental impotence, or to the even more sinister and evil political peculiarities, of people who, though they dwell afar off, yet against the wish of the actual dwellers on the isthmus, assert an unreal supremacy over the territory. The possession of a territory fraught with such peculiar capacities as the isthmus in question carries with it obligations to mankind. The course of events has shown that this canal can not be built by private enterprise, or by any other nation than our own; therefore it must be built by the United States.

Every effort has been made by the Government of the United States to persuade Colombia to follow a course which was essentially not only to our interests and to the interests of the world, but to the interests of Colombia itself. These efforts have failed; and Colombia, by her persistence in repulsing the advances that have been made, has forced us, for the sake of our own honor, and of the interest and well-being, not merely of our own people, but of the people of the Isthmus of Panama and the people of the civilized countries of the world, to take decisive steps to bring to an end a condition of affairs which had become intolerable. The new Republic of Panama immediately offered to negotiate a treaty with us. This treaty I herewith submit. By it our interests are better safeguarded than in the treaty with Colombia which was ratified by the Senate at its last session. It is better in its terms than the treaties offered to us by the Republics of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. At last the right to begin this great undertaking is made available. Panama has done her part. All that remains is for the American Congress to do its part, and forthwith this Repossession upon the subject of the revolution in Panama. It wished to know:

Whether at the time of the ratification of the treaty Panama had successfully established its independence, had lawfully adopted a constitution, and had given authority to the persons with whom said treaty purports to have been made to negotiate and ratify the same;

Also, the population of said Republic of Panama at that time, its capacity for self-government, and the race and character of the persons composing it;

Also, whether the officials negotiating or ratifying the treaty on the part of Panama had any personal or private interest in or relation to the construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama;

Also, whether the constitution of the Republic of Colombia authorized the secession of Panama therefrom, and whether Colombia was prevented by the action of the United States or by any officer or force under the jurisdiction of the same from attempting to assert its authority or to prevent such secession, and what instructions, if any, had been given by the Government of the United States to such officers, whether civil, military, or naval, and whether if any action had been taken by such officers without special authority what action was so taken, and whether such action has been approved or disapproved by the Government of the United States;

Also, at what time information of any revolution or resistance to the Government of Colombia in Panama was received by the Government of the United States or any department thereof, and whether any information was received of any expected or intended revolution before it occurred, and the date of such information.

On December 17 Senator Hoar spoke to his resolution.

No man in this country desires more eagerly than I do—I doubt if there be a man living who desires so eagerly as I do—to support the Administration and to act with my Republican associates in this matter. I desire the building of the canal. It is one of the great landmarks, rarely found once in a century, in the progress of humanity, bringing nations together and making the whole world kin. I hope it is a laudable ambition—at any rate, it is my ambition—that this may be accomplished public will enter upon the execution of a project colossal in its size and of well-nigh incalculable possibilities for the good of this country and the nations of mankind.

By the provisions of the treaty the United States guarantees and will maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama. There is granted to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a strip ten miles wide and extending three nautical miles into the sea at either terminal, with all lands lying outside of the zone necessary for the construction of the canal or for its auxiliary works, and with the islands in the Bay of Panama. The cities of Panama and Colon are not embraced in the canal zone, but the United States assumes their sanitation and, in case of need, the maintenance of order therein; the United States enjoys within the granted limits all the rights, power, and authority which it would possess were it the sovereign of the territory to the exclusion of the exercise of sovereign rights by the republic. All railway and canal property rights belonging to Panama and needed for the canal pass to the United States, including any property of the respective companies in the cities of Panama and Colon; the works, property, and personnel of the canal and railways are exempted from taxation as well in the cities of Panama and Colon as in the canal zone and its dependencies. Free immigration of the personnel and importation of supplies for the construction and operation of the canal are granted. Provision is made for the use of military force and the building of fortifications by the United States for the protection of the transit. In other details, particularly as to the acquisition of the interests of the new Panama Canal Company and the Panama Railway by the United States and the condemnation of private property for the uses of the canal, the stipulations of the Hay-Herran treaty are closely followed, while the compensation to be given for these enlarged grants remains the same, being ten millions of dollars payable on exchange of ratifications; and, beginning nine years from that date, an annual payment of $250,000 during the life of the convention.

SENATE, DECEMBER 9, 1903

On December 9, 1903, George F. Hoar (Massachusetts) offered a resolution in the Senate inquiring of the President for information which might be in his

422

in my time by the party with which I have acted from my youth and by the Administration of my choice. Nothing can be more delightful to me than that it shall be accomplished by the President of whom I have supposed I had the right to speak as an honored and valued personal friend. It is a dear ambition, also, that my vote may be recorded in its favor. But let this great transaction be wrought in the great way which alone is worthy of it. Let it be brought to pass, if it may be, by the unanimous consent of all parties and the united action of all the people. If, unhappily, that be impossible, at least let it be without the taint or the suspicion of national dishonor.

Now, Mr. President, I do not care to inquire too scrupulously whether the President has waited long enough for his recognition of the de facto government in Panama. The question whether and when he shall recognize any government is left, in general, by the Constitution to his sole discretion, a discretion which must be binding upon all other departments.

What we want to know is this: Whether our Administration, knowing or expecting beforehand that a revolution was coming, so arranged matters that the revolution, whether peaceable or forcible, should be permitted to go on without interruption, and only took measures to stop the Republic of Colombia from preventing it. Did the President, or the Secretary of State, or any other department of our Government purposely prevent Colombia from anticipating and preventing a breach of the peace and a disturbance of the transit across the isthmus by sending her troops there before it happened, and so virtually let the revolution take place, and say to Colombia: "You shall take no precautions to stop it"? Did we, in substance, say to Colombia: "We will not allow you to prevent a revolution in your province of Panama by moving your forces there" before it broke out?

Now, it appears from the House documents that the uprising took place in the city of Panama at about 6 o'clock in the afternoon of the 3d of November, 1903.

The following order was sent to the Nashville on November 2 (Monday):

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., November 2, 1903.

Nashville (care American consul), Colon:

Maintain free and uninterrupted transit. If interruption threatened by armed force occupy the line of railroad. Prevent landing of any armed force with hostile intent, either government or insurgent, either at Colon, Porto Bello, or other point. Send copy of instructions to senior officer present at Panama upon arrival of Boston. Have sent copy of instructions and have telegraphed Dixie to proceed with all possible dispatch from Kingston to Colon. Government force reported approaching the isthmus in vessels. Prevent their landing if in your judgment this would precipitate a conflict.

DARLING, Acting.

So it is clear that at least twenty-four hours, perhaps forty-eight hours, before the revolution broke out our Government had instructed its man-of-war to prevent the Government of Colombia from doing anything in anticipation of the revolution to prevent it. This message, as appears from the dispatch of November 3, Tuesday, had been sent on November 1, Sunday, three days before the revolution. November 3, at 8.45 p. m., before our Government had received any notice of the revolution, orders had been sent to the consul at Colon that the troops should not be allowed to proceed to Panama. The intended revolutionary movement had been known to a very few persons only at Colon up to 8 a. m. on the 4th of November. It was not known by the Government party in Colon, by the Conservative party, or by the Colombian forces at Colon when the dispatch received at 3.35 in the afternoon of November 4 was sent.

The Republic of Panama was recognized by the President on or before November 6. The precise date of that recognition is not given in the House documents.

Now, Mr. President, I want to know, I think the American people want to know, and have a right to know, whether this mighty policeman, instructed to keep the peace on that isthmus, seeing a man about to attack another, before he had struck his blow, manacled the arms of the man attacked, so that he could not defend himself, leaving his assailant free, and then instantly proceeded to secure from the assailant the pocketbook of the victim, on the ground that he was de facto the owner?

Mr. President, it may be said that it is almost an affront, certainly a great incivility, to ask such a question. It may be said that anybody who knows the President knows that he is incapable of intrigue or indirection or artifice. And there is very great force in that suggestion. From all I have ever seen or known Mr. Roosevelt is the last man living who would be capable of such a thing as that. His faults, if he have them, I have always expected would come from a brave and honest and perhaps somewhat impetuous nature that would ever seek to attain great objects in a great way. But the President himself has suggested and invited the desire for this explanation. He has thought it due to himself that the American people should know that nothing of the kind could be imputed to him. He has repelled with scorn the suggestion of such an imputation.

THE PANAMA REVOLUTION

Colombia was a friendly nation. She owned that territory. We have admitted all that by receiving a minister from her, and sending a minister to her, and negotiating with her for a purchase of her rights.

It is said that she negotiated a treaty with us by her executive, and then that her executive took no steps to persuade her congress to ratify it. Indeed, she did exactly what we did with Denmark thirty years ago, in the case of St. Thomas.

Is not this an act of war upon a friendly though weak nation as it stands in these imperfect documents? Suppose, under the Pauncefote treaty, where Great Britain guarantees the neutrality of the canal, she were to send an armed force to keep us off when we were sending our troops in a ship to do the same thing? Should not we repeat to his lordship at the foreign office Mr. Adams' simple and sublime sentence: "It is superfluous to observe to your lordship that this is war"?

One thing more. I do not observe that any country on this continent has yet recognized the Republic of Panama. Russia and Germany and Austria and China have hastened to recognize it. France, whose people have a strong pecuniary interest in the sale of the old canal property, has joined them, and, I believe, three or four of the northern European states, but, except France, no republic from the Gulf to Cape Horn. The nations so far stand aloof. Do you think it well to proclaim to the sixteen republics at the south that, if they are weak, or even if they are liable to frequent revolution, we will deal with them hereafter, if we fancy it for our interest, as we are charged with having dealt with Colombia?

Are we willing to say that if this revolution had not happened we meant to take that strip of territory by the strong hand and to pay Colombia what we should think proper damages? Do you claim that every South American nation holds its property subject to our right of eminent domain?

We have decided that the Panama route is the best route. But there are a good many people who think the Nicaragua route better and that we must yet go there. We all thought so three years ago. If that turn out to be true, are we going to take that in the same way? Is this doctrine of eminent domain, of which we have heard so much, likely to help us get the coveted markets of South America or to make them like us better as customers or producers? I think, Mr. President, that we ought to have, and that we ought to have now, and if this resolution be adopted we shall have, the authoritative declaration by the President of the United States and Congress which will compose and

He has taken the uncommon step of communicating to the press extracts from a message which he had prepared to send to Congress, written before the revolution occurred in Panama, in order that the American people might know that it was impossible that he had expected it and still more impossible that he had done anything to bring it about. I did not think myself that such an assurance to the public was at all necessary. If the President had sent for any member of the Senate and had proposed to show him that message, he would, I think, have been told there was no occasion for him to seek to prove by any evidence beyond that of his own character that he had had nothing to do with any indirection or artifice. But he decided otherwise. And, having decided otherwise, I suppose he will like to have the imperfect evidence afforded by the communication to the House of Representatives and by the message at the beginning of the present session made complete, and whatever is lacking to a complete answer to the charges which have been made in the press supplied.

Now, Mr. President, as the matter stands on the information given to the House in Document No. 8 the shores of Colombia were patrolled by armed vessels of the United States in order that that government—the government of the country—should not take any steps to prevent it.

It does not appear in that document where or from whom our Administration secured the information that led to these orders.

According to the documents sent to the House by the President the first tiding of any revolution that came either from Panama or Colon, or any expected revolution, came November 3, the day the revolution happened. As the statement is now left in the official communication to Congress, this revolution was known at Washington before it was known on the isthmus. All our Government, by its own statement, seems to have done in its anxiety that transit should not be disturbed was not to take measures that violence should not occur, but to take measures that violence should not be prevented. It performed its duty of keeping uninterrupted the transit across the isthmus only by interrupting it itself—interrupting it itself in its most sacred and rightful use, that of the lawful government of the country moving its own troops over its own territory, that it might prevent a breach of its peace and an unlawful revolution against its authority.

Mr. President, is there any doubt that, as now standing unexplained, this was an act of war?

forever put an end to these fears, whether they exist at home or abroad.

If this be our policy and it go on, if any disaster come to the great Republic—which Heaven avert—and our country shall perish, she will be mourned only by despots, and her overthrow will be hailed with exultation and triumph by every people in the Western Hemisphere from the Arctic Ocean to Cape Horn.

Mr. President, the question of one revolution more or less in a little South American republic may seem of infinitesimal importance. The question whether we wait five minutes, or five days, or five years before we recognize a new government is not of great importance, if that be all. Even then, if this five-minute act of revolution be absolutely contemporaneous with our getting for ourselves the larger part of the country against whom the revolution takes place, it seems to me to be due to our own character to walk circumspectly. But we are setting a great precedent in international law, and declaring by an example far more impressive than any precept what rule of conduct we propose to observe in the future, toward sixteen South American republics who are all existing to-day under like conditions. We are saying to every despotic country in Europe that, so far as we are concerned, there will never be any objection, any active opposition, or even any moral condemnation on our part if they do the same thing when they shall see fit.

Now, I do not undertake to say—I do not say—that there has been anything, so far, on the part of our Government liable to any just criticism. But the American people and the Senate, as yet, know only part of the story. They are, in my judgment, entitled to know the whole, and to know it now, before action be taken upon the Panama treaty.

We are entitled to know it in the way prescribed by the established custom of the Government for a century—by an official communication from the Executive to one or the other House of Congress, and not to get it through some individual Senator, whose information may be colored, unconsciously, by his own wishes, or by what he fancies to be the wishes of anybody else, still less by the unofficial public utterances of the representatives of foreign states, or even of officials in our own executive departments.

Joseph B. Foraker (Ohio) opposed the resolution as untimely.

Mr. President, as I read these telegrams in the light of our duty and obligation to Panama with respect to the transit across the isthmus, I see no occasion to draw therefrom any inference except only that the President of the United States was alert to do, in a patriotic way, his duty as the President of the United States.

The President has stated that there was no connivance and no intrigue, and yet the Senator from Massachusetts, reading these telegrams, seems to have an idea that the President shall submit proof to him that he was telling the truth when he made the statement that he had not connived and had not intrigued. Now, the situation in Panama was one as to which there was common knowledge to all informed newspaper-reading people throughout this country.

The very moment we sent that treaty to the United States of Colombia for action there, for them to ratify it, there was evidenced a disposition unfriendly to it, a disposition that grew stronger and stronger in its manifestation, until, finally, the rejection came.

What did that mean to Panama? Take the map and look at it—a mere isthmus, as it is properly called. Colombia situated in South America; Panama as disconnected as a state could possible be, both by water and by the nature of the land that intervened. To that little department of Panama the construction of the canal at that point meant the most important advantage to her that you could possibly conceive. For that canal not to be constructed there, but to be constructed at some other place, meant the most positive disadvantage to her.

She was intensely in favor, therefore, of this canal being constructed at that place, and in favor, therefore, of the ratification of that treaty. But, despite all she could do, the treaty was rejected. At once it became known through the newspapers—not by any agent sent here or sent elsewhere, but as common knowledge, reported by the Associated Press and otherwise—that the people of Panama were in a state of discontent and that they would not submit to such disregard of their interests by the government under which they were then living. It became at once known, in other words, that she was proposing to secede and set up an independent government for herself.

That was published everywhere. No agent came to the President of the United States. The President of the United States sent no agent to Panama. It was not necessary. Panama was acting in her own interest. She was exercising her right to object to the action of her government, and, her government cause of the difference in time. France had no constitution, but it was a great, mighty people, forty millions or more, who had set up a republic dedicated to freedom and to human liberty, and this great Republic at once responded with recognition.

NELSON W. ALDRICH [R. I.].—We did not even ask France, as I remember, whether the government which had been overthrown consented.

SENATOR FORAKER.—No.

Now, in 1873 they established a republic in Spain. There was no delay. Later, when the Emperor of Brazil was deposed, the republic that followed him was instantly recognized, and other examples might be cited.

Mr. President, there was no reason in the case of France or Spain or Brazil for precipitate or hasty action; we had no special duties there; but in the case of the Republic of Panama it was different. What are the conditions, according to international law, that are sufficient to justify us in instantly recognizing a new government, as we did in the case of France, Spain, and Brazil?

The only condition necessary—and it does not make any difference, in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, whether it be brought about in five minutes or five days or five months—is that the new government shall be the sole authority throughout the region over which it undertakes to govern, and that there is no contention and no disputed authority. It is not necessary to go that far. But when those conditions exist to that extent, then, according to all international canons of law, a recognition is in order at the option of the recognizing government.

In the case of Panama it was not only true that the Republic of Panama was the only authority there of a governmental nature, that that authority was supreme throughout her borders, but it was also true that there was not even a policeman representing Colombia within the department of Panama. They had a little army there when the trouble commenced—400 men, with some generals and colonels—and they were all quietly picked up, without the shedding of one drop of blood, and put on a transport and sent back to their own home. That completed the revolution.

But, Mr. President, there was a necessity in the case of Panama which required prompt action on our part, as there was no necessity in the other cases to which I have referred. These conditions existing, we would have been without excuse if we had halted in recognition. The necessities to which I have persisting in wronging her, she had a right, if she saw fit, to go into rebellion.

In other words, weeks before she declared her independence it became known that she would take that step—not officially, but it became known to every man who studied the situation and considered what human nature would do under such circumstances. The clouds were gathering. Should the United States, through its Administration at Washington, be unmindful of that fact? Not at all. It was our duty to be watchful with respect to it under any circumstances, but particularly so in view of our obligations to preserve that transit free from interruption.

Ever since 1846, when the treaty between this Government and New Granada, as that country was then called, was entered into, we have been under that obligation. Time and again we have landed our marines to preserve order and to protect that transit from interruption and embarrassment. Repeatedly we have done that at the request of Colombia; we have done it in a number of instances on our own notion. The President of the United States, seeing the storm coming, seeing the action that was threatened, remembering his obligation to preserve peace and order and protect that transit from interruption, did only his duty in taking all preliminary necessary steps to preserve order when such a contingency should arise.

Mr. President, as is suggested to me, suppose he had not done it; suppose the rebellion had come; that secession had been accomplished; that war had ensued, and all the results that accompany war had followed, what would have been the criticism then of our friends on the other side? It would have been a criticism, not that the President had acted precipitately, not that he had acted without cause, but that he had not acted at all; that he had lost the canal after the United States had expressed her preference for it, and after the people of the whole country, without regard to party and without regard to section, had demanded it.

We are given the date when the secession occurred; we are given the date when the recognition was accorded, and we are asked to believe, if we agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, that there was inordinate haste, indecent haste, in granting that recognition.

What are the facts? What are the precedents, first? In 1871, when the Republic of France was established, we recognized it immediately. The date of our cablegram instructing Minister Washburne to recognize the Republic of France was dated the next day. That apparent delay of a day was only be-referred are these: Under the treaty of 1846 we had a duty at that time incumbent upon us, as it has been ever since the ratification of that treaty down to the present moment, to preserve that transit free from interruption.

430

War being threatened, a condition of things being threatened that promised an interruption, it was the duty of this Government to be prepared to prevent it; and, instead of criticising President Roosevelt for the action he took, he ought to receive, and he will receive, from the American people their unqualified approbation for that which he did in this respect, because that which he did was but to redeem the promises and obligations of our Government, just as other Administrations have done the same thing over and over again.

We do not have to wait until there is actual war. We do not have to wait until there is a hostile force landed and engagements actually commence and blood is being actually shed. It is much better, Mr. President, foreseeing the situation of which all have common knowledge, to take effective steps to prevent these conditions that would have followed but for our intervention.

Mr. President, no Senator on this side, I am sure, has the slightest objection to all possible information being given with respect to this whole transaction; no Senator on this side has the slightest objection to all the light being had on this transaction that can be shed on it, but there is a time and there is a place for Senators to discuss propositions of this character. Here in this open session is not the time nor the place. I have undertaken to say enough only in answer to the Senator from Massachusetts to show that the President in this matter did not act hastily; that he did not act without precedent or without the warrant and authority of international law, and that he did not act contrary to, but strictly in conformity with, his official obligation, charged as he is, as the head of this nation, with the faithful execution of all our treaty obligations.

I have no hesitancy in saying, Mr. President, that I have the profound conviction that, when this matter is thoroughly understood, even our Democratic friends will hesitate to criticise him. Certainly they will hesitate, at any rate, when they make their nonpartisan speeches, of which we have heard so much, and then give their nonpartisan votes.

On December 18 John T. Morgan (Alabama) submitted several resolutions, of which the following sum up the whole:

Resolved: That the President has no lawful right or power, without the consent of Congress, and under the conditions that exist in Panama, to use the military and naval forces of the United States to prevent Colombia from enforcing her claim to the proper exercise of her sovereignty and to execute her laws in the department of Panama by any form of coercion that is consistent with the laws of nations and is not in conflict with any right of the United States.

Resolved: That the intervention by the President is contrary to the law of neutrality enacted by the Congress of the United States, and is contrary to the laws of nations.

THE MAN BEHIND THE EGG
By Cralk, in the New York "Times"

Edmund W. Pettus [Ala.] supported the resolutions.

Panama, as we are informed by the Administration, is an "independent republic." If that is a correct statement, the serious question for our consideration is: How, and by what agencies, did Panama become an independent nation?

Was the new state born under and according to the law of nations, or was it unlawfully and "untimely ripped" from its mother's womb? And, if this new nation was so unlawfully and untimely ripped, was the honor of our country neglected or tarnished by this unlawful birth?

Our country is now a national giant. God forbid that this Republic should ever be too great to earnestly and diligently guard and preserve the honor of our people.

I desire first to call the attention of the Senate to the general duties of one nation to another. Mr. Vattel lays it down that—

433

General Jackson made that statement, although the battle of San Jacinto had been fought, and no Mexican soldier had put his foot on that ground for six or eight months.

I will read another paragraph from that same message of General Jackson. He said:

The acknowledgment of a new state as independent and entitled to a place in the family of nations is at all times an act of great delicacy and responsibility, but more especially so when such State has forcibly separated itself from another of which it had formed an integral part and which still claims dominion over it. A premature recognition under these circumstances, if not looked upon as justifiable cause of war, is always liable to be regarded as a proof of an unfriendly spirit to one of the contending parties.

Yes, Mr. President, the honor of the nation is worth more than the property of the nation.

Mr. President, I know there are those whose logic is so sharpened that they can prove any proposition in law necessary to sustain the Administration.

In reference to this particular subject there was a claim asserted based on the treaty of 1846 with New Granada. I will call the attention of the Senate to a few matters in reference to that, though I must say that no human being can strengthen the argument that was made by the eminent Senator from Virginia [John W. Daniel] on yesterday. He demonstrated to an almost mathematical certainty that this claim based on that treaty was a bald pretence.

Mr. Seward, Mr. Fish, Mr. Evarts, and Mr. Blaine, each a great Republican statesman and each speaking as Secretary of State for our Government, denied that our treaty of 1846 with New Granada could be so construed as to confer on the United States the power or bind our country to the duty of taking part in a civil war on the isthmus.

Mr. President, it is a bald pretence that Colombia has acted in any other way in reference to the treaty than she had a right to act. People may get mad because they can not make an advantageous contract. I think myself the great Republic of Colombia made a mistake on the money question, but she had a right to make the mistake, and the United States had no right to complain of Colombia. Its Congress had never promised to ratify any treaty, and Congress was the sole power which could ratify.

Mr. President, the particular point on which I wish to conclude is this: The United States is a wonderful power—won-

All nations are therefore under a strict obligation to cultivate justice toward each other, to observe it scrupulously, and carefully to abstain from everything that may violate it. Each ought to render to the others what belongs to them, to respect their rights, and to leave them in the peaceable enjoyment of them. (Vattel's Law of Nations, Cap. V, p. 160.)

Mr. President, I shall not now pause to comment on this great principle of moral and international law. I call it the law of common honesty, and every nation and every man ought to be bound by it.

I next call your attention to the circumstances under which, under the law of nations, one nation may acknowledge the independence of another nation—a newborn nation. That law has been settled for many years. It was settled, in fact, or considered as settled, by the law writers before this nation was born.

But the United States more than any other country on earth has, by its acts and by the declarations of its statesmen, enforced the general proposition which I shall now read from Chancellor Kent, the great Blackstone of American law. This great writer lays it down in a short sentence. He says:

Recognition of the independence of a revolted state is only lawful when such independence is de facto established. (1 Kent's Commentaries, p. 25, note 1.)

My God, what a commentary on what we have been doing down in Panama! "Established." The meaning of "established" is not left by these great statesmen and writers to any sort of construction; it can not be frittered away by the logic of a man who brings his great powers of learning and logic to defend an indefensible act.

Mr. President, in considering this subject of the preservation of the honor of the country, that honor ought to be so guarded as not to be made liable to suspicion. We have had heretofore great interest in this question of recognizing the independence of another nation. In the case of Texas we had an interest in it directly, a national interest that Texas should be an independent state because we intended to have Texas as a part of the United States.

In a special message in reference to Texas General Jackson says:

It is scarcely to be imagined that a question of this character could be presented in relation to which it would be more difficult for the United States to avoid exciting the suspicion and jealousy of the other powers and maintain their established character for fair and impartial dealing. But on this, as on every trying occasion, safety is to be found in a rigid adherence to principle.

derful; perhaps the strongest nation, taking it in all its parts, that ever existed on earth.

Now, have we gotten to be so great, has all this power been intrusted to us by our Master that we should abuse it like a bully? I fear we are doing it. I fear we have got too large to be just, and the people of the country fear it. Whenever this nation gets too large to be just, it will be too large to be respected by its own citizens.

Mr. President, there is one view of this subject to which attention ought to be called. I am not disputing, I do not contend in anything I have said, that the Government of the United States can not declare war, can not take part in a war that is already originated. But whoever heard that the President of the United States could make war without the authority of Congress?

War is being made, according to the President's own declaration. He is making war on the Republic of Colombia without any authority from Congress, both by the navy and the army, and for the purpose of securing that 10 miles of land through that country. God forbid that Congress or the people of the United States either should ever approve such a war!

On January 4, 1904, the President sent to Congress a special message relating his action in regard to Panama, and justifying it.

THE PANAMA REVOLUTION

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

The President declared that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States had assumed the position of guarantor of the building of the canal and of its peaceful use by all nations.

The enterprise was recognized as responding to an international need; and it would be the veriest travesty on right and justice to treat the governments in possession of the isthmus as having the right, in the language of Mr. Cass, "to close the gates of intercourse on the great highways of the world, and to justify the act by the pretension that these avenues of trade and travel belong to them and that they choose to shut them."

It is plain that no nation could construct and guarantee the neutrality of the canal with a less degree of control than was stipulated for in the Hay-Herran treaty. A refusal to grant such degree of control was necessarily a refusal to make any practicable treaty at all. Such refusal, therefore, squarely raised the question whether Colombia was entitled to bar the transit of the world's traffic across the isthmus.

That the canal itself was eagerly demanded by the people of the locality through which it was to pass, and that the people of this locality no less eagerly longed for its construction under American control, are shown by the unanimity of action in the new Panama Republic. Furthermore, Colombia, after having rejected the treaty in spite of our protests and warnings when it was in her power to accept it, has since shown the utmost eagerness to accept the same treaty if only the status quo could be restored.

I pass by the question as to what assurance we have that they would now keep their pledge and not again refuse to ratify the treaty if they had the power; for, of course, I will not for one moment discuss the possibility of the United States committing an act of such baseness as to abandon the new Republic of Panama.

Although, as the months went by, it became increasingly improbable that the Colombian Congress would ratify the treaty or take steps which would be equivalent thereto, yet all chance for such action on their part did not vanish until the Congress closed at the end of October; and within three days thereafter the revolution in Panama had broken out. Panama became an independent state, and the control of the territory necessary for building the canal then became obtainable. The condition under which alone we could have gone to Nicaragua thereby became impossible of fulfillment. If the pending treaty with Panama should not be ratified by the Senate this would not alter the fact that we could not go to Nicaragua. The Congress has decided the route, and there is no alternative under existing legislation.

It was the opinion of eminent international jurists that, in view of the fact that the great design of our guarantee under the treaty of 1846 was to dedicate the isthmus to the purposes of interoceanic transit; and, above all, to secure the construction of an interoceanic canal, Colombia could not, under existing conditions, refuse to enter into a proper arrangement with the United States to that end without violating the spirit and substantially repudiating the obligations of a treaty the full benefits of which she had enjoyed for over fifty years. My intention was to consult the Congress as to whether, under such circumstances, it solely or even primarily for the purpose of enabling that remnant of the original Republic of Colombia, then resolved into the states of New Granada, Venezuela, and Ecuador, to continue from Bogota to rule over the Isthmus of Panama, is a conception that would in itself be incredible, even if the contrary did not clearly appear. It is true that since the treaty was made the United States has again and again been obliged forcibly to intervene for the preservation of order and the maintenance of an open transit, and that this intervention has usually operated to the advantage of the titular government of Colombia, but it is equally true that the United States in intervening, with or without Colombia's consent, for the protection of the transit, has disclaimed any duty to defend the Colombian Government against domestic insurrection or against the erection of an independent government on the Isthmus of Panama. The attacks against which the United States engaged to protect New Granadian sovereignty were those of foreign powers; but this engagement was only a means to the accomplishment of a yet more important end. The great design of the article was to assure the dedication of the isthmus to the purposes of free and unobstructed interoceanic transit, the consummation of which would be found in an interoceanic canal.

would not be proper to announce that the canal was to be dug forthwith; that we would give the terms that we had offered and no others; and that, if such terms were not agreed to, we would enter into an arrangement with Panama direct, or take what other steps were needful in order to begin the enterprise.

Fortunately, said the President, there was no necessity for this course. The imminent revolution broke out in Panama and solved the problem.

I hesitate to refer to the injurious insinuations which have been made of complicity by this Government in the revolutionary movement in Panama. They are as destitute of foundation as of propriety. The only excuse for my mentioning them is the fear lest unthinking persons might mistake for acquiescence the silence of mere self-respect.

By the unanimous action of its people, without the firing of a shot—with a unanimity hardly before recorded in any similar case—the people of Panama declared themselves an independent republic. Their recognition by this Government was based upon a state of facts in no way dependent for its justification upon our action in ordinary cases. I have not denied, nor do I wish to deny, either the validity or the propriety of the general rule that a new state should not be recognized as independent till it has shown its ability to maintain its independence. This rule is derived from the principle of nonintervention, and, as a corollary of that principle, has generally been observed by the United States. But, like the principle from which it is deduced, the rule is subject to exceptions; and there are, in my opinion, clear and imperative reasons why a departure from it was justified and even required in the present instance. These reasons embrace: first, our treaty rights; second, our national interests and safety; and, third, the interests of collective civilization.

By the treaty of 1846 the United States secured the right to a free and open transit across the Isthmus of Panama, and to that end agreed to guarantee to New Granada her rights of sovereignty and property over that territory. This article is sometimes discussed as if the latter guarantee constituted its sole object and bound the United States to protect the sovereignty of New Granada against domestic revolution. Nothing, however, could be more erroneous than this supposition. That our wise and patriotic ancestors, with all their dread of entangling alliances, would have entered into a treaty with New Granada

By a telegram from Mr. Beaupré, our minister at Bogota, of the 7th of November last, this Government was asked whether it would take action "to maintain Colombian right and sovereignty on the isthmus in accordance with article 35 [of] the treaty of 1846" in case the Colombian Government should be "entirely unable to suppress the secession movement there." Here was a direct solicitation to the United States to intervene for the purpose of suppressing, contrary to the treaty of 1846 as this Government has uniformly construed it, a new revolt against Colombia's authority brought about by her own refusal to permit the fulfillment of the great design for which that treaty was made. It was under these circumstances that the United States, instead of using its forces to destroy those who sought to make the engagements of the treaty a reality, recognized them as the proper custodians of the sovereignty of the isthmus.

This recognition was, in the second place, further justified by the highest considerations of our national interests and safety. In all the range of our international relations I do not hesitate to affirm that there is nothing of greater or more pressing importance than the construction of an interoceanic canal. Long acknowledged to be essential to our commercial development, it has become, as the result of the recent extension of our territorial dominion, more than ever essential to our national self-defence. In the light of our present situation, the establishment of easy and speedy communication by sea between the Atlantic and the Pacific presents itself not simply as something to be desired, but as an object to be positively and promptly attained. Reasons of convenience have been superseded by reasons of vital necessity, which do not admit of indefinite delays.

To such delays the rejection by Colombia of the Hay-Herran treaty directly exposed us. Colombia proposed to us to wait until, by the enforcement of a forfeiture repugnant to the ideas of justice which obtain in every civilized nation, the property and rights of the New Panama Canal Company could be confiscated.

That the attempt to carry out this scheme would have brought Colombia into conflict with the Government of France can not be doubted; nor could the United States have counted upon immunity from the consequences of the attempt, even apart from the indefinite delays to which the construction of the canal was to be subjected. On the first appearance of danger to Colombia this Government would have been summoned to interpose, in order to give effect to the guarantees of the treaty of 1846; and all this in support of a plan which, while characterized in its first stage by the wanton disregard of our own highest interests, was fitly to end in further injury to the citizens of a friendly nation, whose enormous losses in their generous efforts to pierce the isthmus have become a matter of history.

In the third place, I confidently maintain that the recognition of the Republic of Panama was an act justified by the interests of collective civilization. If ever a government could be said to have received a mandate from civilization to effect an object the accomplishment of which was demanded in the interest of mankind, the United States holds that position with regard to the interoceanic canal. Since our purpose to build the canal was definitely announced there have come from all quarters assurances of approval and encouragement, in which even Colombia herself at one time participated; and to general assurances were added specific acts and declarations. In order that no obstacle might stand in our way, Great Britain renounced important rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and agreed to its abrogation, receiving in return nothing but our honorable pledge to build the canal and protect it as an open highway.

In my opinion, no disinterested and fair-minded observer acquainted with the circumstances can fail to feel that Panama had the amplest justification for separation from Colombia under the conditions existing, and, moreover, that its action was in the highest degree beneficial to the interests of the entire civilized world by securing the immediate opportunity for the building of the interoceanic canal. By our prompt and decisive action not only have our interests and those of the world at large been conserved, but we have forestalled complications which were likely to be fruitful in loss to ourselves and in bloodshed and suffering of the people of the isthmus.

Instead of using our forces, as we were invited by Colombia to do, for the twofold purpose of defeating our own rights and interests and the interests of the civilized world, and of compelling the submission of the people of the isthmus to those whom they regarded as oppressors, we shall, as in duty bound, keep the transit open and prevent its invasion. Meanwhile, the only question now before us is that of the ratification of the treaty. For it is to be remembered that a failure to ratify the treaty will not undo what has been done, will not restore Panama to Colombia, and will not alter our obligation to keep the transit open across the isthmus and to prevent any outside power from menacing this transit.

AS the Panama Canal neared completion the sentiment in the United States strengthened that the Government should assert proprietary rights in the great waterway which it was constructing, and establish guaranties of the same in the form of fortifications and discriminations in tolls in favor of American ships.

On January 19, 1911, Hernando D. Money (Mississippi) introduced in the Senate the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Panama Canal should be fortified.

Two days thereafter (January 21, 1911) President Taft, at a dinner of the Pennsylvania Society in New York City, spoke upon the subject as follows:

FORTIFICATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL

PRESIDENT TAFT

I am glad to be here and am glad to know that so much of the energy, the enterprise, and the intelligence of New York has been contributed by the sons of William Penn. William Penn was in favor of peace. So, too, are the men of Pennsylvania. But I assume that they are practical men who do not lose sight of facts and existing conditions in an ecstasy of hope and Utopian enthusiasm.

The Senate ratified the treaty with Panama on February 23, 1904, by a vote of 66 to 14. It went into effect on February 26.

I am going to invite your attention to the question now pending in Congress as to whether the Panama Canal ought to be fortified. I cannot think that any careful person will read the record of historical facts, treaties, and acts of Congress, and diplomatic negotiations without conceding the full right of the United States to fortify the canal. But memories are short, records are not always at hand, and, without in the slightest degree conceding that the existence of the full right of the United States to fortify her own property on the isthmus is in the slightest doubt, I venture, before considering the question of the policy of fortifying the canal, to refer to the history which makes the right incontestable.

In 1850 we made the Clayton-Bulwer treaty with England, which contemplated a canal built by somebody other than the contracting parties and probably by private enterprise across Central America or the Isthmus of Panama. By that treaty we agreed with England that we would neither of us own any part of the land in which the canal was to be built, and we would neither of us fortify it, and we would unite together in guaranteeing its neutrality and would invite the rest of the nations to become parties to the agreement. The canal was not built under that treaty. The French attempted it and failed. We had a Spanish war. The cruise of the Oregon of 12,000 miles along the seacoast of two continents, from San Francisco to Cuba, at a time when the seat of war was in the West Indies fastened the attention of the American people upon the absolute necessity for a canal as a military instrument for doubling the efficiency of our navy and for preventing a division of our forces of defence which might in the future subject us to humiliating defeat. This lesson brought about the effort to modify the Clayton-Bulwer treaty for the very purpose of securing the right on the part of the United States to own the land through which the canal was to be built, to construct the canal itself, and to regain the power to fortify the canal which it had parted with in the treaty of 1850 under other conditions. The correspondence between Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Hay, as well as Mr. Hay's statement to the Senate in transmitting the treaty which was finally ratified, show beyond peradventure that it was recognized by both parties to that treaty, first, that the canal to be built should be one to be built by the United States, to be owned by the United States, to be managed by the United States, and that the neutrality of the canal which was to be maintained, was to be maintained by the United States; second, that nothing in the treaty would prevent the United States from fortifying the canal, and that, in case of war between the United States and England or any other country, nothing in the treaty would prevent the United States from closing the canal to the shipping of an enemy. In the absence of treaty restriction, of course, these rights inhere in the sovereignty of the United States and the control of its own. It is perfectly palpable that this was insisted upon by the Senate, for the reason that one of the main motives in the construction of the canal was the extension of the coast line of the United States through the canal and the use of the canal in time of war as an instrument of defence. The guaranty of neutrality in the treaty is subject, and necessarily subject, to this construction.

The purpose and assertion of the right of the people of the United States to fortify the canal are shown again in the passage of the Spooner Act in 1902 directing the President to build the canal and to make proper defences. The treaty with Panama reaffirms the treaty with England, made in 1900, and expressly gives to the United States the power of fortification. Now, then, can anyone dispute the right of the United States to fortify the canal when the English treaty was amended for the very purpose of regaining it, when it is expressly given in the treaty made with Panama that granted us the land on which to build the canal, and when not a single foreign nation—including in this England, who has made a treaty with us on the subject—has ever seen fit to suggest a lack of power to do that which an act of Congress nine years old directed the President to do, and on the faith of which $500,000,000 are being expended?

The right of the United States to fortify the canal and to close it against the use of an enemy in time of war being established, what should be its policy? We built the canal to help us defend the country; not to help an enemy to attack it. Even if a certain and practical neutralization of the canal by agreement of all nations could be secured to us when engaged in war, an enemy could then use the canal for transit to attack us in both oceans as we propose to use it to defend ourselves. After expending $500,000,000 thus to make our national defence easier, are we to surrender half the military value of the canal by giving the benefit of it to a nation seeking to destroy us? It seems canal would not exceed half a million dollars—an annual insurance rate after first cost of a tenth of 1 per cent.

The case of the Suez Canal furnishes no analogy whatever. In the first place, the Suez Canal is nothing but a ditch in a desert, incapable of destruction, and even when obstructed it can be cleared within a very short time. The Panama Canal, by the destruction of the gate locks, could be put out of commission for two years, and the whole commerce of the world made to suffer therefrom.

Again, the land through which the Suez Canal runs is not in the jurisdiction of England or of any one of the five great powers. Many nations partake in the ownership of the canal, and it is not within the control of any single nation. The circumstances under which the Panama Canal has been building, the ownership of the strip, and one of the main purposes for which it was constructed are very different and make it exactly as if it were a canal cut through the narrow part of Florida. It is on American soil and under American control, and it needs our fortifications for national defence just as much as the city of New York needs fortifications, and there is the additional reason that we ought to have them in order to perform our international obligations.

I yield to no one in my love of peace, in my hatred of war, and in my earnest desire to avoid war. I believe that we have made great strides toward peace within the last decade. No one that I know of goes further in favor of settling international controversies by arbitration than I do and, if I have my way and am able to secure the assent of other powers, I shall submit to the Senate arbitration treaties broader in their terms than any that body has heretofore ratified, and broader than any that now exist between the nations. In laying down my office, I could leave no greater claim to the gratitude of my countrymen than to have secured such treaties. But I can not permit myself, in the enthusiastic desire to secure universal peace, to bind myself to the possibilities of war. We have not reached the time when we can count on the settlement of all international controversies by the arbitration of a tribunal.

I welcome most highly the rapidly increasing ranks of the advocates of peace. They help to form a public opinion of the world that is, with appreciable progress, forcing nations to a settlement of quarrels by negotiation or peace tribunal. When adjudication by arbitral court shall be accepted, the motive for armament will disappear. But we can not hope to bring about such a condition for decades. Meantime, we must face the facts to me that the very statement of the proposition carries its refutation.

But it is said that we ought to defend the canal by our navy. I am not a strategist; I am not a military or a naval expert; but it seems to me as plain as that one and one are two that a navy is for the purpose of defence through offence, for the purpose of protection by attack, and that if we have to retain a part of our navy in order to defend the canal on both sides, then the canal becomes a burden and not an instrument of defence at all. The canal ought to defend itself, and we ought to have fortifications there which will be powerful enough to keep off the navies of any nation that might possibly attack us. I am glad to see that Capt. Alfred Mahan, one of the greatest naval strategists, in a communication to this morning's Tribune, confirms this view.

Again, under our treaty with England and other countries, it is we who guarantee the neutrality of the canal. It is not the other countries that guarantee it to us, and we are bound, if we conform to the treaty with England, to put ourselves in such a condition that we can perform that guaranty. Suppose England is at war with some other country that is not bound to us by treaty rights at all; isn't it essential that we should have fortifications there to protect the canal, not only for our own use and for the world's commerce, but for the use of England and her warships as a means of passage? In other words, we have to preserve that canal as a means of transit to belligerents in time of war as long as we are ourselves not engaged in the controversy.

But it is said that we could induce all the powers to come in and consent to the neutrality of the canal as a treaty obligation. I should be glad to do this if possible; but, even if we do this, can we feel entirely safe by reason of that agreement from a possible injury to the canal by some irresponsible belligerent, at least under conditions as they now are?

Then it is said that the fortifications are going to cost $50,000,000. This is an error. The estimated cost of the fortifications for the canal is $12,000,000. That, I submit, constitutes hardly more than 2 per cent. of the cost of the canal—a first premium for insuring its safety that is not excessive.

It is also said that it will cost $5,000,000 a year to maintain them. This is also an error. I have consulted the War Department, and they advise me that the addition to the annual Government cost of maintenance of fortifications and military establishment in time of peace due to the fortifications of the and see conditions as they are. Some earnest advocates of peace weaken their advocacy by failing to do this. War is still a possibility; and a President, a Senator, a Congressman who ignores it as something against which proper precautions should be taken subjects himself in time of peace to the just criticism of all reasonable men, and, when war comes and finds the nation unprepared, to the unanimous condemnation of his indignant fellow countrymen.

FORTIFICATION OF THE CANAL

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 25-27, 1911

On February 25 James A. Tawney [Minn.] moved in the House, in connection with a general appropriation bill, an appropriation to enable the President to ascertain whether or not the principal maritime powers were willing to unite with us in a convention or treaty whereby they will be bound not only not to injure or destroy the canal themselves, but to aid us in protecting it against any nation which might declare its purpose to do so.

He spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, if it were desirable to invite the nations of the world to destroy the Panama Canal, no better method of extending that invitation could be adopted than to fortify it. We will thereby say to the world that we will insure and protect the neutrality of the canal so long as we deem it necessary or convenient to do so. But when we no longer deem the neutralization of the canal necessary to our interests we will be prepared to violate our solemn treaty obligations with other nations by terminating the neutrality of the canal. In proof of this statement, let me read from the testimony of General Leonard Wood:

But, as I look at it, one thing is certain. We shall build the canal and maintain it for the use of all countries in time of peace and control it in time of war as our safety and interests demand.

This declaration of purpose, coming from Lieutenant-General Wood, Chief of Staff, when read in the light of our solemn treaty obligations with Great Britain, contained in article 3 of that treaty, which says that "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules"—that is, the rules governing the neutralization prescribed in the treaty—discloses a national purpose in respect to our relations with the other nations of the world more in keeping with the diplomatic policies of nations during the Middle Ages than with the high standard of national honor which all nations now profess and endeavor to follow. [Applause.]

In my judgment and, I believe, in the judgment of the great majority of the American people who have not been hypnotized by the policy of militarism, it would be far better for us to rely upon the material interest which every nation in the world has in maintaining the integrity of the canal and protecting it than to construct fortifications for that purpose. If we can not rely for the protection of the canal and its neutrality upon the honor and good faith of the nations for whose benefit the American people, at a cost of $400,000,000, have constructed it, then we can not protect the canal and its neutrality with fortifications.

The attempt, which is the purpose of my amendment, should at least be made before embarking upon a policy which will necessitate a perpetual annual charge upon our people, one that will grow more burdensome as time goes by, and one that may make it necessary in the future to construct additional fortifications and to maintain permanently on the canal zone an army three times the size of the army now proposed, for no man can predict, once we have embarked upon the policy of fortifying the canal, the extent to which these fortifications may be enlarged and extended in the future.

I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be agreed to. If it is, the President will then have an opportunity to ascertain whether the nations of the world are willing, in consideration of the enormous expense the American people have incurred in the construction of the canal for their benefit, to give bond that they will not under any circumstances interfere with the right of the United States to prescribe rules and regulations for the use of the canal, and that they will not, intentionally or otherwise, injure or attempt to destroy it. [Applause.]

Swagar Sherley (Kentucky) replied to Mr. Tawney.

Let the gentlemen who talk about neutrality being observed point to the instances where there has been any real punishment of a nation that has seen fit to violate neutrality. Has Japan been punished by any of the great nations for her violation of fleet. If we had the canal fortified what was left of the fleet could go into that canal, could join the Atlantic fleet or the Atlantic fleet could come through as a reinforcement. But what would you have as a result of the neutrality? The destruction of your fleet would mean instant seizure of the canal, and, bear in mind this, in regard to paying the penalty for violation of neutralization, what will it weigh according to the advantage that would come to the enemy by the seizure of such property as the Panama Canal? The seizure and successful holding of that canal would be sufficient to force this country into terms of peace, and bigger than any danger that it might suffer hereafter in the way of punishment would be the advantage it gained by its possession. Gentlemen, it is resting upon an idle dream to hope that when the stress of war comes nations will be so restrained as not to take advantage of the tremendous temptation that would be held out to them by the non-fortification of this canal. Better abandon the fortification of your seacoast and ask of the world that it enter into agreement to make neutral in time of war your coasts, because practically you have created now a most important coast line of America. [Loud applause.]

On February 27 General J. Warren Keifer (Ohio) spoke in the House against fortification of the canal.

The 1907 Hague Peace Conference adopted rules of war and regulations to govern the rights and duties of neutralized places, which severally prohibit bombardment of undefended ports, neutral territory, and neutral waters, or the commission of other acts which would be a violation of neutralization or which would result in the destruction or seizure of any property of the enemy in time of war, save when imperatively necessary.

These rules and regulations were signed severally by 42 of the powers of the world, the United States heading the list, Russia, Japan, England, France, Germany, Austria, Spain, Argentina, Colombia, and Brazil, and all other great powers being among the number. The United States later, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, ratified all these rules and regulations, and President Taft, February 28, 1910, proclaimed them of binding force—

"to be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof."

It will be seen that, without treaty guaranties of neutralization, if the canal is undefended all the powers of the world are the treaty obligations in regard to Manchuria? Has Austria-Hungary been punished for the violation of the treaty agreements in regard to the Balkan States? Do you suppose that Belgium's neutrality would have been preserved during the Franco-Prussian War if it had not been for the show of force made by Belgium herself? Is Switzerland maintaining an army for nothing? Her neutrality has been guaranteed. It may be that in the far distant future the time will come when international agreements may be observed without any other force than the moral one that should sustain them, but there is nothing in the past history of the world that warrants the assumption that that time is now. Talk about cost! What folly it is, after having expended four hundred odd millions of dollars, to hesitate to spend a few more to protect what is practically a new coast line of America! [Applause.]

Let nobody be deceived by the comparison of the Panama with the Suez Canal. If England did not depend for her position upon having a navy equal to that of any other two nations, she would not be so secure or content in regard to the neutralization of the Suez Canal. Bear in mind, also, that the Suez Canal in its geographical relation is not of prime importance to England. Bear in mind, also, that she is protecting the entrances there, but remember that Panama is right at our door. What means neutrality as gentlemen construe it? It means one of two things: That in case of war between America and another country either the canal shall be closed to both countries or open to both. Have we spent this money in vain? Have we made possible the passage of our fleet from one ocean to the other and then when the need for that passage comes will we agree that it shall not take place except with the long, impossible trip around the Horn? Or take the other proposition: that the canal shall be kept open to both belligerents. Shall we throw away all of our advantage; shall we give to the attacking enemy the right to come through that canal; and, if it had the right to come through it, do you believe it would hesitate to seize it? What would matter the violation of neutrality compared with the possession of one of the greatest assets of the nation?

Mr. TAWNEY.—A fleet would have to go there before it could enter there and three and one-half miles off the shore belongs to the world.

Mr. SHERLEY.—What does that mean, that it has to go there? It means that practically you have got to have a fleet in both oceans. But suppose you have a fleet in the Pacific Ocean and the war is with an enemy in the Pacific and it defeats your solemnly bound not to fire upon or destroy it, even in time of war in which the United States is a party. The moral force as well as the binding character of these rules and regulations insures their observance.

The policy of the United States, at least since Monroe's Administration, should be respected. Presidents, Secretaries of State, statesmen and patriots, Senators and Representatives have, in unbroken line, favored complete neutralization of any isthmian canal.

The Presidents and great statesmen from Monroe to President Taft did not regard international neutralization treaties as infringing the Monroe Doctrine.

No instance during that time will be found where the right to neutralize the canal when built was opposed, or the right of the United States to fortify it was advocated, unless, possibly, by a very small minority of Senators during the proceedings to ratify the Hay-Pauncefote treaties, and they hardly went so far as to favor such right.

The strongest reason, however, even stronger, if possible, than the treaty obligations, is the strategic importance to the United States of neutralizing the Panama Canal in case it is engaged in war. In that event it would not have to defend the canal; its safety would be guaranteed beyond peradventure; its revenues and that of its auxiliary railroad would not be interrupted; our army and navy would be free to pass and re-pass through it and to operate when and where needed; the great expense for fortifications, harbors, naval stations, dry-docks for our navy, and the like, and for additions to the army and navy of the United States, including a substantial increase of officers and men, also battleships, and for other necessary offensive and defensive war preparations and for the cost of sanitation; for transports to continuously carry supplies, and for other expenses of maintenance and the keeping of the canal and its auxiliary railroad on a continuous war footing, would also be saved.

To close the canal, in time of war, to other nations or to the enemy would secure no advantage, nor would any strategic advantage be lost to the United States by keeping it open. If the enemy had a fleet in Atlantic waters, we would meet him there, and if in Pacific waters we would meet him there, and if he had a divided fleet, one in each ocean, we would concentrate our warships and beat him in detail.

If we fortify the canal, we must maintain an army of occupation of great strength at its ends and on its line, likewise fleets of ships to support the army, and, if the canal should not be held, it would be lost to the United States. In time of war the United States will need its military and naval forces elsewhere.

But by no possibility would the canal be lost to the United States if neutralized, not even by defeat in war. A treaty of neutralization is never broken, and its guarantors would enforce it; and should it, by any possibility, be violated they would require ample indemnity.

The Panama Canal was designed to promote commerce, not war. In the century of discussion over the practicability and necessity of connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by a canal across the Isthmus not a suggestion has been made, until very recently, either by a President or statesman, that such canal should be built as a necessary war measure. As commerce does not flourish in war times, neutralization has always been insisted on to preserve commerce in time of war as in time of peace. It has been a promise to the civilized world ever since a canal across the Isthmus of Panama was thought practicable that it should, in perpetuity, be neutralized—kept open and free to the ships and flags of all nations "in time of war as in time of peace."

The Republic of the United States, with all its boasted Christian civilization, should be the last to break this sacred promise.

The duty of the United States to neutralize the canal is both of obligation and interest.

It should be neutralized for strategic as well as economic reasons and to promote peace on earth.

On March 15, 1912, William C. Adamson (Georgia) introduced in the House a bill to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal. It was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

It was reported by Mr. Adamson from the committee on March 16. He thus explained the provision in regard to tolls (section 5).

NO DISCRIMINATION IN CANAL TOLLS

MAJORITY REPORT OF HOUSE COMMITTEE ON PANAMA CANAL

This section requires that tolls shall be imposed and operate uniformly without preference or discrimination upon all vessels of all peoples and all nations, except vessels belonging to the Government of Panama and the Government of the United

tion of that part of the treaty, the majority of the committee recommend uniform tolls for reasons which they regard as good and sufficient. First, the financial success of the canal is of prime importance, and its operation is the main object of this bill. Financial returns in the beginning are in doubt.

The majority of the committee believe that for the first few years it is right and just to open the canal and demonstrate what the financial returns will be and what success we will realize in securing and handling traffic before taking up the question of exempting any vessels. We also believe that in opening so vast an enterprise we have that right in order to justify its construction and existence by operating it for a while untrammelled and unshackled by any other issues and interests. We love the American flag and desire the prosperity of American shipping. Most of us disapprove of the methods by which our foreign shipping was driven from the ocean, but Congress is here always and can adopt methods to restore the shipping without hampering the canal operation with that problem. If American ships need the aid of Government, either in foreign or coastwise trade, it ought to be considered as an independent proposition, entirely divorced from the canal subject, so as to avoid all embarrassment in the management of that great project. It is neither fair nor wise to attach the proposition as a condition of canal operation, when separate bills can deal with the matter at any time, expressing the will of Congress much more fairly and distributing the assistance provided by extending it to all coastwise ships rather than by limiting it to the small per cent. of them which will go through the canal. We found from the hearings that the coastwise ships which will pass through the canal do not need the remission of the tolls.

Some promoters and speculators, tickling the cupidity of financiers who wish to finance new enterprises, are willing to build new ships provided the Government, in advance, will assure them bounty or subsidy to the amount of the tolls. Not satisfied with that and the advantages of an exclusive monopoly of the coastwise business, they suggest still other concessions and gratuities from the Government, and have sent out flashing prospectuses of the immense profit promised by the operation of their new ships by the grace of the Government through preferential tolls, and solicit subscriptions for stock with assurances of tremendous dividends. Several companies are already doing an extensive coastwise business with a large number of ships, and some of them are building additional ships. They are all prosperous. Many of their ships will use the canal to the full extent States, which include those of the Panama Railroad, all the stock of which is owned by the Government of the United States. These exceptions are made because the "United States enjoys all the rights incident to construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal." As such it is entitled to all the benefits and profits resulting from ownership and operation thereof. As tolls paid out of the common treasury would instantly return to the same common treasury, such performance would be entirely useless, and in the exercise of common sense will be omitted. We charge other vessels because it is our canal and our service. We pass those belonging to our own Government free because the canal belongs to the Government. The ship and the tolls also belong to the Government. The exemption covers the ships belonging to the Government of Panama because, under the facts and the terms of the treaty with her, which by our treaties with Great Britain we were authorized to make, she became a quasi party to the construction and operation.

While many members of our committee believe that by the terms of our treaties with Great Britain we are prevented from allowing preferential or free tolls to ships of American registry, either coastwise or foreign, the majority of the committee voting for uniform tolls authorize and request the statement—positive, plain, and unequivocal—that no language of this section was chosen or used for the purpose of foreclosing discussion and differing opinions on that question. They authorize the express affirmation that this provision is adopted for present use, disclaiming all intention to declare in this section any construction of the language of the treaty or to establish any precedent or permanent legislative policy or to bind any future Congress should it be deemed expedient or adjudged competent to adopt a different basis. This statement of the committee may be clearly understood by reference to the original and committee prints of the bill, from which the committee adopting this section eliminated all reference to treaties. The language beginning on page 6 with the words "No preference shall be given," etc., which has been criticized as an attempt to construe the treaty and thereby estop us from future consideration of the question, was not quoted from the treaty at all, but was taken from bills introduced by advocates of free or preferential tolls. One containing the same language has been introduced by the leading champion and signer of the minority views [Mr. Knowlton]. Not deeming it necessary at this time nor for this purpose to make a legislative declaration as to the construc-justified by the traffic, and there will never be wanting ships to do the business if traffic invites. The shortening of distance and time of voyages will insure such reduction in coast-to-coast freight rates as to render the small toll charges we authorize immaterial as affecting competition by the transcontinental railroads or by the Magellan or Cape Horn route unless the coastwise ships themselves keep up the freight rates through the canal. In that event the tolls would alike be immaterial. The operators of coastwise ships and ship lines are very shifty and discreet. They have an eye ever open to the main chance, just like foreign ships and interstate railroads. Of course, it is purely by accident and through inadvertence that they never get in one another's way. Although human, they would scorn combinations. In fact, combinations are unnecessary as well as bad. But these ship companies somehow contrive that lines grow up between certain ports and other lines grow up between other ports, each route between two ports being served by a different line of ships from those running between two other ports, so that it is very rare that any two ports are embarrassed by having to choose between two lines or two ships competing for their business. It is even said that sometimes an irresistible longing arises, spontaneous, it is true, but almost as unerring as if by compulsion, to limit the patronage of the business men of a port to a particular line without encouraging any other. These companies frankly admit that the same courtesy and prudence will be observed among them as to running ships through the Panama Canal.

We further believe that, whether a governmental gratuity is considered as a charity to an unprofitable and dying business or as a bounty to prosperous shipping, the Government should in fairness treat all of the same class alike. All interstate coastwise ships are important. The cities of the Atlantic coast interchange more business with one another than will ever go through both the Panama and the Suez Canals. More business now passes through the Soo Canal between the Great Lakes than will ever patronize both the Panama and the Suez Canals. The coastwise traffic between the Pacific coast cities that will never pass through the canal at all is very important. Ninety per cent. of the coastwise ships, busy all the time in interstate business, will never approach the canal at all. Less than 10 per cent. of all these coastwise ships will use the canal, making longer journeys, charging correspondingly more freight and passenger rates, and making infinitely more money, yet it is selfishly demanded that those few ships (for only a few will be needed) shall be given their tolls in the interests of interstate trade, while the 90 per cent. rendering service just as valuable in interstate commerce would not participate in the contribution. When we go to voting away the Government's money and credit to special interests, we prefer some method more fair and equitable. This small shipping interest has secured indorsements and recommendations from some trade organizations in various coast cities of the country on the erroneous theory that shippers would secure the benefits of the remitted tolls through reduced freight rates. This is a delusion, pure and simple, as we have already shown. It is also demonstrated by history, observation, and experience. But suppose the shippers did not secure the benefit of the remitted tolls. They would not and could not pass it to their customers. It would be impossible of division, apportionment, and distribution among them. Being impossible, it is admittedly never attempted. Only a small per cent. of the American people will ship freight in considerable quantities through the canal. It is a catchy phrase, plausible, sophistical, and misleading, that "we can use our canal for our own benefit," which is the slogan of the small special interest demanding preferential tolls.

In principle and theory the Government and the people are identical and their interests the same. But the 1 per cent. or less of our population financially interested in ships can hardly be regarded as identical with the whole people nor the sole beneficiaries of the treasury. All the people own the treasury, and the treasury may be replenished by compulsory contributions from all the people. We may rightfully appropriate from the treasury for the benefit of all the people, but giving public funds to special interests would be an unauthorized diversion, and in politics and morals amount to a misappropriation of the people's money. But it is said that it is so easy just to remit the tolls before they go into the treasury. It amounts to the same thing as taking it out of the treasury, where all the tolls belong, and we should not divert any from going in. It is different from prohibitory tariff protection which establishes a condition for transacting business. It is different from excluding foreign competition from the coastwise trade, practiced, not for the reason that, incidentally, it helps to enrich shipowners, but in the interests of sound public policy, not always, however, realized, that aliens should not operate in our domestic commerce and become familiar with our internal affairs. That exclusion also stops with making a condition for highly profitable business. But the remission or refunding of tolls means

We are neither required nor authorized to use the canal nor its operation as a pretext to attempt the regulation of the commerce of the world nor meddle with any details or conditions of trade away from the canal. There are other methods of dealing with all other subjects. The highest authorities among the advocates of Government aid to domestic ships have recognized that fact by recommending that tolls be collected and refunded, and bills have been introduced for the purpose of refunding its tolls. Let those bills be considered as separate propositions. The only parties as yet to the treaties under which the canal is being constructed are Great Britain, the Republic of Panama, and the United States. If, under the treaty, our ships can be allowed preferential tolls, the other two parties to the treaties will claim similar consideration. If, as we believe, the treaties do not permit such treatment, it is highly probable that both England and Panama would consent to such modification as would permit it. The territory of Panama, as that of Canada, extends from coast to coast, just as in our own case, and both Canada and Panama have coastwise trade and coastwise vessels. With such a modification it would be possible, if our Government wished to inaugurate such an unfair system—that is, unfair to our own citizens—to adopt preferential tolls on such terms as may be provided by the modified treaty. Then the great majority of the ships of the world could and would, easily and promptly, enter the coastwise trade of Canada, the United States, or Panama. As coastwise ships are not prohibited from extending their activities into the foreign trade, the ships of these three countries would immediately monopolize the use of the canal and it would automatically become a free canal. There would be no competing ships to pay the tolls. It may be interesting to note that when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was pending in the Senate, December 13, 1900, the following amendment was proposed:

"Strike out article 3 and substitute 'The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.'"

The amendment was rejected on roll call—yeas 27, nays 43.

Those who demand this preference make protestations of patriotism and love for the flag loud and profuse, but those professions are all that they offer for the largess demanded, and experience demonstrates that they would do business under a foreign flag just as readily if more profits were guaranteed thereby. The demand for discrimination in favor of American taking money already ascertained to belong to all the people and giving it to a favored few. It is also urged that remission should be allowed because it is apprehended that some foreign nations may pay tolls for their ships. We can not understand how that can affect the coastwise ships at all, inasmuch as no foreign ship can participate in the coastwise trade. At once the most plausible and most erroneous contention is, that the canal being an American waterway it would be a departure from our traditional policy of free waterways if we should charge tolls for coastwise ships. Based on false premises, that argument proves too much. If the canal is a purely domestic waterway we should not charge tolls to any vessel. There is no discrimination in the use of American waterways. Ships of all nationalities may use them alike. The Panama Canal is in a foreign country; we secured by treaties with two foreign countries our authority to construct and operate the canal with certain limitations and conditions, and we must act within these bounds.

It is urged that the stipulations for equality do not prevent preference for coastwise ships, because they are not in competition with foreign ships, which can not enter coastwise trade. In effect, the argument is that, being already protected against competition, one discrimination in their favor demands another. Being protected against all competition, they would be also exempt from tolls and place in their coffers the amount saved thereby. We think the treaty stipulations for equality of treatment mean treatment at the canal and nothing else. It is limited to "conditions and charges of traffic," which "conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable." By that stipulation we are bound to levy such charges and establish and maintain such conditions of traffic at the canal as in those respects only will maintain it "free and open without discrimination in these respects."

We are not permitted to consider discrimination made in other respects and elsewhere in connection with the shipping of any country, but are bound by the language and intent of the treaties to preserve fairness and equality without discrimination in respect of "conditions and charges of traffic" at the canal; therefore, the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332), relied on by the advocates of preferential tolls, can have no application to the situation with which we are dealing. Whether two ships of diverse nationality are treated alike or differently in the home ports of either can have no effect or bearing on our treaty obligations to treat them both alike at the canal as to charges and conditions of traffic.

ships presents a square issue between a small fraction of the coastwise shipping interests and the entire population of the United States. The question which our committee decides in the negative, practically and substantially stated, is: Shall we, as representatives of the people, take from them, without consideration, return, or recompense, their money and give it to the small special interests operating but a small per cent. of the coastwise trade, who have no right to the money and do not need it, as their business is prosperous—certainly do not need it more than the other 90 per cent. of the coastwise trade against whom the discrimination in refusing to divide the subsidy with them would be as gross as the discrimination claimed against the people who, in the aggregate, are as patriotic as those few claiming preference?

On March 21 Joseph R. Knowland (California), who had introduced a bill providing for no tolls to American ships, submitted the minority report of the committee.

NO TOLLS FOR AMERICAN SHIPS

MINORITY REPORT OF HOUSE COMMITTEE ON PANAMA CANAL

Firmly convinced that the United States has the right to relieve American ships engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of toll charges through the Panama Canal, the undersigned members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce dissent from the report accompanying House bill 21969 submitted by the majority of the committee.

The minority enters an emphatic protest against the abandonment in this bill of our historic policy of free commercial intercourse between the States. This great canal, built for the American people by American money, genius, and enterprise, should be forever a free and untrammelled competing route with transportation by land. We can not emphasize too strongly the elementary proposition that tolls levied upon vessels engaged in commerce between our Eastern and Western seaboard increase the amount the transcontinental railroads may charge for the same service. If a vessel en route from San Francisco to New York through the canal were required to pay $10,000 in tolls, the transcontinental railroads would largely be the beneficiaries. This question affects every ton of domestic freight that passes through the canal and every ton that is carried across the country by the railroads.

The talk of "subsidizing" the shipping interests at the expense of the American people is mere sophistry and only begets the issue. The tolls imposed at the canal would be added to the freight and paid by the American people who consume the commodities. We hold this proposition to be fundamental; and, viewed in this light, free tolls to our coastwise trade would not be a subsidy to shipowners, but a concession to the American people. Free tolls at the Panama Canal to our coastwise trade would be the same kind of a "subsidy" that was granted to 41,000,000 tons of shipping that passed through the Soo Canal in 1911. It is true that we levy no tolls upon Canadian vessels using the Soo Canal, but that is because American vessels are accorded the same treatment by the Canadian Government at the Welland Canal. By virtue of a reciprocal arrangement we receive our quid pro quo for passing Canadian vessels through the Soo Canal free of charge. We disclaim any antipathy against the railroads, but insist that this initial legislation for the government and management of the Panama Canal shall not take money from the pockets of the American people and give it to the great corporations that have already been munificently treated by the Federal Government.

We can not too strongly protest against the following language contained in section 5 of the bill:

"No preference shall be given nor discrimination shown, directly or indirectly, to the vessels if any nation, its citizens or subjects, other than vessels belonging to the Government of the United States (including those belonging to the Panama Railroad Company) and the Government of the Republic of Panama observing the rules and regulations of the Panama Canal."

This language amounts virtually to an interpretation in advance of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty adverse to the contention that this Government can, directly or indirectly, favor American shipping through an American waterway upon which we are expending over $400,000,000.

The report of the majority in an attempt to explain away this objectionable language, disclaims that it was intended to thus construe the treaty. Regardless of the existence of intent we submit that the language is capable of no other interpretation. It is also argued that no future Congress would be bound. Directing attention to the fact that this is practically an admission that the language is as objectionable as charged, but acknowledging that it might not bind a future Congress, it is evident that, if a controversy arose between this nation and a foreign power involving an interpretation of the treaty, this

"I am confident that the United States has the power to relieve from the payment of tolls any part of our shipping that Congress deems wise. We own the canal. It was our money that built it. We have the right to charge tolls for its use. Those tolls must be the same to every one, but, when we are dealing with our own ships, the practice of many Governments of subsidizing their own merchant vessels is so well established in general that a subsidy equal to the tolls, as equivalent remission of tolls, cannot be held to be a discrimination in the use of the canal. The practice in the Suez Canal makes this clear."

The Secretary of War [Henry L. Stimson], in his last annual report, is no less outspoken when he declares:

"Involved in the problem of fixing tolls is the question whether the United States has the right under the treaty to pay the tolls on American vessels using the canal. An examination of the treaty and the surrounding circumstances, to my mind, leaves no doubt as to the right of the United States, both legally and morally, to pay the tolls on its vessels. This is a perfectly recognized practice in respect to the tolls of the Suez Canal, the toll rules of which canal were adopted by the United States in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for the government of the Panama Canal. At least one of our national competitors in the use of the Panama Canal—Spain—has already taken steps to provide for the payment out of her national treasury of the Panama tolls on one of the Spanish lines which will use that canal. Furthermore, I can see no difference, save in form (provided the tolls for other nations are kept reasonable, as we have also covenanted to do), whether the United States should make this appropriation out of her own treasury to American vessels, by receiving the toll money from them first and repaying it to them, or by simply relieving them from the payment of tolls in the first place."

The minority disagrees entirely with the view of the majority that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty makes it impossible for Congress to prefer our own vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. That portion of article 3 of the treaty which it is claimed would be violated by preferring our coastwise trade reads:

"The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

It is manifest, from the reading of the treaty, that its purpose was to prevent discrimination against other nations. That language would be cited to prove that the Congress of the United States has itself so interpreted the treaty and thus voluntarily surrendered every commercial advantage and proprietary right incident to the construction of this waterway. As an additional excuse it is charged that, in the bill introduced by "the leading champion and signer of the minority views" the same language was used. This statement is incorrect, as could have been easily ascertained by comparing the bills. The bill of the gentleman from California excepted all vessels of the United States (not Government vessels only), and specifically provided for free tolls for American ships in the coastwise trade. This is a matter of public record.

While disclaiming any intention to interpret the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in favor of foreign shipping interests, the majority report proceeds to call attention to the rejection of an amendment offered in the Senate when the treaty was pending reserving to the United States the right to discriminate in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade. It is a matter of record that this amendment, offered by Senator Bard, of California, was rejected by a vote of 27 yeas and 43 nays. On the same day, however, an amendment was offered reserving the right to the United States to protect said canal in any way it might deem proper. This amendment was rejected on roll call, yeas 27, nays 44, and this was the fate of several other amendments similarly reserving to the United States the right to fortify the canal. It is unnecessary to call attention to the fact that fortifications are now being constructed. With further reference to the Bard amendment we have been granted authority to quote from a letter recently written by Senator Bard, in the course of which he states:

"When my amendment was under consideration it was generally conceded by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line, and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce, forbidding the discrimination in charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade, and this conviction contributed to the defeat of the amendment."

We contend that our right to favor our own shipping in the matter of canal tolls can not be seriously questioned. The minority is not forced to offer profuse apologies for its position. The message of President Taft sent to Congress in December has the true American ring, and clearly states the case. These are the President's words:

free tolls to our coastwise vessels would not discriminate against the vessels of other countries becomes apparent when we reflect that under our navigation laws foreign vessels are prohibited from engaging in our coastwise trade. That being true, it is of no concern to foreign nations, their citizens or subjects what treatment we accord to our coastwise trade.

Foreign nations have not considered that they were violating the rules for the neutralization of the Suez Canal by rebating tolls to vessels flying their own flag. The contemporaneous construction that the powers signatory to the convention of Constantinople have given that instrument supports the position of the minority that we have a perfect right under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to favor our domestic shipping; and, if we have the right to collect the tolls at the canal and repay them, we certainly have the right to remit them in the first instance. It is unnecessary to resort to a device or subterfuge in order to do indirectly what we have a right to do directly.

It will be observed that the treaty provides that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality," yet this bill expressly reserves the right of the United States Government to pass its own ships of war through the canal without the payment of any tolls. We confess our inability to see the logic or consistency of the position of the majority that free tolls to ships of commerce would be a violation of the treaty, but that free tolls to ships of war would not be a violation of the treaty. The majority seek to justify the right to exempt war vessels of the United States from the payment of tolls under that clause of the treaty which provides that—

"the United States enjoys all the rights incident to construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."

Under any fair construction of the treaty, however, this language must be considered in connection with the rules that are adopted in the treaty for the regulation and management of the canal. In other words, under the treaty the United States enjoys all the rights incident to the construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal, subject, however, to the rules therein provided for its regulation and management. These rules, as we have already seen, provide that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality. If this language was intended to prevent preferring our own vessels, it must apply equally to both vessels of commerce and vessels of war. Such a construction is inconsistent with the very purpose of the canal which was conceived primarily as a military necessity.

The majority dismissed the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332) with the remark that it has no application to the situation with which we are dealing, notwithstanding an examination of the case would have disclosed that, on the question of discrimination, it is on all fours with the subject we are now considering. In that case the treaty with Great Britain provided that—

"no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States."

The court held that this treaty was not violated by either the Texas statute or the Revised Statutes of the United States, section 4444, exempting coastwise steam vessels from the payment of pilotage charges. In that connection, speaking for the court, Mr. Justice White, now Chief Justice, said:

"Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel, coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that 'no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.' Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of the vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that, because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even though such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign."

If a treaty with Great Britain providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States" is not violated by an exemption in favor of our own vessels engaged in coastwise trade from payment of pilotage charges, it must necessarily follow that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would not be violated by a similar exemption of our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls at the Panama Canal.

The Panama Canal is being built on territory which was purchased by the Government of the United States. We will expend in its construction upward of $400,000,000, and are obligated by treaty to pay the Republic of Panama in perpetuity the sum of $250,000 annually. We occupy the position of sovereign proprietor of the canal and the Canal Zone, a relation that none of the nine powers signatory to the convention of Constantinople sustained with reference to the Suez Canal. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty should be construed in the light of these facts, and when so construed the minority can not escape the conclusion that in signing, ratifying, and proclaiming this treaty to the world we were merely agreeing to the terms and conditions upon which the United States, the sovereign owner of the canal, would permit its use by the other nations of the world, its citizens or subjects.

While disclaiming any intention of construing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the majority in the report that accompanies this bill iterate and reiterate their belief that the treaty renders preference to our coastwise trade impossible. The minority believe in the religious observance of our treaty obligations as essential to the maintenance of our own self-respect and the confidence and friendly regard of other nations; but we refuse to assent to the mere suggestion, to say nothing of the bold declaration, that by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we have, without consideration, bartered away to a foreign nation the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce between the United States and encourage the upbuilding and growth of our domestic shipping.

The bill came up for discussion on May 16 and was exhaustively debated along the lines marked out by the opposing committee reports until May 23, when it came to a vote. On May 18 Frank E. Doremus (Michigan) moved to substitute for section 5 one authorizing the President "to prescribe and from time to time change the tolls," and forbidding tolls to be levied upon "vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States." This amendment was passed on May 23 by a vote of 147 to 127. The bill was then passed.

The bill was even more extensively discussed in the Senate than it had been in the House. It came to a vote on August 9. An amendment offered by James A. Reed (Missouri) to the effect that ships in the coastwise trade which were controlled by a person or company doing business in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and its supplementary legislation should be debarred from the canal was adopted by a vote of 35 to 28. An amendment offered by Jonathan Bourne (Oregon) to the effect that ships of lines controlled by railroads with which the lines would compete if not so controlled should be debarred from the canal was then adopted by a vote of 36 to 25. Then Elihu Root (New York) moved to strike out the provision of no tolls on American coastwise ships. The motion was rejected without division. The bill was passed as amended by a vote of 47 to 15.

The House disagreed with the Senate amendments and a conference was appointed which made its report on August 14, accepting the Reed and Bourne amendments. The report was agreed to in the Senate on August 16 by a vote of 48 to 18. On August 17 the House agreed to the report without division. President Taft signed the bill on August 24, 1912.

INTRODUCTION

THE DOCTRINE OF EQUALITY AND THE RACE PROBLEM¹

SO far as the institution of slavery is concerned—in its relations to ownership and property in those of the human species—I have seen no reason whatever to revise or in any way to alter the theories and principles which I entertained when I entered Harvard in 1853, and in the maintenance of which I subsequently bore arms between 1861 and 1865. Economically, socially, and from the point of view of abstract political justice, I hold that the institution of slavery, as it existed in this country prior to the year 1865, was in no respect either desirable or justifiable. That it had its good and even its elevating side, so far at least as the African is concerned, I shall not deny. On the contrary, I see and recognize those features of the institution far more clearly now than I should have said would have been possible in 1853. That the institution in itself, under conditions then existing, tended to the elevation of the less advanced race I frankly admit I did not then think. On the other hand, that it exercised a most pernicious influence upon those of the more advanced race, and especially upon that large majority of the more ad-were not only fundamentally wrong, but further involved a problem in the presence of which I confess to-day I stand appalled.

It is said, whether truthfully or not, that, when some years ago John Morley, the English writer and thinker, returned to England after a visit to this country, he remarked that the African race question, as now existing in the United States, presented a problem as nearly, to his mind, insoluble as any human problem well could be. I do not care whether Lord Morley made this statement or did not make it. I am prepared, however, to say that, individually, so far as my present judgment goes, it is a correct presentation. To us in the North, the African is a comparatively negligible factor. So far as Massachusetts, for instance, or the city of Boston more especially, is concerned, as a problem it is solving itself. Proportionately the African infusion is there becoming less—never large, it is incomparably less now than it was in the days of my own youth. Thus manifestly a negligible factor, it is also one tending to extinction. Indeed, it would be fairly open to question whether a single Afro-American of unmixed Ethiopian descent could now be found in Boston. That the problem presents itself with a wholly different aspect in Carolina is manifest. The difference too is radical; it goes to the heart of the mystery.

As I have already said, the universal "melting-pot" theory in vogue in my youth was that but seven or, at the most, fourteen years were required to convert the alien immigrant—no matter from what region or of what descent—into an American citizen. The educational influences and social environment were assumed to be not only subtle but all-pervasive and powerful. That this theory was to a large and even dangerous extent erroneous the observation of the last fifty years has proved, and our Massachusetts experience is sadly demonstrating it to-day. It was Oliver Wendell Holmes who, years ago, when asked by an anxious mother at what age the education of a child ought to begin, remarked in reply that it should begin about one hundred and fifty years before the child is born. It has so proved with us; vanced race who were not themselves owners of slaves—of that I have become with time even more and more satisfied. The noticeable feature, however, so far as I individually am concerned, has been the entire change of view as respects certain of the fundamental propositions at the base of our whole American political and social edifice brought about by a more careful and intelligent ethnological study. I refer to the political equality of man, and to that race absorption to which I have alluded—that belief that any foreign element introduced into the American social system and body politic would speedily be absorbed therein, and in a brief space thoroughly assimilated. In this all-important respect I do not hesitate to say we theorists and abstractionists of the North, throughout that long anti-slavery discussion which ended with the 1861 clash of arms, were thoroughly wrong. In utter disregard of fundamental scientific facts, we theoretically believed that all men—no matter what might be the color of their skin or the texture of their hair—were, if placed under exactly similar conditions, in essentials the same. In other words, we indulged in the curious and, as is now admitted, utterly erroneous theory that the African was, so to speak, an Anglo-Saxon, or, if you will, a Yankee, "who had never had a chance,"—a fellow-man who was guilty, as we chose to express it, of a skin not colored like our own. In other words, though carved in ebony, he also was in the image of God.

Following out this theory, under the lead of men to whom scientific analysis and observation were anathema if opposed to accepted cardinal political theories as enunciated in the Declaration of Independence as read by them, the African was not only emancipated, but, so far as the letter of the law, as expressed in an amended Constitution, would establish the fact, the quondam slave was in all respects placed on an equality, political, legal, and moral, with those of the more advanced race.

As one who largely entertained the theoretical views I have expressed, I do not hesitate here to say, as the result of sixty years of more careful study and scientific observation, that the theories then entertained by us and the fact is to-day in evidence that this statement of Dr. Holmes should be accepted as an undeniable political aphorism. So far from seven or fourteen years making an American citizen, fully and thoroughly impregnated with American ideals to the exclusion of all others, our experience is that it requires at least three generations to eliminate what may be termed the "hyphen" in citizenship. Not in the first, nor in the second, and hardly in the third, generation, does the immigrant cease to be an Irish-American, or a French-American, or a German-American, or a Slavonic-American, or yet a Dago. Nevertheless, in process of time, those of the Caucasian race do and will become Americans. Ultimately their descendants will be free from the traditions and ideals, so to speak, ground in through centuries passed under other conditions. Not so the Ethiopian. In his case we find ourselves confronted with a situation never contemplated in that era of political dreams and Scriptural science in which our institutions received shape. Stated tersely and in plain language, so far as the African is concerned—the cause and, so to speak, the motive of the great struggle of 1861 to 1865—we recognize the presence in the body politic of a vast alien mass which does not assimilate and which cannot be absorbed. In other words, the melting-pot theory came in sharp contact with an ethnological fact, and the unexpected occurred. The problem of African servitude was solved after a fashion; but in place of it a race issue of most uncompromising character evolved itself.

I am by no means prepared to go the length of an English authority in recently saying that "emancipation on two continents sacrificed the real welfare of the slave and his intrinsic worth as a person to the impatient vanity of an immediate and theatrical triumph."¹ This length, I say, I cannot go; but so far as the present occasion is concerned, with such means of observation as are within my reach, I find the conclusion difficult to resist that the success of the abolitionists in effecting the emancipation of the Afro-American, as unexpected and sweeping as it was sudden, has led to phases of the race problem quite unanticipated at least. For instance, as respects segregation. Instead of assimilating, with a tendency to ultimate absorption, the movement in the opposite direction since 1865 is pronounced. It has, moreover, received the final stamp of scientific approval. This implies much; for in the old days of the "peculiar institution" the relations between the two races were far more intimate, kindly, and even absorptive than they now are.

That African slavery, as it existed in the United States anterior to the year 1862, presented a mild form of servitude, as servitude then existed and immemorably had almost everywhere existed, was, moreover, incontrovertibly proven in the course of the Civil War. Before 1862 it was confidently believed that any severe social agitation within, or disturbance from without, would inevitably lead to a Southern servile insurrection. In Europe this result was assumed as of course; and, immediately after it was issued, the Emancipation Proclamation of President Lincoln was denounced in unmeasured terms by the entire London press. Not a voice was raised in its defence. It was regarded as a measure unwarranted in civilized warfare, and a sure and intentional incitement to the horrors which had attended the servile insurrections of Haiti and San Domingo; and, more recently, the unspeakable Sepoy incidents of the Indian mutiny. What actually occurred is now historic. The confident anticipations of our English brethren were, not for the first time, negated; nor is there any page in our American record more creditable to those concerned than the attitude held by the African during the fierce internecine struggle which prevailed between April, 1861, and April, 1865. In it there is scarcely a trace, if indeed there is any trace at all, of such a condition of affairs as had developed in the Antilles and in Hindustan. The attitude of the African toward his Confederate owner was submissive and kindly. Although the armed and masterful domestic protector was at the front and engaged in deadly, all-absorbing conflict, yet the women and children of the Southern plantation slept with unbarred doors—free from apprehension, much more from molestation.

Moreover, during the old days of slavery there was hardly a child born, of either sex, who grew up in a Southern household of substantial wealth without holding immediate and most affectionate relations with those of the other race. Every typical Southern man had what he called his "daddy" and his "mammy," his "uncle," and his "aunty," by him familiarly addressed as such, and who were to him even closer than are blood relations to most. They had cared for him in his cradle; he followed them to their graves. Is it needful for me to ask to what extent such relations still exist? Of those born thirty years after emancipation, and therefore belonging distinctly to a later generation, how many thus have their kindly, if humble, kin of the African blood? I fancy I would be safe in saying not one in twenty.

Here, then, as the outcome of the first great issue occupying the thought and exciting the passions of the period before the Civil War, is a problem wholly unanticipated—a problem which, merely stating, I dismiss.

Charles F. Adams

Friends (Quakers) in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and western parts of Maryland and Virginia praying:

That Congress might make "a sincere and impartial inquiry whether it be not an essential part of the duty of your exalted station to exert upright endeavors, to the full extent of your power, to remove every obstruction to public righteousness, which the influence or artifice of particular persons, governed by the narrow, mistaken views of self-interest, has occasioned, and whether, notwithstanding such seeming impediments, it be not in reality within your power to exercise justice and mercy, which, if adhered to, we cannot doubt must produce the abolition of the slave trade."

In their preamble the petitioners stated that a similar memorial had been made to Congress in 1783, but that,

"... though the Christian rectitude of the concern was by the delegates generally acknowledged, yet, not being vested with the powers of legislation, they declined promoting any public remedy against the gross national iniquity of trafficking in the persons of fellowmen; but divers of the legislative bodies of the different States on this continent have since manifested their sense of the public detestation due to the licentious wickedness of the African trade for slaves, and the inhuman tyranny and blood-guiltiness inseparable from it; the debasing influence whereof most certainly tends to lay waste the virtue and, of course, the happiness of the people."

Mr. John Lawrence also presented an Address from the Society of Friends, in the city of New York, in which they set forth their desire of cooperating with their Southern brethren in their protest against the slave trade.

It was moved to refer the petitions to a committee. This was opposed by James Jackson [Ga.], as diverting the attention of the members from the great question before them to one of "questionable policy," and which Congress could take up without advisers, "because the Constitution expressly mentions all the power they can exercise on the subject."

In the debate which ensued on the subject the leading

THAT the questions connected with slavery had not been settled by the compromises on the subject in the Constitution [see Chapter xiii, Vol. I] was shown by a petition presented to Congress in its first session, praying for the abolition of the slave trade.

On February 11, 1790, Thomas Fitzsimons [Pa.] presented a petition from the Yearly Meeting in 1789 of speakers in behalf of committing the petitions were James Madison [Va.], Thomas Hartley [Pa.], and Roger Sherman [Conn.]; against committing it, Michael J. Stone [Md.], James Jackson [Ga.], William L. Smith [S. C.], and Thomas T. Tucker [S. C.].

PETITIONS AGAINST SLAVERY

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 11, 1790

MR. MADISON.—I apprehend gentlemen need not be alarmed at any measure it is likely Congress will take, because they will recollect that the Constitution secures to the individual States the right of admitting, if they think proper, the importation of slaves into their own territory for eighteen years yet unexpired; subject, however, to a tax, if Congress is disposed to impose it, of not more than ten dollars on each person. The petition, if I mistake not, speaks of artifices used by self-interested persons to carry on this trade.

If anything is within the Federal authority to restrain such violation of the rights of nations and of mankind, as is supposed to be practiced in some parts of the United States, it will certainly tend to the interest and honor of the community to attempt a remedy, and is a proper subject for our discussion. It may be that foreigners take the advantage of the liberty afforded them by the American trade to employ our shipping in the slave trade between Africa and the West Indies, when they are restrained from employing their own by restrictive laws of their nation. If this is the case, is there any person of humanity that would not wish to prevent them? Another consideration why we should commit the petition is that we may give no ground of alarm by a serious opposition, as if we were about to take measures that were unconstitutional.

MR. STONE feared that, if Congress took any measures indicative of an intention to interfere with the kind of property alluded to, it would sink it in value very considerably, and might be injurious to a great number of the citizens, particularly in the Southern States. He thought the subject was of general concern, and that the petitioners had no more right to interfere with it than any other members of the community. It was an unfortunate circumstance that it was the disposition of religious sects to imagine they understood the rights of human nature better than all the world besides; and that they would, in consequence, be meddling with concerns in which rights, it ought to be rejected as an attempt upon the virtue and patriotism of the House.

MR. SHERMAN observed that the petitioners from New York stated that they had applied to the legislature of that State to prohibit certain practices which they conceived to be improper, and which tended to injure the well-being of the community; that the legislature had considered the application, but had applied no remedy because they supposed that power was exclusively vested in the general Government under the Constitution of the United States; it would, therefore, be proper to commit that petition, in order to ascertain what are the powers of the general Government in the case.

MR. TUCKER.—Congress has no authority, under the Constitution, to do more than lay a duty of ten dollars upon each person imported; and this is a political consideration, not arising from either religion or morality, and is the only principle upon which we can proceed to take it up. But what effect do these men suppose will arise from their exertions? Will a duty of ten dollars diminish the importation? Will the treatment be better than usual? I apprehend not; nay, it may be worse, because an interference with the subject may excite a great degree of restlessness in the minds of those it is intended to serve, and that may be a cause for the masters to use more rigor toward them than they would otherwise exert; so that these men seem to overshoot their object. But if they will endeavor to procure the abolition of the slave trade, let them prefer their petitions to the State legislatures, who alone have the power of forbidding the importation. I believe their applications there would be improper; but if they are anywhere proper it is there. I look upon the address, then, to be ill judged, however good the intention of the framers.

The address was ordered to lie on the table.

On February 12 the Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery, of which Benjamin Franklin was president, presented a memorial, not on the abolition merely of the slave trade but of slavery in general. This declared:

From a persuasion that equal liberty was originally the portion and is still the birthright of all men, and influenced by the strong ties of humanity and the principles of their institution, your memorialists conceive themselves bound to use all they had nothing to do. As the petition relates to a subject of a general nature, it ought to lie on the table as information. He would never consent to refer petitions, unless the petitioners were exclusively interested. Suppose there was a petition to come before us from a society praying us to be honest in our transactions, or that we should administer the Constitution according to its intent, what would you do with a petition of this kind? Certainly it would remain on your table. He would, however, not have it supposed that the people had not a right to advise and give their opinion upon public measures; but he would not be influenced by that advice or opinion to take up a subject sooner than the convenience of other business would admit.

MR. HARTLEY thought the memorialists did not deserve to be aspersed for their conduct if influenced by motives of benignity. They solicit the legislature of the Union to prevent, as far as is in their power, the increase of a licentious traffic; nor do they merit censure because their behavior has the appearance of more morality than other people. Congress ought, not to refuse to hear the applications of their fellow citizens while those applications contain nothing unconstitutional or offensive.

MR. JACKSON.—I apprehend, if through the interference of the general Government the slave trade was abolished, it would evince to the people a disposition toward a total emancipation, and they would hold their property in jeopardy. Any extraordinary attention of Congress to this petition may have, in some degree, a similar effect. I would beg to ask those, then, who are desirous of freeing the negroes if they have funds sufficient to pay for them? If they have, they may come forward on that business with some propriety; but, if they have not, they should keep themselves quiet, and not interfere with a business in which they are not interested. They may as well come forward and solicit Congress to interdict the West India trade because it is injurious to the morals of mankind; from thence we import rum, which has a debasing influence upon the consumer. I hope the House will order the petition to lie on the table, in order to prevent an alarm to our Southern brethren.

MR. SMITH.—If I understood it right on its first reading the petition prays that we should take measures for the abolition of the slave trade. This is desiring an unconstitutional act, because the Constitution secures that trade to the States, independent of congressional restrictions, for a term of twenty-one years. If, therefore, it prays for a violation of constitutional justifiable endeavors to loosen the bands of slavery and promote a general enjoyment of the blessings of freedom. Under these impressions they earnestly entreat your serious attention to the subject of slavery; that you will be pleased to countenance the restoration of liberty to those unhappy men who alone in this land of freedom are degraded into perpetual bondage, and who, amid the general joy of surrounding freedom, are groaning in servile subjection; that you will devise means for removing this inconsistency from the character of the American people; that you will promote mercy and justice toward this distressed race, and that you will step to the very verge of the power vested in you for discouraging every species of traffic in the persons of our fellowmen.

Mr. Hartley then called up the memorial presented the day before, from the annual meeting of Friends at Philadelphia, for a second reading; whereupon the same was read a second time and moved to be committed.

In the debate which ensued the leading speakers for commitment were: John Page [Va.], James Madison [Va.], Thomas Scott [Pa.], and Elbridge Gerry [Mass.]; those against commitment were Thomas T. Tucker [S. C.], Ædamus Burke [S. C.], William L. Smith [S. C.], James Jackson [Ga.], and Abraham Baldwin [Ga.].

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 12, 1790

MR. TUCKER was surprised to see another memorial on the same subject, and that signed by a man who ought to have known the Constitution better. He thought it a mischievous attempt as it respected the persons in whose favor it was intended. It would buoy them up with hopes, without a foundation, and as they could not reason on the subject, as more enlightened men would, they might be led to do what they would be punished for, and the owners of them, in their own defence, would be compelled to exercise over them a severity they were not accustomed to. Do these men expect a general emancipation of slaves by law? This would never be submitted to by the Southern States without a civil war. Do they mean to purchase their freedom? He believed their money would fall short of the price.

MR. BURKE saw the disposition of the House, and he feared it would be referred to a committee, maugre all their opposition; but he must insist that it prayed for an unconstitutional measure; did it not desire Congress to interfere and abolish the slave trade, while the Constitution expressly stipulates that Congress shall exercise no such power? He was certain the commitment would sound an alarm and blow the trumpet of sedition in the Southern States.

MR. SCOTT.—I cannot entertain a doubt but the memorial is strictly agreeable to the Constitution; it respects a part of the duty particularly assigned to us by that instrument, and I hope we may be inclined to take it into consideration. We can, at present, lay our hands upon a small duty of ten dollars; I would take this, and if it is all we can do we must be content; but I am sorry that the framers of the Constitution did not go further and enable us to interdict the traffic entirely; for I look upon the slave trade to be one of the most abominable things on earth; and, if there was neither God nor devil, I should oppose it upon the principles of humanity and the law of nature. The petitioners view the subject in a religious light, but I do not stand in need of religious motives to induce me to reprobate the traffic in human flesh; other considerations weigh with me to support the commitment of the memorial, and to support every constitutional measure likely to bring about its total abolition. Perhaps, in our legislative capacity, we can go no further than to impose a duty of ten dollars, but I do not know how far I might go if I was one of the judges of the United States, and those people were to come before me and claim their emancipation; but I am sure I would go as far as I could.

MR. JACKSON differed with the gentleman last up, and supposed the master had a qualified property in his slave. He said the contrary doctrine would go to the destruction of every species of personal service. The gentleman said he did not stand in need of religion to induce him to reprobate slavery, but if he is guided by that evidence upon which the Christian system is founded he will find that religion is not against it. He will see, from Genesis to Revelations, the current setting strong that way. There never was a government on the face of the earth but what permitted slavery. The purest sons of freedom in the Grecian republics, the citizens of Athens and Lacedæmon, all held slaves. On this principle, the nations of Europe are associated; it is the basis of the feudal system. But, suppose all this to have been wrong, let me ask the gentleman if it is good prayed us to establish an order of nobility or a national religion.

MR. W. SMITH, of South Carolina, insisted that it was not in the power of the House to grant the prayer of the petition, which went to the total abolishment of the slave trade, and it was therefore unnecessary to commit it. If gentlemen can assign no good reason for the measure, they will not support it when they are told that it will create jealousies and alarm in the Southern States; for I can assure them that there is no point on which they are more jealous and suspicious than on a business with which they think the Government has nothing to do.

When we entered into this confederacy we did it from political, not from moral, motives, and I do not think my constituents want to learn morals from the petitioners; I do not believe they want improvement in their moral system; if they do, they can get it at home.

The gentleman from Georgia has justly stated the jealousy of the Southern States. On entering into this Government they apprehended that the other States, not knowing the necessity the citizens of the Southern States were under to hold this species of property, would, from motives of humanity and benevolence, be led to vote for a general emancipation; and, had they not seen that the Constitution provided against the effect of such a disposition, I may be bold to say they never would have adopted it.

We look upon this measure as an attack upon the palladium of the property of our country; it is therefore our duty to oppose it by every means in our power. Gentlemen should consider that when we entered into a political connection with the other States this property was there; it was acquired under a former government, conformably to the laws and Constitution, therefore anything that will tend to deprive them of that property must be an ex post facto law, and, as such, is forbidden by our political compact.

I said the States would never have entered into the confederation unless their property had been guaranteed to them, for such is the state of agriculture in that country that without slaves it must be abandoned. Why will these people, then, make use of arguments to induce the slave to turn his hand against his master? We labor under difficulties enough from the ravages of the late war. A gentleman can hardly come from that country with a servant or two, either to this place [New York] or Philadelphia, but there are persons trying to seduce policy to bring forward a business at this moment likely to light up the flame of civil discord; for the people of the Southern States will resist one tyranny as soon as another. The other parts of the continent may bear them down by force of arms, but they will never suffer themselves to be divested of their property without a struggle. The gentleman says if he was a Federal judge he does not know to what length he would go in emancipating these people; but I believe his judgeship would be of short duration in Georgia, perhaps even the existence of such a judge might be in danger.

MR. BALDWIN was sorry the subject had ever been brought before Congress, because it was of a delicate nature as it respected some of the States. Gentlemen who had been present at the formation of this Constitution could not avoid the recollection of the pain and difficulty which the subject caused in that body. The members of the Southern States were so tender upon this point that they had well-nigh broken up without coming to any determination; however, from the extreme desire of preserving the Union and obtaining an efficient Government, they were induced mutually to concede, and the Constitution jealously guarded what they agreed to. If gentlemen look over the footsteps of that body, they will find the greatest degree of caution used to imprint them so as not to be easily eradicated; but the moment we go to jostle on that ground, I fear we shall feel it tremble under our feet. Congress have no power to interfere with the importation of slaves beyond what is given in the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution; everything else is interdicted to them in the strongest terms. If we examine the Constitution we shall find the expressions relative to this subject cautiously expressed and more punctiliously guarded than any other part: "The migration or importation of such persons shall not be prohibited by Congress." But lest this should not have secured the object sufficiently it is declared in the same section "that no capitation or direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census"; this was intended to prevent Congress from laying any special tax upon negro slaves, as they might, in this way, so burthen the possessors of them as to induce a general emancipation. If we go on to the fifth article we shall find the first and fifth clauses of the ninth section of the first article restrained from being altered before the year 1808.

Gentlemen have said that this petition does not pray for an abolition of the slave trade. I think, sir, it prays for nothing else, and therefore we have no more to do with it than if it his servants to leave him; and, when they have done this, the poor wretches are obliged to rob their master in order to obtain a subsistence; all those, therefore, who are concerned in this seduction are accessories to the robbery.

The reproach which they [the abolitionists] cast upon the owners of negro property is the want of humanity. I believe the proprietors have as much humanity as persons in any part of the continent, and are as conspicuous for their good morals as their neighbors. The memorial of the Quakers relates to a matter in which they are no more interested than any other sect, and can only be considered as a piece of advice, which it is not customary to refer to a committee; but if it is supposed to pray for what they think a moral purpose, is that sufficient to induce us to commit it? What may appear a moral virtue in their eyes may not be so in reality. I have heard of a sect of Shaking Quakers, who, I presume, suppose their tenets of a moral tendency. I am informed one of them forbids to intermarry. Now, if these people were to petition Congress to pass a law prohibiting matrimony would gentlemen agree to refer such a petition? I think if they would reject one of that nature as improper they ought also to reject this.

MR. PAGE was in favor of the commitment. He lived in a State which had the misfortune of having in her bosom a great number of slaves; he held many of them himself, and was as much interested in the business as any gentleman in South Carolina or Georgia, yet, if he was determined to hold them in eternal bondage he should feel no uneasiness or alarm on account of the present measure, because he should rely upon the virtue of Congress that they would not exercise any unconstitutional authority.

MR. MADISON.—The debate has taken a serious turn, and it will be owing to this alone if an alarm is created; for, had the memorial been treated in the usual way, it would have been considered as a matter of course and a report might have been made so as to have given general satisfaction. If there was the slightest tendency by the commitment to break in upon the Constitution, he would object to it; but he did not see upon what ground such an event was to be apprehended. The petition prayed, in general terms, for the interference of Congress, so far as they were constitutionally authorized: but even if its prayer was, in some degree, unconstitutional, it might be committed. He admitted that Congress is restricted by the Constitution from taking measures to abolish the slave trade; yet there are a variety of ways by which it could countenance the abolition, and regulations might be made in relation to the introduction of them into the new States to be formed out of the Western Territory. He thought the object well worthy of consideration.

MR. GERRY thought the interference of Congress fully compatible with the Constitution, and could not help lamenting the miseries to which the natives of Africa were exposed by this inhuman commerce. He never contemplated the subject without reflecting what his own feelings would be, in case himself, his children, or friends were placed in the same deplorable circumstances. He then adverted to the flagrant acts of cruelty which are committed in carrying on that traffic; and asked whether it can be supposed that Congress has no power to prevent such abuses? Congress can, agreeably to the Constitution, lay a duty of ten dollars on imported slaves; they may do this immediately. He made a calculation of the value of the slaves in the Southern States, and supposed they may be worth ten millions of dollars. Congress have a right, if they see proper, to make a proposal to the Southern States to purchase the whole of them, and their resources in the Western Territory might furnish them with the means. He did not intend to suggest a measure of this kind; he only instanced these particulars to show that Congress certainly has a right to intermeddle in the business.

The memorials were referred to committee by a vote of 43 to 14.

On March 16 the committee made its report, which was that the Constitution expressly restrained the general Government from prohibiting the importation of slaves until 1808, and, by fair construction, prohibited Congress from interfering before that date with the emancipation of slaves, or the regulation of slaves by the States; the committee trusted, however, that the various legislatures would revise their laws from time to time to ameliorate the condition of the slaves.

The committee went on to declare that Congress had authority to lay a tax not exceeding ten dollars on each slave imported, and to make provision for the humane treatment of the slaves in passage, as well as to prohibit foreigners from fitting out slave ships in a port of the United States. Lastly, they advised that Congress inform the memorialists that, wherever it had jurisdiction—enemy with provisions; they were guides and conductors to their armies; and whenever the American army came into their neighborhood they found themselves in an enemy's country.

Mr. Burke was proceeding in this strain when he was interrupted by being called to order. A warm altercation ensued.

MR. SMITH.—The memorial from the Quakers contained, in his opinion, a very indecent attack on the character of those States which possess slaves. It reprobates slavery as bringing down reproach on the Southern States, and expatiates on the detestation due to the licentious wickedness of the African trade, and the inhuman tyranny and blood guiltiness inseparable from it. He could not but consider it as calculated to fix a stigma of the blackest nature on the State he had the honor to represent, and to hold its citizens up to public view as men divested of every principle of honor and humanity. Considering it in that light, he felt it incumbent on him not only to refute those atrocious calumnies but to resent the improper language made use of by the memorialists. This application came with the worst grace possible from the Quakers, who professed never to intermeddle in politics but to submit quietly to the laws of the country.

If these were really their sentiments, why did not they abide by them? Why did not they leave that which they call God's work to be managed by himself? Those principles should instruct them to wait with patience and humility for the event of all public measures, and to receive that event as the Divine Will. It was difficult to credit their pretended scruples; because, while they were exclaiming against the Mammon of this world, they were hunting after it with a step steady as time and an appetite keen as the grave.

The memorial from the Pennsylvania Society applied, in express terms, for an emancipation of slaves, and the report of the committee appeared to hold out the idea that Congress might exercise the power of emancipating after the year 1808; for it said that Congress could not emancipate slaves prior to that period. He remarked that either the power of manumission still remained with the several States or it was exclusively vested in Congress; for no one would contend that such a power would be concurrent in the several States and the United States. He then showed that the State governments clearly retained all the rights of sovereignty which they had before tion in matters concerning slavery, it would be exercised on the principles of "justice, humanity, and good policy."

This report was debated from March 17 to 23, when it was passed, with amendments eliminating the suggestion to the State legislatures that Congress had the power to emancipate slaves after 1808 and the final notice to the memorialists. The vote upon entering on the Journal the original report of the committee, and the amended report, was passed by 29 to 25 votes.

The chief speakers in the debate were, in favor of the original report: Thomas Hartley [Pa.] and Elias Boudinot [N. J.]; against it, Alexander White [Va.], Ædamus Burke and William L. Smith, of South Carolina.

PETITIONS AGAINST SLAVERY—Concluded

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 17-23, 1790

MR. WHITE moved the amendments to the report. Congress had no right to interfere with the States in their regulations of slaves. He did not, however, anticipate the difficulties from a total prohibition which some gentlemen seem to apprehend—and, if Congress had it in their power to interdict this business at the present moment, he did not think the essential interests of the Southern States would suffer. Twenty years ago he supposed the idea he now suggested would have caused universal alarm. Virginia, however, about twelve years since prohibited the importation of negroes from Africa, and the consequences apprehended never were realized; on the contrary, the agriculture of that State was never in a more flourishing situation.

MR. HARTLEY reprobated the illiberal treatment which the memorialists had received, and asserted that they were friends to the Constitution, and that on the present occasion they came forward from the most laudable motives, from a wish to promote the happiness of mankind, that their conduct, so far from meriting censure, deserved and would receive the applause of the civilized world.

MR. BURKE animadverted with great freedom on the past and present conduct of the Quakers. He denied that they were the friends of freedom; he said that during the late war they were for bringing this country under a foreign yoke; they descended to the character of spies; they supplied the the establishment of the Constitution, unless they were exclusively delegated to the United States; and this could only exist where the Constitution granted, in express terms, an exclusive authority to the Union, or where it granted in one instance an authority to the Union and in another prohibited the States from exercising the like authority, or where it granted an authority to the Union to which a similar authority in the States would be repugnant.

He applied these principles to the case in question; and asked whether the Constitution had, in express terms, vested the Congress with the power of manumission? Or whether it restrained the States from exercising that power? Or whether there was any authority given to the Union with which the exercise of this right by any State would be inconsistent? If these questions were answered in the negative, it followed that Congress had not an exclusive right to the power of manumission. Had it a concurrent right with the States? No gentleman would assert it, because the absurdity was obvious. For a State regulation on the subject might differ from a Federal regulation; in which case one or the other must give way. As the laws of the United States were paramount to those of the individual States, the Federal regulations would abrogate those of the States, consequently the States would thus be divested of a power which it was evident they now had and might exercise whenever they thought proper. But admitting that Congress had authority to manumit the slaves in America, and were disposed to exercise it, would the Southern States acquiesce in such a measure without a struggle? Would the citizens of that country tamely suffer their property to be torn from them? Would even the citizens of the other States which did not possess this property desire to have all the slaves let loose upon them? Would not such a step be injurious even to the slaves themselves? It was well known that they were an indolent people, improvident, averse to labor; when emancipated they would either starve or plunder. Nothing was a stronger proof of the absurdity of emancipation than the fanciful schemes which the friends to the measure had suggested. One was to ship them out of the country and colonize them in some foreign region. This plan admitted that it would be dangerous to retain them within the United States after they were manumitted; but surely it would be inconsistent with humanity to banish these people to a remote country, and to expel them from their native soil, and from places to which they had a local attachment. It would be no less repugnant to the principles of freedom not to allow them to remain here if they desired it. How could they be called freemen if they were, against their consent, to be expelled the country? Thus did the advocates for emancipation acknowledge that the blacks, when liberated, ought not to remain here to stain the blood of the whites by a mixture of the races.

Another plan was to liberate all those who should be born after a certain limited period. Such a scheme would produce this very extraordinary phenomenon, that the mother would be a slave and her child would be free. These young emancipated negroes, by associating with their enslaved parents, would participate in all the debasement which slavery is said to occasion. But, allowing that a practicable scheme of general emancipation could be devised, there can be no doubt that the two races would still remain distinct. It is known from experience that the whites had such an idea of their superiority over the blacks that they never even associated with them; even the warmest friends to the blacks kept them at a distance and rejected all intercourse with them. Could any instance be quoted of their intermarrying? The Quakers asserted that nature had made all men equal and that the difference of color should not place negroes on a worse footing in society than the whites; but had any of them ever married a negro, and would any of them suffer their children to mix their blood with that of a black? They would view with abhorrence such an alliance.

Mr. Smith then read some extracts from Mr. Jefferson's "Notes on Virginia," proving that negroes were by nature an inferior race of beings, and that the whites would always feel a repugnance at mixing their blood with that of the blacks.

Thus that respectable author who was desirous of countenancing emancipation was, on a consideration of the subject, induced candidly to avow that the difficulties appeared insurmountable. The friends to manumission had said that by prohibiting the further importation of slaves and by liberating those born after a certain period a gradual emancipation might take place, and that in process of time the free white world would be extinct and there would be none but whites. He was at a loss to learn how that consequence would result. If the blacks did not intermarry with the whites they would remain black to the end of time; for it was not contended that liberating them would whiten them; if they would intermarry with the whites, then the negroes never improve in talents, never grow rich, and continue to associate with the people of their own color. This is owing either to the natural aversion the whites entertain toward them, and an opinion of the superiority of their race, or to the natural attachment the blacks have to those of their own color; in either case it proves that they will, after manumission, continue a distinct people and have separate interests. They are an inferior race even to the Indians.

But some persons have been of opinion that if the further importation of slaves could be prohibited there would be a gradual extinction of the species. That would be impossible, because they increase; to occasion an extinction, Congress must prohibit all intercourse between the sexes; this would be an act of humanity they would not thank us for, nor would they be persuaded that it was for their own good; or Congress must, like Herod, order all the children to be put to death as soon as born. If, then, nothing but evil would result from emancipation, under the existing circumstances of the country, why should Congress air at all in the business, or give any countenance to such dangerous applications? We have been told that the Government ought to manifest a disposition inimical to this practice which the people reprobate. If some citizens, from misinformation and ignorance, have imbibed prejudices against the Southern States, if ill-intentioned authors have related false facts and gross misrepresentations tending to traduce the character of a whole State and to mislead the citizens of other States, is that a sufficient reason why a large territory is to be depopulated, merely to gratify the wish of some misinformed individuals?

This is not an object of general concern, for I have already proved that it does not weaken the Union; but, admit that it did, will the abolition of slavery strengthen South Carolina? It can only be cultivated by slaves; the climate, the nature of the soil, ancient habits, forbid the whites from performing the labor. Experience convinces us of the truth of this. Great Britain made every attempt to settle Georgia by whites alone and failed, and was compelled at length to introduce slaves; after which that State increased very rapidly in opulence and importance. If the slaves are emancipated they will not remain in that country—remove the cultivators of the soil and the whole of the low country, all the fertile rice and indigo swamps, will be deserted and become a wilderness. In a short time the Northern and Eastern States will supply us with their manufactures; if you depopulate the rich low country of South white race would be extinct, and the American people would be all of the mulatto breed. In whatever light, therefore, the subject was viewed the folly of emancipation was manifest. He trusted these considerations would prevent any further application to Congress on this point, and would so far have weight with the committee as to cause them to reject the clause altogether, or at least to declare in plain terms that Congress has no right whatever to manumit the slaves of this country.

The toleration of slavery in the several States was a matter of internal regulation and policy, in which each State had a right to do as she pleased, and no other State had any right to intermeddle with her policy or laws. The legislature of South Carolina had prohibited theatrical representations, deeming them improper; but they did not trouble Congress with an application to abolish them in New York and Philadelphia. The Southern citizens might also consider the toleration of Quakers as an injury to the community because in time of war they would not defend their country from the enemy, and in time of peace they were interfering in the concerns of others and doing everything in their power to excite the slaves in the Southern States to insurrection; notwithstanding which the people of those States had not required the assistance of Congress to exterminate the Quakers.

But he could not help observing that this squeamishness was very extraordinary at this time. The Northern States knew that the Southern States had slaves before they confederated with them. If they had such an abhorrence for slavery, why did they not cast us off and reject our alliance? The truth was that the best informed part of the citizens of the Northern States knew that slavery was so ingrafted into the policy of the Southern States that it could not be eradicated without tearing up by the roots their happiness, tranquillity, and prosperity; that, if it were an evil, it was one for which there was no remedy, and, therefore, like wise men, they acquiesced in it. We, on the other hand, knew that the Quaker doctrines had taken such deep root in some of the States that all resistance to them must be useless: we therefore made a compromise on both sides, we took each other with our mutual bad habits and respective evils, for better for worse; the Northern States adopted us with our slaves and we adopted them with their Quakers. There was then an implied compact between the Northern and Southern people that no step should be taken to injure the property of the latter or to disturb their tranquillity.

The negroes would not be benefited by emancipation; free

Carolina and Georgia, you will give us a blow which will immediately recoil on yourselves.

It has been said that the toleration of slavery brings down reproach on America. It only brings reproach on those who tolerate it, and we are ready to bear our share. We found slavery ingrafted in the very policy of the country when we were born, and we are persuaded of the impolicy of removing it; if it be a moral evil, it is like many others which exist in all civilized countries and which the world quietly submits to.

BLACK AND WHITE SLAVES

From the collection of the New York Historical Society

Another objection is that slavery vitiates and debases the mind of the owner of this sort of property. Where, he asked, is the proof of this allegation? Do the citizens of the Southern States exhibit more ferociousness in their manners, more barbarity in their dispositions, than those of the other States? Are crimes more frequently committed there?

Much had been said of the cruel treatment of slaves in the Southern States; he denied the fact from experience and accurate information, and believed in his conscience that the slaves in South Carolina were a happier people than the lower order of whites in many countries he had visited.

Some have said that slavery is unnecessary; so far from it that several essential manufactures depend on it. Indigo, cochineal, and various other dyeing materials which are the produce of the West Indies could be raised only by slaves; the great staple commodity of the South would be annihilated without the labor of slaves. It is well known that when the African slaves were brought to the coast for sale it was customary to put to death all those who were not sold; the abolition of the slave trade would therefore cause the massacre of the people.

The cruel mode of transportation was another motive to this abolition; but it was to be presumed that the merchants would so far attend to their own interests as to preserve the lives and health of the slaves on the passage. All voyages must be attended with inconveniences, and those from Africa to America not more than others. As to their confinement on board, it was no more than was necessary; the room was full as much as was allotted in ships of war to British seamen. And in cases of disobedience, the captain had a right, for slight offences, to inflict on these sailors corporal punishment without the intervention of a court-martial.

Having thus removed the force of the observations which have been advanced against the toleration of slavery by a misguided and misinformed humanity, I shall only add that I disapprove of the whole of the report; because it either states some power sufficiently expressed in the Constitution which is unnecessary or it sets forth some power which I am clear Congress do not possess.

Mr. BOURNE said: On resolutions declaring that Congress had not power to prohibit the importation of slaves into any State, or to interfere in their emancipation or internal government, long argument had been used; also much precious time had been spent to prove the lawfulness of the African trade in slaves. This, indeed, was an arduous task, in this day of light and knowledge. Not only the practice of ancient nations and that of all modern Europeans had been brought into view, but even the sacred Scriptures had been quoted to justify this iniquitous traffic. It is true that the Egyptians held the Israelites in bondage for four hundred years, and Mr. B. doubted not but much the same arguments as had been used on the present occasion had been urged with great violence by the King of Egypt, whose heart, it is expressly said, had been extremely hardened, to show why he should not consent to let the children of Israel go, who had now become absolutely necessary to him; but gentlemen cannot forget the consequences that followed; they were delivered by a strong hand and stretched out arm, and it ought to be remembered that the Almighty Power that accomplished their deliverance is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. The New Testament has afforded a number of texts to countenance this doctrine, in the gentleman's opinion. One would have imagined that the uniform tenor of the Gospel that breathes a spirit of love and universal philanthropy to our fellow creatures—that commands our love to our neighbor to be measured by our love to ourselves—that teaches us that whatsoever we would that men should do to us, to do so to them—would have prevented this misapplication. Surely the gentleman overlooked the prophecy of St. Peter, where he foretells that, among other damnable heresies, "through covetousness shall they, with feigned words, make merchandise of you."

When gentlemen attempt to justify this unnatural traffic, or to prove the lawfulness of slavery, they should advert to the genius of our Government and the principles of the Revolution. By the declaration of Congress, in 1775, setting forth the causes and necessity of taking up arms, they say: "If it was possible for men who exercise their reason to believe that the Divine Author of our existence intended a part of the human race to hold an absolute property in and an unbounded power over others, marked out by His infinite goodness and wisdom as the objects of a legal domination never rightfully resistible, however severe and oppressive, the inhabitants of these colonies might at least require from the Parliament of Great Britain some evidence that this dreadful authority over them had been granted to that body." And, by the Declaration of Independence in 1776, Congress declare: "We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

This, then, is the language of America in the day of distress. Mr. Chairman, I would not be understood to contend the right of Congress at this time to prohibit the importation of slaves. Whatever might have been the principles of the Revolution or the genius of the Government, by the present Constitution we are clearly and positively restrained till the year 1808, and I am sure that no gentleman in this committee would have the most distant wish to wound this instrument of our connection.

But there is a wide difference between justifying this ungenerous traffic and supporting a claim to property vested at the time of the Constitution and guaranteed thereby. Besides, it would be inhumanity itself to turn these unhappy people loose to murder each other or to perish for want of the necessaries of life. I never was an advocate for so extravagant a conduct.

Many arguments were pointed against the danger of our emancipating these slaves, or even holding up an idea that we had a power so to do, and much time has been taken up to disprove this right in Congress. As no claim of this kind is contended for, and the resolutions already passed expressly contradict it, I shall make no further observations on them.

But the characters of the signers of these memorials are called in question as an argument against the adoption of the resolution on the table. One of these memorials was signed by the society of people called Quakers; the other by Dr. Franklin, as president of a private society in Philadelphia. The indiscriminate abuse that has been thrown out against the Quakers, without distinction, has not comported with the honor or dignity of this House. Not only their characters, but their very names have been called upon, and private anecdotes relating to individuals been mentioned on the floor. With many of the Quakers I have long lived in the habits of friendship, and can testify to the respectability of their characters and the regularity of their lives. Their conduct in the late war has been arraigned, and they have been condemned in the lump. I had the honor of serving the United States at the commencement of the war as commissary-general of prisoners.

Congress not being able to afford them supplies, these unhappy men in this town¹ were reduced to the very depths of distress; without food or raiment, without blankets or firing, they suffered everything that human nature could bear. In this situation many of the Quakers of this city exercised such humanity toward them as did honor to human nature. The miserable prisoner not only felt the happy effects of their exertions in his favor, but participated in their money, their food and clothing. Nay, such were the jealousies created by this conduct, in the British army here, that an armed force entered the house of one of them, seized his books, and, though a man of great property and large commercial dealings, on finding that he had loaned large sums of money to our distressed prisoners, he was turned out of their lines, and with his family was a refugee during the whole of the war afterward, separated from his business and property.

Where is the denomination among us that did not furnish opponents to our glorious Revolution? Were not hundreds of Presbyterians, Episcopalians, and almost of every other denomnation among our enemies? What denominations formed the thousands of new levies that endeavored to deluge our country in blood? On the other hand, were not a Greene and a Mifflin furnished from the Society of the Quakers?

In short, I rejoice to say that our cause was not carried on by fanaticism or religious zeal, but a generous struggle for the rights of human nature. Then why all this abuse of this particular sect, without discrimination? Can any solid argument against the resolution on the table arise from a conduct of this kind? I am at a loss to know what other argument has been used to show the impropriety of the resolution before you. It goes to declare the power of Congress to prohibit foreigners from fitting out vessels in our ports to supply foreigners with slaves from Africa. For my part, I think it a prudent, a humane, and a constitutional resolution. It will render further interference on this subject, perhaps, unnecessary when it is known that the power of Congress extends to remedy the evil. They will hardly venture to risk a voyage that may be ruined before its being finished.

On the whole, sir, I have heard nothing to convince me of the impropriety of the present resolution. I shall therefore vote against striking it out.

It was moved that the sixth article be struck out; but the motion was negatived. The committee of the whole then agreed to the proposition. The seventh article was on motion struck out.

THE FUGITIVE LAW

In February, 1792, Congress had passed without debate and, in the House of Representatives with but seven votes in the negative, a Fugitive Law whereby any person "held to labor" in one State or Territory, fleeing to another, might be seized by the one "to whom such labor is due," or his agent, and taken before a Federal judge or local magistrate; and, upon proof of the owner's claim, should be given over by the said authority to the claimant with a certificate warranting the removal of the fugitive to the State or Territory whence he had fled. A person who concealed the fugitive from the claimant, resisted his arrest, or rescued him after arrest would be subject to a fine of $500. The law did not become a subject of discussion in Congress until January 30, 1797, when John Swanwick [Pa.] presented a petition to Congress for certain freedmen of North Carolina against the operation of the law in their case. They averred that the legislature of North Carolina had recently passed an act permitting negroes who had been freed by their masters to be seized and sold back into slavery, in consequence of which act the petitioners had fled to the North, leaving behind them the property which they had accumulated, their gainful occupations, and, in some cases, their families, and were experiencing poverty and distress in their exile, undergoing the while the fear of recapture, a fate which had befallen one of their fellow fugitive freedmen.

The speakers in favor of receiving the petition were John Swanwick and Samuel Sitgreaves of Pennsylvania, George Thacher and Joseph B. Varnum of Massachusetts, and Aaron Kitchell of New Jersey; those opposed to receiving it were Thomas Blount and Nathaniel Macon of North Carolina, James Madison and John Heath of Virginia, and William L. Smith of South Carolina.

PETITION OF FUGITIVE FREEDMEN

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 30, 1797

MR. SWANWICK said he hoped the petition would be referred to a select committee.

MR. BLOUNT hoped it would not even be received by the House. Agreeably to a law of the State of North Carolina, he said they were slaves, and could, of course, be seized as such.

MR. THACHER thought the petition ought to be referred to the Committee on the Fugitive Law. He conceived the gentleman much mistaken in asserting these petitioners to be absolute slaves. They state that they were slaves, but their masters manumitted them, and that their manumissions were sanctioned by a law of that State, but that a subsequent law of the same State subjected them to slavery; and, if even there was a law that allowed them to be taken and sold into slavery again, he could not see any propriety in refusing their petition in that House—they certainly are free people. It appeared they were taken under the Fugitive Act, which he thought ought not to tend; but he thought this case had no claim on their attention. Yet, if it did not come within the purview of the legislative body, he thought it might be suffered to lie on the table. He thought it a judicial case, and could obtain its due in a court of appeal in that State. If they are free by the laws of North Carolina, they ought to apply to those laws and have their privilege established. If they are slaves, the Constitution gives them no hopes of being heard here. A law has been passed to prevent the owners of those slaves emancipating them; it is therefore impossible that any relief can be granted. The petitioners are under the laws of North Carolina, and those laws cannot be the interpreters of the laws of the United States.

MR. SITGREAVES said he was not prepared to deny that this petition is in the situation the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Madison] states; nor was he prepared to prove that it came under the power of the general Government; but he could see no kind of reason why it should not be sent to a committee who should examine the case and report whether it required legislative interference or whether it was a subject of judicial authority in the country whence the petitioners came. If it should be found to be of a judicial nature, the committee would report so, and the House would honorably refuse it.

MR. W. SMITH said the practice of a former time, in a similar case, was that the petition was sealed up and sent back to the petitioners, not being allowed even to remain on the files of the office. This method, he said, ought to be pursued with respect to the present petition. It was not a matter that claimed the attention of the legislature of the United States. He thought it of such an improper nature as to be surprised any gentleman would present a petition of the kind. These men are slaves, and, he thought, not entitled to attention from that body; to encourage slaves to petition the House would have a tendency to invite continual applications. Indeed, it would tend to spread an alarm throughout the Southern States; it would act as an "entering wedge," whose consequences could not be foreseen. This is a kind of property on which the House has no power to legislate. He hoped it would not be committed at all; it was not a proper subject for legislative attention. He was not of the opinion of some gentlemen that the House were bound to sit on every question recommended to their notice. He thought particular attention ought to be paid to the lateness of the session; if this subject were to be considered, too much time of the House would be devoured which was much wanted on important business.

affect them; they now came and prayed the House so to model that Fugitive Act as to prevent its affecting persons of their description. He therefore saw great propriety in referring their petition to the committee appointed to amend that act in another part; they could as well consider its relation to the present case. He could not see how there would be a propriety in rejecting their petition; they had an undoubted right to petition the House and to be heard.

MR. SWANWICK was surprised at the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Blount] desiring to reject this petition; he could not have thought, nor could he indulge the suspicion now, that the gentleman was so far from acknowledging the rights of man as to prevent any class of men from petitioning. If men were aggrieved, and conceived they have claim to attention, petitioning was their sacred right, and that right should never suffer innovation; whether the House ought to grant was another question.

If the circumstance respecting these people was as they stated, their case was very hard. He animadverted on the atrocity of that reward of ten dollars offered for one of them if taken alive, but that fifty should be given if found dead, and no questions asked. Was not this, he said, encouragement to put a period to that man's existence? Horrid reward! Could gentlemen hear it and not shudder?

MR. BLOUNT said the gentleman last up was mistaken in calling the petitioners free men; the laws of North Carolina, as he observed before, did not suffer individuals to emancipate their slaves, and he should wish to know what evidence there was to prove these men free, and, except that was proved, the House had no right to attend to the petition.

MR. SITGREAVES, in answer to the gentleman last up, said he would reverse his question, and ask what evidence he had to prove that these men are not freemen; can he prove they are slaves? Had they not an equal right to be heard with other petitioners?

MR. HEATH was clearly convinced these people were slaves, and therefore hoped their petition would lie on the table. He would remind the gentleman that, if they undertook this business, they would soon have petitions enough of the same kind, and public business would be thereby prevented. It appeared to him to be more within the jurisdiction of the legislature of that State; indeed, the United States had nothing to do with it.

MR. MADISON said he should be sorry to reject any petition whatever in which it became the business of the House to at-

MR. THACHER said the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Blount] is of the opinion that, these people being slaves, the House ought not to pay attention to their prayer. That the House should not receive a petition without an evidence to prove it was from a free man was quite a new system of conduct which he had never seen the House practice, and hoped he never should see. This was language which opposed the constitutional freedom of every State where the declaration of rights had been made; they all declare that every man is born equally free, and that each has an equal right to petition if aggrieved—this doctrine he never heard objected to.

The gentlemen from Virginia [Mr. Madison and Mr. Heath] had said it was a judicial and not a legislative question; they say the petition proven it, and that it ought not to be attended to. Mr. T. said he saw no proof whatever of the impropriety of the House receiving it. There might be some judicial question growing out of the case; but that was no reason, because it might possibly undergo a judicial course, that the general Government were not to be petitioned.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Smith] had said "that this was a kind of property on which the House could not legislate"; but he would answer this was a kind of property on which they were bound to legislate. The Fugitive Act could prove this authority; if petitions were not to be received, they would have to legislate in the dark. It appeared plainly that these men were manumitted by their masters; and because a number of men who called themselves legislators should, after they had the actual enjoyment of their liberty, come forward and say that these men should not remain at liberty, and actually authorize their recaptivity, he thought it exceedingly unjust to deprive them of the right of petitioning to have their injuries redressed. These were a set of men on whom the Fugitive Law had no power, and he thought they claimed protection under the power of that House, which always ought to lean toward freedom. Though they could not give freedom to slaves, yet he hoped gentlemen would never refuse to lend their aid to secure freemen in their rights against tyrannical imposition.

MR. MACON said no man wished to encourage petitions more than himself and no man had considered this subject more. These men could not receive any aid from the general Government, but by application to the State justice would be done. Trials of this kind had very frequently been brought on in all the different courts of that State, and had very often ended in the freedom of slaves; the appeal was fair, and justice was done.

MR. VARNUM said the petitioners stated themselves to be freemen, and he did not see any opposition of force to convince the House they were not; surely it could not be said that color alone should designate them as slaves. He hoped the House would take all possible care that freemen should not be made slaves; to be deprived of liberty was more important than to be deprived of property. He could not think why gentlemen should be against having the fact examined; if it appears that they are slaves, the petition will of course be dismissed, but if it should appear they are free, and receive injury under the Fugitive Act, the United States ought to amend it so that justice should be done.

MR. KITCHELL said that the question was not now whether the petitioners are or are not slaves, but it is on a law of the United States. They assert that this law does not injuriously to them; the question is, therefore, whether a committee shall be appointed to inquire into the improper force of this law on the case of these men; if they are freemen, he said, they ought not to be sent back from the most distant part of the United States to North Carolina, to have justice done them, but they ought to receive it from the general Government who made the law they complain of.

On the question for receiving the petition being put, —it was negatived—ayes 33, noes 50.

Another petition relative to slavery was presented to the House on January 2, 1800, this time against the Fugitive Law and the slave trade, praying for their repeal. The petitioners were free negroes of Philadelphia, too ignorant to sign their names, affixing their marks instead, and therefore it was evident, said those opposed to receiving the memorial, that white Abolitionists were the real movers in the matter.

This debate is notable because it contains the first threat that the South would secede if the abolition agitation were continued. The maker of the threat was the fiery John Rutledge, Jr., of South Carolina. In his speech he referred to the San Domingo insurrection, which thereafter became a stock illustration of the pro-slavery orators.

alternative I deprecate very much; that is, that we are able to take care of ourselves, and, if driven to it, we will take care of ourselves.

Samuel Goode [Va.] moved:

That the parts of the said petition which invite Congress to legislate upon subjects from which the general Government is precluded by the Constitution have a tendency to create disquiet and jealousy and ought, therefore, to receive no encouragement or countenance from this House.

The motion was adopted by a vote of—yeas 85, nay 1 [Mr. Thacher].

The question of entering into concert with foreign nations for a humanitarian purpose was brought forward in the Senate early in the session of 1817-1818 by a petition from the Society of Friends at Baltimore, asking that the Government adopt laws more effectually to prevent the slave trade from being carried on by citizens of the United States under foreign flags (Spanish and Portuguese), and also take measures, in concert with other nations (Great Britain in particular) to secure the entire abolition of the traffic.

Senator James Burrill, Jr., of Rhode Island, moved that the petition be referred to a committee to inquire into the expediency of the legislation and action which it proposed.

He was supported in his motion by Rufus King [N. Y.], David L. Morrill [N. H.]; the motion was opposed by George M. Troup [Ga.], George W. Campbell [Tenn.], and James Barbour [Va.].

The motion was debated on January 2 and 12, 1818, and carried by a vote of 17 to 16.

CONCERT WITH FOREIGN NATIONS TO SUPPRESS SLAVE TRADE

SENATE, JANUARY 2-12, 1818

SENATOR TROUP thought the petition a most extraordinary proposition, and asserted that, according to his apprehension, no measure could be adopted more replete with danger to the

JOHN RUTLEDGE, JR., M.C.

MR. RUTLEDGE thought it a little extraordinary that, when gentlemen from some parts of the Union were positively assured that very serious, nay, dreadful, effects must be the inevitable consequences of their discussion on this subject, they still would persist. He used strong words, he said, because no others would be appropriate. Gentlemen recommended the subject to be calmly argued. Would gentlemen feel calm if measures were taken to destroy most of their property? Would calmness be consistent if entering wedges were prepared to ruin the property of whole estates? Yes, we deem this as an entering wedge to an inevitable loss of our property, if persisted in.

Three emissaries from St. Domingo appeared in the hall of the French Convention, demanding the emancipation of their species from slavery. The convention were told it would operate as an entering wedge that would go to the destruction of property and the loss of one of the finest islands in the world; that it would be murderous in the extreme; that it would open scenes which had never been practised since the destruction of Carthage; that a whole rich country would be buried in blood; that thousands would instantly be reduced to abject penury; that the first towns in that fine island would be reduced to a heap of ashes. But those gentlemen said no, it cannot be, all our desires originate in philanthropy—we wish to do good! But, sir, we have lived to see these dreadful scenes. These horrid effects have succeeded what was conceived once to be trifling.

Most important consequences may likewise on the result of the present anti-slavery agitation, although gentlemen little apprehend it. There have been Abolition emissaries among us in the Southern States; they have begun their war upon us; an actual organization has commenced; we have had then meeting in their club rooms and debating on that subject, and determinations have been made.

I recollect that gentlemen in France used arguments like the gentleman from Massachusetts [George Thacher]: "We can indemnify these proprietors." But how did they do it, or how can it be done? Not at all. Further, we were told these things would take place, we need not be alarmed; it was inevitable; that it was reasonable and unavoidable. Sir, it never will take place. There is one alternative which will save us from it, but that welfare, to the very existence, of this country, than a formal coalition, for any purposes, with any foreign nation whatever. It was a policy, a resort to which ought always to be resisted. He was ready to go as far as anyone in enforcing, within our own jurisdiction, the abolition of the African slave trade, but to direct the President to enter into any compact or concert for this subject with any foreign nation or individuals was a step he would never consent to. He could not separate from foreign alliances the idea of foreign politics and foreign wars; and the proposed measure he should view as the commencement of a system of foreign connections tending to foreign alliances, to which Mr. T. expressed great repugnance.

SENATOR BURRILL entirely agreed to the impolicy of foreign alliances, but he could not view the proposed concert in this light, nor could he conceive that any such disastrous consequences would follow it as had been anticipated by the gentleman from Georgia. Nor was the principle of the proposed concert a novelty in this country. By referring to the treaty of Ghent it would be found that our ministers had either made or received overtures on this very subject, and a provision was in consequence inserted in the treaty.¹ The concert had been considered as indispensable to bring about the entire abolition of the slave trade; and, Mr. B. said, it had been found impossible to put an entire stop to it without a coöperation among the nations prohibiting it; for, no matter how many nations prohibit the trade, if one or two are allowed to carry it on, the evil will still exist.

SENATOR KING said it was the boast of this nation that it had the reputation of having been the first to begin the abolition of the African slave trade. The example of this country had excited the emulation of other nations, and all of them having any connection with this trade, except Spain and Portugal, had come into the measures for its abolition. Those two had taken time for further consideration, and so long as their decision was suspended the regulations of other nations would be inefficient; an entire abolition of the traffic in slaves would never be effected until all united to suppress it. So long as Spain or Portugal permitted this trade, and so long as any of our own people, to their disgrace, continued to pursue it under those flags, it was necessary to the honor and the interest of this country to concur in any proper measures for its suppression. He could not perceive, he said, how such a measure as this motion looked to could lead to any such entangling connection as had been apprehended. What was proposed was an honest and moral concert to put an end to a traffic which is an abomination on the earth.

SENATOR CAMPBELL declared his unwillingness to enter into any compact whatever with any foreign power to regulate our own conduct or to carry our laws into effect. Two nations had thought proper still to permit the trade alluded to. What compact, said Mr. C., are we to form with others to induce these nations to forbid it? Are we to require Spain and Portugal to give up this trade? Are we to unite with France and England to urge them to give it up? And, should they yet refuse, are we to attempt to force them by arms to do so? Are we, he asked, prepared to risk a war for this object? He confessed he could not see to what other result the proposition tended.

SENATOR BURRILL said if the Senate should refuse the inquiry it might give rise to unjust surmises and suspicions as to the sincerity of the Government in passing laws for this purpose, and in entering into the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent. The Senate should be cautious not to give ground for the disgraceful suspicion that they are not sincere and hearty in this cause of suffering humanity. Every gentleman in this House wishes for the entire abolition of this abominable traffic, and this is the general voice of the country. The gentlemen here representing the slaveholding States are as decided as any others on this point, and one of those States (Virginia) was entitled, he believed, to the honor of having been the first State to prohibit it.

SENATOR BARBOUR said America stands in the relation to the rest of the world that Virginia does to America. She took the lead in the humane effort to exterminate this horrible traffic. He rejoiced to see that the great nations of Europe had adopted her precepts, and were imitating her enlightened and philanthropic example. Spain and Portugal constitute the only exception; the former, it is said, with what truth he knew not, has received a pecuniary compensation to abandon the traffic. Should this be true, as he cordially hoped it might be, Portugal will then stand alone. It is reasonably to be anticipated that she will not be able to resist the incumbent load of the civilized world; when their remonstrances are enforced by the united influence of justice, humanity, and philanthropy. Africa, then freed from those disastrous effects which this trade has produced, may, under the benign influence of peace, reason, and religion, indulge a hope that in the fulness of time she may participate in the blessings of civilization, with all its benefithusiastic; but, sir, allow me to be honest, believe me sincere, permit me to be plain. In New England we believe "all men are born equally free and independent"—thus commences our "Bill of Rights." Whatever their color, powers of mind, property, or rank in society, they are freemen—citizens, not slaves. They have a claim to that freedom in this asylum of liberty.

JOSEPH HEINTER'S CLAIMS TO THE VOTES OF A CHRISTIAN PEOPLE

From the collection of the New York Historical Society

Shall I not desire the termination of slavery? It is a duty, sir, I owe to myself, my country, and my God.

I am in favor of the resolution, sir, because its object comports with the dictates of reason and humanity. Though black, they are human beings, in human shape. That is not their crime, but their misfortune. We then ought to commiserate, not enslave them. Let exertions be made to raise them from cent effects. Nor was he averse to adopting measures in concert with any nation which he believed would be calculated to hasten the destruction of this trade. For his part, he feared nothing from an alliance with any nation whose only object was humanity. No man could more highly appreciate than he did the soundness of the political maxim inculcated by the Father of his Country, in his legacy to the American people—that of avoiding entangling alliances with other nations; yet, with all his reverence for this wise precept and his determination to pursue its suggestions, he felt no apprehension from the concert proposed. A concert like the one proposed is in its character novel; its object is humanity; while alliances denounced by the above wise maxim have for their object dominion and power, to be acquired by the misery of mankind; to extricate a nation from which is not unfrequently attended with a violation of honor; or, if executed, it is frequently with the sacrifice of peace and sometimes with ruin.

In so far, then, as the principal project of the resolution is concerned, or the means of effecting it, he would go with the mover; but the part to which he objected was that proposing that Congress should unite with other nations to produce the object; this he considered to be improper. Congress can act only in its legislative capacity; and, by consequence, can enter into no concert with other nations. That has been assigned to another branch of the Government. It is through the Executive alone that intercourse and arrangements with other nations can be effected. Leave it, therefore, where the Constitution has placed it, without discussing the question how far this body has a right to advise, in its executive character, the Chief Magistrate upon the propriety of entering into new arrangements with foreign nations; a question on which there is a difference of opinion.

SENATOR TROUP said: This word concert, Mr. President, means something—it means connection, combination, alliance, for a given object; it means entangling alliance. You propose a concert with crowned heads! They never concert with themselves, but broils, and quarrels, and wars follow in the train. History is full of them; and, if entangling connections, sir, between monarchs, who wield the sword and the purse, who make peace and war at their will, be fruitful of these mischiefs, what may we not expect when you enter the lists without the means of doing what you engage to do?

SENATOR MORRILL said: Coming from New England, where slavery is unknown, my prejudices may be strong, my views en-their present state of degradation; assist in the mighty work. Every human affection recoils at their bondage. May every benevolent heart beat high for their freedom, and every human arm be extended for their emancipation. It is a cause, sir, in which the world is engaged. As it was commenced by the United States, let them continue their efforts; let Congress say, with all civilized nations, they will joyfully bear a part to accomplish an object so desirable, so humane.

But, sir, I am in favor of the resolution in a political point of view. Carry the great design into effect, and you place those forlorn objects within the reach of political and moral instruction. The basis on which every good government most firmly stands is knowledge and virtue. Diffuse and extend these sacred principles, and you enlarge the basis on which your Government is built; and, in the same proportion, you carry the principles of liberty and the rights of man to those who grope in darkness, and aid in the emancipation of those who are bound in the chains of despotism.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the resolution in a moral point of view. We, sir, are a Christian nation. The Bible is our moral guide. Are not its principles sacred, its precepts salutary, and its commands obligatory? Have not the frowns of indignant Heaven, and the threatenings of Jehovah, rested on nations and cities for their ingratitude to their fellow mortals? Babylon—Babylon the great has fallen! What has brought her down? The scene is viewed in prospect. "The merchants of the earth shall weep and mourn over her." In what did her commerce consist? "In gold, and silver, and precious stones, and pearls, and chariots, and slaves, and the souls of men." Ah, Mr. President, this was the climax of their abominations! They had a traffic in slaves and the souls of men. This brought down the judgments of Heaven. That they may be averted from the world, let the inhuman traffic be abolished to the end of the earth.

In accordance with the report of this and subsequent committees Congress, by the Acts of April 20, 1818, and March 3, 1819, authorized the President to send cruisers to the coast of Africa to stop the slave trade, and by the Act of May 15, 1820, declared the traffic to be piracy. By the Webster-Ashburton treaty of 1842 the Governments of the United States and Great Britain agreed to maintain independent squadrons on the African coast to act in conjunction. However, the slave trade with the United States was not entirely suppressed until the close of the Civil War.

The trade was most active in the years just prior to the war, when the domestic supply of slaves was insufficient to fill the demand for them created by the development of the Southwest. In 1859-60, 85 vessels were fitted out from New York as slavers, and it is estimated that they introduced into the country from 30,000 to 60,000 negroes. During these years the repeal of the laws against the trade was actively urged by many prominent statesmen and newspapers of the South and openly demanded and justified in political conventions, such as the Democratic convention at Charleston, S. C., in 1860 [see Vol. V, chapter vii].

THE specific issue under which the slavery question agitated the country for the greater part of the period from the formation of the Constitution under the Civil War was that of restrictions in regard to slavery in the formation of Territories and the admission into the Union of new States. As has been related in Volume I [see page 267], the Northwest Territory had been organized in 1787 with the exclusion of slavery.

On March 23, 1798, the question of the organization of the Territory of Mississippi (comprising roughly the present States of Alabama and Mississippi) came before the House. A resolution was offered, giving the Territory the government of the Northwest Territory as established by the Ordinance of 1787, with the exception of the prohibition of slavery. George Thacher [Mass.] offered an amendment striking out the excepting clause, and so prohibiting slavery in the Southern Territories as well as in the Northern. The question was put on Mr. Thacher's amendment and negatived, there being only 12 votes in its favor.

Senator Thomas H. Benton remarks of this discussion in his "Debates of Congress" that it "was the first debate on the prohibition of slavery in a Territory which took place under the Federal Constitution, and it is to be observed that the constitutional power of Congress to make the prohibition was not questioned by any speaker. Expedient objections only were urged."

At the close of the War of 1812 the free and slave States were the same in number, nine and nine. In 1816 (under Madison's Administration) Indiana was admitted into the Union as free soil, being a part of the Northwest Territory in which slavery had been prohibited by the Ordinance of 1787. In 1817 Mississippi was formed as a State out of the western part of Mississippi Territory, which had been organized as slave territory. In 1818 Illinois was admitted under the same conditions as Indiana. To preserve the equality of slave and free States the next State should be admitted as slave. When therefore the northern part of Missouri Territory (organized by various Acts of Congress from 1812 onward, out of the Louisiana Purchase, wherein slavery prevailed and was recognized by the treaty with France) applied for admission into the Union, late in 1818, the Southern Congressmen assumed that it would be admitted as slave. They were therefore greatly incensed when James Tallmadge, Jr. [N. Y.], on February 13, 1819, moved an amendment to the bill for its admission declaring all its inhabitants free who should be born after the date of admission, and providing for the gradual emancipation of those now held in bondage.

GREAT AMERICAN DEBATES

Mr. Tallmadge's amendment was debated from February 13 to 15, when it was adopted in the Committee of the Whole by a vote of 79 to 67.

The principal speakers in favor of the amendment were, in addition to Mr. Tallmadge, John W. Taylor [N. Y.], Timothy Fuller [Mass.], and Arthur Livermore [N. H.]. Philip P. Barbour [Va.] was the only speaker in the negative whose remarks were reported at length.

Henry Clay [Ky.], the Speaker of the House, opposed the amendment, but his arguments must be gleaned from the replies made by his opponents.

Of this debate Senator Benton, in his "Debates of Congress," remarks:

This was the commencement of the great Missouri agitation which was settled by the compromise. No two words have been more confounded of late than these of the restriction and compromise—so much so that some of the eminent speakers of the time have had their speeches against the restriction quoted as being against the compromise—of which they were zealous advocates. Though often confounded, no two measures could be more opposite in their nature and effects. The restriction was to operate upon a State—the compromise on territory. The restriction was to prevent the State of Missouri from admitting slavery—the compromise was to admit slavery there, and to divide the rest of Louisiana about equally between free and slave soil. The restriction came from the North—the compromise from the South. The restriction raised the storm—the compromise allayed it.

RESTRICTION OF SLAVERY IN MISSOURI

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 13-15, 1819

MR. TAYLOR.—Our votes this day will determine whether the high destinies of this region and of these generations shall be fulfilled, or whether we shall defeat them by permitting slavery, with all its baleful consequences, to inherit the land. Let the magnitude of this question plead my apology, while I briefly address a few considerations to the sober judgment of patriots and statesmen.

First. Has Congress power to require of Missouri a constitutional prohibition against the further introduction of slavery as a condition of her admission into the Union?

Second. If the power exist, is it wise to exercise it?

The third section of the fourth article of the Constitution declares that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other property, belonging to the United States."

After the formation of a Territory the Congress may admit the State into the Union in pursuance of a power delegated by the same section of the Constitution, in the following words: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union." This grant of power is evidently alternative; its exercise is committed to the sound discretion of Congress; no injustice is done by declining it. But if Congress has the power of altogether refusing to admit new States, much more has it the power of prescribing such conditions of admission as may be judged reasonable. The exercise of this power until now has never been questioned. The act of 1802, under which Ohio was admitted into the Union, prescribed the condition that its constitution should not be repugnant to the ordinance of 1787. The sixth article of that ordinance declares, "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted." The same condition was imposed by Congress on the people of Indiana and Illinois. These States have all complied with it and framed constitutions excluding slavery. Missouri lies in the same latitude. Its soil, productions, and climate are the same, and the same principles of government should be applied to it.

But it is said that, by the treaty of 1803, with the French Republic [cession of Louisiana] Congress is restrained from imposing this condition. The third article is quoted as containing the prohibition. It is in the following words: "The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and, in the meantime, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess." The treaty made no provision for the erection of new States in the ceded territory. That was a question of national policy, properly reserved for the decision of those to whom the constitution had committed the power.

maintained that, although we have the power to dispose of the whole Territory, we have no right to provide against the further increase of slavery within its limits? That, although we may change the political relations of its free citizens by transferring their country to a foreign power, we cannot provide for the gradual abolition of slavery within its limits, nor establish those civil regulations which naturally flow from self-evident truth? No, sir, it cannot; the practice of nations and the common sense of mankind have long since decided these questions.

Having proved, as I apprehend, our right to legislate in the manner proposed, I proceed to illustrate the propriety of exercising it. And here I might rest satisfied with reminding my opponents of their own declarations on the subject of slavery. How often and how eloquently have they deplored its existence among them? Gentlemen have now an opportunity of putting their principles into practice; if they have tried slavery and found it a curse; if they desire to dissipate the gloom with which it covers their land, I call upon them to exclude it from the Territory in question; plant not its seeds in this uncorrupt soil; let not our children, looking back to the proceedings of this day, say of them, as they have been constrained to speak of their fathers, "we wish their decision had been different; we regret the existence of this unfortunate population among us; but we found them here: we know not what to do with them; it is our misfortune, we must bear it with patience."

History will record the decision of this day as exerting its influence for centuries to come over the population of half our continent. If we reject the amendment and suffer this evil, now easily eradicated, to strike its roots so deep in the soil that it can never be removed, shall we not furnish some apology for doubting our sincerity when we deplore its existence—shall we not expose ourselves to the same kind of censure which was pronounced by the Saviour of mankind upon the Scribes and Pharisees, who builded the tombs of the prophets and garnished the sepulchres of the righteous, and said, if they had lived in the days of their fathers, they would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets, while they manifested a spirit which clearly proved them the legitimate descendants of those who killed the prophets, and thus filled up the measure of their fathers' iniquity?

Mr. Chairman, one of the gentlemen from Kentucky [Mr. Clay] has pressed into his service the cause of humanity. He has pathetically urged us to withdraw our amendment and suf-

The treaty, therefore, has no operation on the question in debate. Its requirements, however, have been faithfully fulfilled. In 1804 the laws of the United States were extended to that territory. In 1811 a law was passed to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and to provide for its admission into the Union. Did Congress then doubt its power to annex conditions to such admission? No, sir, far from it. The government of Orleans had always been administered according to the principles of the civil law. The common law, so highly valued in other parts of our country, was not recognized there. Trial by jury was unknown to the inhabitants. Instead of a privilege, they considered its introduction an odious departure from their ancient administration of justice. Left to themselves, they never would have introduced it. Congress, however, knowing these things, made it a condition of their admission into the Union that trial by jury should be secured to the citizen by a constitutional provision.

Even the language of the Territory was required to be changed as a condition of its admission. French and Spanish were the only languages generally spoken or even understood. But Congress required from them a constitutional provision that their legislative and judicial proceedings should be conducted in the English language. They were not left at liberty to determine this point for themselves. From these facts it appears that Congress, at that day, acted from a conviction that it possessed the power of prescribing the conditions of their admission into the Union.

Gentlemen have said the amendment is in violation of the treaty, because it impairs the property of a master in his slave. Is it then pretended that, notwithstanding the declaration in our bill of rights, "that all men are created equal," one individual can have a vested property not only in the flesh and blood of his fellowman, but also in generations not yet called into existence? Can it be believed that the supreme legislature has no power to provide rules and regulations for ameliorating the condition of future ages? And this, too, when the Constitution itself has vested in Congress full sovereignty, by authorizing the enactment of whatever law it may deem conducive to the welfare of the country. The sovereignty of Congress in relation to the States is limited by specific grants—but in regard to the Territories it is unlimited. Missouri was purchased with our money, and, until incorporated into the family of States, it may be sold for money. Can it then be fer this unfortunate population to be dispersed over the country. He says they will be better fed, clothed, and sheltered, and their whole condition will be greatly improved. Sir, true humanity disowns his invocation. The humanity to which he appeals is base coin; it is counterfeit, it is that humanity which seeks to palliate disease by the application of nostrums, which scatter its seeds through the whole system—which saves a finger to-day, but amputates the arm to-morrow. Sir, my heart responds to the call of humanity; I will zealously unite in any practicable means of bettering the condition of this oppressed people. I am ready to appropriate a territory to their use, and to aid them in settling it—but I am not willing, I never will consent, to declare the whole country west of the Mississippi a market overt for human flesh. In vain will you enact severe laws against the importation of slaves if you create for them an additional demand by opening the western world to their employment. While a negro man is bought in Africa for a few gewgaws or a bottle of whisky, and sold at New Orleans for twelve or fifteen hundred dollars, avarice will stimulate to the violation of your laws. Notwithstanding the penalties and confiscations denounced in your statutes and actually enforced on all detected offenders, the slave trade continues. A vigilant execution of the laws may diminish it, but, while you increase the demand and offer so great temptation to the cupidity of unprincipled men, they will encounter every peril in the prosecution of this unhallowed traffic.

It is objected that the amendment is calculated to disfranchise our brethren of the South by discouraging their emigration to the country west of the Mississippi. If it were proposed to discriminate between citizens of the different sections of our Union and allow a Pennsylvanian to hold slaves there while the power was denied to a Virginian, the objection might very properly be made; but when we place all on an equal footing, denying to all what we deny to one, I am unable to discover the injustice or inequality of which honorable gentlemen have thought proper to complain. The description of emigrants may be affected in some measure by the amendment in question. If slavery shall be tolerated, the country will be settled by rich planters, with their slaves; if it shall be rejected, the emigrants will chiefly consist of the poorer and more laborious classes of society. If it be true that the prosperity and happiness of a country ought to constitute the grand object of its legislators, I cannot hesitate for a moment which species of population deserves most to be encouraged by the laws we may pass. Gentlemen, in their zeal to oppose the amendment, appear to have considered but one side of the case. If the rejection of slavery will tend to discourage emigration from the South, will not its admission have the same effect in relation to the North and East? Whence came the people who, with a rapidity never before witnessed, have changed the wilderness between the Ohio and Mississippi into fruitful fields; who have erected there, in a period almost too short for the credibility of future ages, three of the freest and most flourishing States in our Union?

Do you believe that these people will settle in a country where they must take rank with negro slaves? Having neither the ability nor will to hold slaves themselves, they labor cheerfully while labor is honorable; make it disgraceful, they will despise it. You cannot degrade it more effectually than by establishing a system whereby it shall be performed principally by slaves. The business in which they are generally engaged, be it what it may, soon becomes debased in public estimation. It is considered low and unfit for freemen. I cannot better acter of an American Congress to barter the present happiness and future safety of unborn millions for a few pieces of pelf, for a few cents on an acre of land. For myself, I would no sooner contaminate the national treasury with such ill-gotten gold than I would tarnish the fame of our national ships by directing their employment in the African slave trade.

If I agreed in opinion with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cobb] that this amendment does not present an insurmountable barrier against the further introduction of slavery; that Missouri, after becoming a State, may call a convention and change this feature of her constitution—even then I should consider the amendment scarcely less important than if it were a fundamental and unalterable compact. On this subject we have experience, and the result has justified the best hopes of our country. Slavery was excluded from the Territories north of the Ohio. Our power over their municipal regulations has since been withdrawn; they have taken the government into their own hands. But who has not seen the moral effect produced on the inhabitants by the ordinance of 1787? It is as permanent as the soil over which it was established. The exclusion of slavery from all these States is now more effectually insured by public sentiment than by their constitutional prohibitions. Require the government of Missouri to commence right, and the same moral effect will then be produced. No convention of the people will ever permit the future introduction of slaves. Let their political institutions be established in wisdom, and I shall confidently trust in the good sense of the people to direct them hereafter. But, be the event as it may, I at least shall have the satisfaction of reflecting that, if the misfortune of slavery shall be entailed upon this country, everything in my power will have been done to prevent it.

Mr. FULLER.—The Constitution expressly makes a republican form of government in the several States a fundamental principle, to be preserved under the sacred guarantee of the National Legislature. [Art. 4, Sec. 4.] Now, sir, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Tallmadge] merely requires that slavery shall be prohibited in Missouri. Does this imply anything more than that its constitution shall be republican? The existence of slavery in any State is so far a departure from republican principles. The Declaration of Independence, penned by the illustrious statesman then and at this time a citizen of a State which admits slavery, defines the principle on which our national and State constitutions are all professedly founded. The second paragraph of that instrument be-illustrate this truth than by referring to a remark of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Clay]. I have often admired the liberality of his sentiments. He is governed by no vulgar prejudices; yet with what abhorrence did he speak of the performance, by your wives and daughters, of those domestic offices which he was pleased to call servile! What comparison did he make between the "black slaves" of Kentucky and the "white slaves" of the North; and how instantly did he strike a balance in favor of the condition of the former! If such opinions and expressions, even in the ardor of debate, can fall from that honorable gentleman, what ideas do you suppose are entertained of laboring men by the majority of slaveholders? Whom of that class have they ever called to fill stations of any considerable responsibility? When have we seen a Representative on this floor, from that section of our Union, who was not a slaveholder? I appeal to gentlemen whether the selection of a laboring man, however well educated, would not be considered an extraordinary event?

An argument has been urged by a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Barbour] against the proposed amendment connected with our revenues. He said that by prohibiting the further introduction of slaves into the proposed State we should reduce the price and diminish the sales of our public lands. In my opinion, the effect would be precisely the reverse. True it is that lands for cultivation have sold higher in Alabama than in Illinois, but this is owing not to the rejection of slavery in the one and its admission into the other, but to the different staples they are capable of producing. The advanced price of cotton has created in the market a demand for lands suited to its cultivation and enhanced their value far beyond any former precedent. But, to test the truth of the position, we must ascertain the relative value of land in adjoining States, the one allowing and the other rejecting slavery, where the climate, soil, productions, and advantages of market are similar. Pennsylvania and Maryland furnish fair specimens of comparison in all these respects. But here the result is in direct opposition to the conjecture of the gentleman from Virginia. Land on the Pennsylvania side of the line, where the power of holding slaves does not exist, uniformly sells at a higher price than lands of equal quality on the Maryland side, where the power is in full exercise. It, therefore, is probable that the further introduction of slavery into Missouri, far from increasing, would actually diminish the value of our public lands. But, should the fact be otherwise, I entreat gentlemen to consider whether it become the high char-gins thus: "We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal—that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights—that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Since, then, it cannot be denied that slaves are men, it follows that they are in a purely republican government both free, and are entitled to liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Mr. Fuller was here interrupted by several gentlemen, who thought it improper to question in debate the republican character of the slaveholding States, which had also a tendency, as one gentleman [Mr. Colston of Virginia] said, to deprive those States of the right to hold slaves as property, and he adverted to the probability that there might be slaves in the gallery listening to the debate.

Mr. F. assured the gentleman that nothing was further from his thoughts than to question on that floor the right of Virginia and other States which held slaves when the Constitution was established to continue to hold them. With that subject the national legislature could not interfere, and ought not to attempt it. Sir, it is my wish to allay, not to excite, local animosities; but I shall never refrain from advancing such arguments in debate as my duty requires, nor do I believe that the reading of our Declaration of Independence, or a discussion of republican principles on any occasion, can endanger the rights or merit the disapprobation of any portion of the Union.

The honorable Speaker cites the first clause in the second section of the fourth article: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States," which he thinks would be violated by the condition proposed in the constitution of Missouri. To keep slaves—to make one portion of the population the property of another—hardly deserves to be called a privilege, since what is gained by the masters must be lost by the slaves. But, independently of this consideration, I think the observations already offered to the committee, showing that holding the black population in servitude is an exception to the general principles of the Constitution, and cannot be allowed to extend beyond the fair import of the terms by which that exception is provided, are a sufficient answer to the objection. The speaker proceeds in the same train of reasoning, and asks, if Congress can require one condition, how many more can be required, and where these conditions will end? With regard to a republican constitution, Congress are obliged to require that condition, and that is enough for the present question; but I contend, further, that Congress has a right, at their discretion, to require any other reasonable condition. Several others were required of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Mississippi. The State of Louisiana, which was a part of the territory ceded to us at the same time with Missouri, was required to provide in her constitution for trials by jury, the writ of habeas corpus, the principles of civil and religious liberty, with several others peculiar to that State. These certainly are, none of them, more indispensable ingredients in a republican form of government than the equality of privileges of all the population; yet these have not been denied to be reasonable and warranted by the national Constitution in the admission of new States.

One gentleman, however, has contended against the amendment because it abridges the rights of the slave-holding States to transport their slaves to the new States for sale or otherwise. This argument is attempted to be enforced in various ways, and particularly by the clause in the Constitution last cited. It admits, however, of a very clear answer by recurring to the ninth section of article first, which provides that "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States then existing shall admit shall not be prohibited by Congress till 1808." This clearly implies that the migration and importation may be prohibited after that year. The importation has been prohibited, but the migration has not hitherto been restrained; Congress, however, may restrain it when it may be judged expedient. Hitherto it has not been found necessary for Congress to prohibit migration or transportation from State to State. But now it becomes the right and duty of Congress to guard against the further extension of the intolerable evil and the crying enormity of slavery.

The expediency of this measure is very apparent. The opening of an extensive slave market will tempt the cupidity of those who otherwise perhaps might gradually emancipate their slaves. We have heard much, Mr. Chairman, of the Colonization Society,² an institution which is the favorite of the humane gentlemen in the slave-holding States. They have long been lamenting the miseries of slavery and earnestly seeking for a remedy compatible with their own safety and the happiness of their slaves. At last the great desideratum is found—a colony in Africa for the emancipated blacks. How will the generous innal States; but why does it not? Because they themselves, in the exercise of their legislative power, have willed that it shall be so. But, though it does not now exist, it is competent for them, by a law of their own enactment, to authorize it—to call it into existence whenever they shall think fit.

Sir, how different would be the situation of Missouri if the proposed amendment be adopted. The State would obviously labor under this disadvantage in relation to the other States; that, whereas the older free States might introduce slavery, Missouri could not, unless, indeed, another opinion, which has been advanced, is correct, that Missouri might forthwith change its constitution, and get rid of the difficulty. If that be the case, sir, as has been justly remarked, we were doing worse than nothing to legislate upon the subject.

But, said he, if we pursue this reasoning still further, and follow it up to all the consequences to which it will lead, we shall be more forcibly struck with its impropriety. If we have a right to go one step in relation to new States, beyond the footing upon which the original States stand; if we have a right to shear them of one beam more of sovereignty, we have the same right to take from them any other attribute of sovereign power.

Again, if we had the power to say that their constitution should provide that there should not be slavery, we had the same power over the converse of the proposition, and to require them to provide that there should be slavery; he believed this latter principle would not be contended for.

It is said that the like prohibition has been enacted as it respects the States northwest of the River Ohio. In the first place, the House would recollect that an ordinance was passed by the old Congress, at a period anterior to the present Constitution, ordaining that as a fundamental article in relation to all the Northwest Territory, and therefore the precedent, if it would otherwise have any weight, failed in its application. But, he said, he did not hesitate to express it as his decided opinion that the ordinance which he had just mentioned was utterly void, and, consequently, that those States might introduce slavery among them, if they so willed, because the territory which composes them originally belonged to Virginia. She had conquered it by her arms; she ceded it to the United States upon the express condition that it should be formed into States as free, sovereign, and independent as the other States. The prohibition of slavery was ordained by the Continental Congress, after the session had been made, which would unquestionably render tentions of these humane persons be frustrated if the price of slaves is to be doubled by a new and boundless market! In stead of emancipation of the slaves, it is much to be feared that unprincipled wretches will be found kidnapping those who are already free, and transporting and selling the hapless victims into hopeless bondage. Sir, I really hope that Congress will not contribute to discountenance and render abortive the generous and philanthropic views of this most worthy and laudable society.

Mr. BARROUR.—Our power in relation to this subject is derived from the first clause of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution, which is in these words: "New States may be admitted, by the Congress, into this Union." Now, sir, although, by the next succeeding clause of the same section, "Congress has the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States"; and although, therefore, while the proposed State continued a part of our territory, upon the footing of a territorial government, it would have been competent for us, under the power expressly given, to make needful rules and regulations—to have established the principle now proposed; yet the question assumes a totally different aspect when that principle is intended to apply to a State. This term State has a fixed and determinate meaning; in itself it imports the existence of a political community free and independent, and entitled to exercise all the rights of sovereignty of every description whatever. As it stands in the Constitution, it is to be defined with some limitation upon that principle of construction which has reference to the subject-matter. The extent of the limitation, according to this rule, is obviously this, that it shall enjoy all those rights of sovereignty which belong to the original States which composed the Federal family, and into a union with which it is to be admitted. Now, sir, although the original States are shorn of many of their beams of sovereignty—such, for example, as that of declaring war, of regulating commerce, etc.; yet we know that, even by an express amendment to the Constitution, all powers not expressly delegated are reserved to the States respectively; and of course the power in question of deciding whether slavery shall or shall not exist.

Gentlemen had said that slavery was prohibited in many of the original States. Does not the House, said Mr. B., at the first glance, perceive the answer to this remark? It is an argument from fact to principle, and in this its utter fallacy consists. It is true that slavery does not exist in many of the origithose States less sovereign than the original States of the Federal Union.

But it has been said that we imposed conditions on the admission of the State of Louisiana into the Union. What were those conditions? That civil and religious liberty should be established, and the trial by jury secured. It cannot be necessary to remind the House that these several provisions attached also to the original States, by the most explicit declaration to that effect, in the first, fifth, and seventh amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Our business is to create a political community of a particular character, as prescribed by the constitution; to itself it will belong to regulate its interior concerns, and, among others, to decide whether it will or will not admit involuntary servitude.

In respect to the justice of the measure, he would beg leave to submit some remarks to the House. Although the slaves in the South were held as property, although certainly degraded in the scale of society by reason of their servitude, we felt for them those sympathies which bind one man to another, though that other may be our inferior. Such were the feelings of the Southern people toward their slaves that nothing scarcely but the necessity of the master would induce him to sell a faithful slave. If the master emigrated, he would carry his slaves with him, not only for the various reasons which he had already stated, but because, going into a wilderness, where much labor was necessary to clear the country, they were, on that account, peculiarly necessary. Under those circumstances a prohibition of the importation of slaves would, in almost every instance, be tantamount to a prohibition of the emigration of the Southern people to the State of Missouri. He asked whether it could be just to adopt such a regulation as would open an illimitable tract of the most fertile land to the northern part of the United States, and, in effect, entirely shut out the whole Southern people? If it were correct in relation to Missouri, it would be equally so as to the whole tract of country lying west of the Mississippi. He hoped, from this view of the subject, the House would be struck with its monstrous injustice.

Again, he would ask if it can be good policy to perpetuate fixed boundaries, either natural or artificial, between the slave-holding and non-slaveholding States? He had thought that the great object of our Federal compact was union. The surest possible mode of securing our political union, next to promoting the common defence and general welfare, is to give, as far as possible, every facility to the intercourse between the different sections of this extensive Republic; that, by the attrition which will be the result of that intercourse, the asperities of our mutual prejudices and jealousies may be rubbed off; and, in short, that we may be knit together by a sympathy of feelings, by a community of habits and manners which ought to bind us together as brothers of the same great political family. Already in the Northern part of our country, together with that north-west of the river Ohio, divided from us by those distinguishing names of slaveholding and non-slaveholding. Let us not make the Mississippi another great natural boundary for the purpose of perpetuating the same distinctions and dividing our country into castes. Gentlemen mistake when they suppose that, if slaves be permitted to be carried to Missouri, the Northern people will not emigrate to that State. Look at the fact in the Southern States; the Northern hive is continually pouring forth its swarms of emigrants, and many of them, especially of the mercantile class, alight and settle among us; they soon become familiar with our habits and modes of life, prosper in an eminent degree, far beyond our own people, and, indeed, he hesitated not to say, were entirely satisfied and happy, although they were in a slaveholding State. Gentlemen equally mistake when they suppose that their countrymen of the North, who are obliged to labor, would be degraded to a level with the slaves. Sir, our experience proves the contrary. We, too, have some of our citizens who are unable to purchase slaves, and who, therefore, till the ground with their own hands. But, sir, notwithstanding this, they have all that erectness of character which belongs to them as freemen, conscious of their political and civil rights; and he who should dare to treat them with disrespect, because fortune had not poured as much wealth into their laps as into his, would draw down upon him the execration of all good men.

Another effect of this amendment would be, in an essential degree, to affect the value of the countless millions of public lands beyond the Mississippi. He said he had already endeavored to show that it would obstruct the emigration from the Southern States. Precisely in proportion as it produced this effect, it would, of course, lessen the number of purchasers, and diminish the competition.

Mr. LIVINGSTON spoke as follows: I propose to show what slavery is, and to mention a few of the many evils which follow in its train; and I hope to evince that we are not bound to tolerate the existence of so disgraceful a state of things beyond its present extent, and that it would be impolitic and very unjust our institutions, and that to tolerate slavery beyond the narrowest limits prescribed for it by the Constitution is a perversion of them all.

Slavery, sir, I repeat, is not established by our Constitution; but a part of the States are indulged in the commission of a sin from which they could not at once be restrained, and which they would not consent to abandon. But, sir, if we could, by any process of reasoning, be brought to believe it justifiable to hold others to involuntary servitude, policy forbids that we should increase it. Even the present slaveholding States have an interest, I think, in limiting the extent of involuntary servitude; for, should slaves become much more numerous, and, conscious of their strength, draw the sword against their masters, it will be to the free States that the masters must resort for an efficient power to suppress servile insurrection.

An opportunity is now presented, if not to diminish, at least to prevent, the growth of a sin which sits heavy on the soul of every one of us. By embracing this opportunity we may relieve the national character, and, in some degree, our own. But if we suffer it to pass unimproved, let us at least be consistent, and declare that our Constitution was made to impose slavery, and not to establish liberty. Let us no longer tell idle tales about the gradual abolition of slavery; away with colonization societies if their design is only to rid us of free blacks and turbulent slaves; have done also with Bible societies whose views are extended to Africa and the East Indies, while they overlook the deplorable condition of their sable brethren within our own borders; make no more laws to prohibit the importation of slaves, for the world must see that the object of such laws is alone to prevent the glutting of a prodigious market for the flesh and blood of man, which we are about to establish in the West, and to enhance the price of sturdy wretches, reared like black cattle and horses for sale on our own plantations.

On the following day (February 16) the amendment of Mr. Tallmadge was altered in character, divided into two sections, and then passed; the first section, prohibiting the further introduction of slavery, by a vote of 87 to 76, and the second, emancipating at the age of 25 all slaves born in the State after its admission into the Union, by a vote of 82 to 78.

The House then passed the bill to admit Missouri into the Union.

The bill was sent to the Senate on February 17, 1819.

to let it spread over the whole face of our Western territory. Slavery in the United States is the condition of man subjected to the will of a master who can make any disposition of him short of taking away his life. In those States where it is tolerated, laws are enacted making it penal to instruct slaves in the art of reading, and they are not permitted to attend public worship or to hear the Gospel preached. Thus the light of science and of religion is utterly excluded from the mind, that the body may be more easily bowed down to servitude. The bodies of slaves may, with impunity, be prostituted to any purpose and deformed in any manner by their owners. The sympathies of nature in slaves are disregarded; mothers and children are sold and separated; the children wring their little hands and expire in agonies of grief, while the bereft mothers commit suicide in despair. How long will the desire of wealth render us blind to the sin of holding both the bodies and souls of our fellow-men in chains! But, sir, I am admonished of the Constitution, and told that we cannot emancipate slaves. I know we may not infringe that instrument, and therefore do not propose to emancipate slaves. The proposition before us goes only to prevent our citizens from making slaves of such as have a right to freedom. In the present slaveholding States let slavery continue, for our boasted Constitution connives at it; but do not, for the sake of cotton and tobacco, let it be told to future ages that, while pretending to love liberty, we have purchased an extensive country to disgrace it with the foulest reproach of nations. Our Constitution requires no such thing of us. The ends for which that supreme law was made are succinctly stated in its preface. They are, first, to form a more perfect union and insure domestic tranquillity. Will slavery effect this? Can we, sir, by mingling bond with free, black spirits with white, like Shakespeare's witches in Macbeth, form a more perfect union and insure domestic tranquillity? Secondly, to establish justice. Is justice to be established by subjecting half mankind to the will of the other half? Justice, sir, is blind to colors, and weighs in equal scales the rights of all men, whether white or black. Thirdly, to provide for the common defence and secure the blessings of liberty. Does slavery add anything to the common defence? Sir, the strength of a republic is in the arm of freedom. But, above all things, do the blessings of liberty consist in slavery? If there is any sincerity in our profession that slavery is an ill, tolerated only from necessity, let us not, while we feel that ill, shun the cure which consists only in an honest avowal that liberty and equal rights are the end and aim of all

This body, on February 27, struck out, by a vote of 31 to 7, the clause relating to children of the slaves, and, by a vote of 22 to 16, that relating to further introduction of slavery into the State. The House refused to accept those amendments by a vote of 78 to 66, and, the Senate adhering to its action, the bill was lost and Missouri remained a Territory.

ORGANIZATION OF ARKANSAS TERRITORY

February 17, 1819, the House, in Committee of the Whole, began the discussion of the bill to organize the southern part of Missouri Territory into the Territory of Arkansas. The debate was wide and long continued, covering most of the ground of the preceding discussion, but differing in part, as the present proposition was to impose a condition on a territorial government and not on a State. Louis McLane [Del.] suggested that a line should be fixed north of which slavery hereafter should not be permitted in admitting new States into the Union.

On February 19 the House voted, 89 to 87, to strike out the clause liberating, at the age of 25, slaves born in the Territory, and, 90 to 86, to strike out the clause prohibiting the introduction of slavery into the Territory. The Senate, on March 1, concurred in the bill and the Territory was thus organized as slave.

Upon the passage of the bill in the House Mr. John W. Taylor [N. Y.], after stating that he thought it important that some line should be designated beyond which slavery should not be permitted, etc., moved the following amendment as an additional section to the bill:

"That neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall hereafter be introduced into any part of the Territories of the United States lying north of 36 degrees and 30 minutes of north latitude."¹

¹ This proposed line, while exempting Arkansas from the restriction, would have included the State of Missouri in it, as it followed the latitude of 36° 30' through its whole course in the Louisiana Purchase.

The amendment, meeting opposition, was withdrawn by the mover for introduction at a more favorable occasion.

Before the meeting of the next Congress the legislatures of many of the Northern States, including Delaware, passed resolutions endorsing the Tallmadge proviso. In many cases the vote was unanimous, showing that old party lines had been wiped out by this new and portentous issue. For the first time in American politics the North and the South stood solidly arrayed against each other.

Congress met on December 6, 1819. Alabama was admitted as a slave State on December 14. Missouri again demanded admission. The district of Maine, in Massachusetts, separated by New Hampshire from the rest of the State and differing from it in politics, being Republican, while the "Old Bay State" almost alone in the Union remained Federalist, also applied for admission as a separate State. On January 3, 1820, the House of Representatives passed the bill, and it went up to the Senate, where a determined effort was made by the pro-slavery majority (which included three Northern Senators) to block its passage except on condition that Missouri, with a constitution permitting slavery, was also admitted. Accordingly, after a hard-fought fight with the minority, lasting a month, the majority on February 16, 1820, passed a bill (23 votes to 21) admitting Maine, but with a "rider" admitting Missouri without restriction as to slavery.

Senator Jesse B. Thomas [Ill.] then proposed a compromise in the Missouri section of the bill, which was in effect the restriction proposed in the House the preceding session by John W. Taylor [N. Y.], with Missouri excepted from its application. This was adopted by the Senate on February 17 by a vote of 34 to 10, the extreme pro-slavery men voting in the negative.

In the meantime the House, beginning on January 24, 1820, had been debating the Missouri bill with great fervor. The Tallmadge amendment (restricting slavery) of the last session had been reintroduced, as well as the Thomas compromise.

incongruity do the two propositions present! You are not acting on a section of two or three lines; as to Maine, it is her constitution you are ratifying. What do you find on the front of it? "Article 1, section 1: All men are born free and equal, and are free to worship God in their own way." Here is a substantial pledge to the good old faith. To her we may say, Come, sister, take your place in our constellation; the luster of your countenance will brighten the American galaxy. But do not urge us to admit Missouri, under a pretence of congeniality—with the visage of a savage, deformed with the hideous cicatrices of barbaric pride—with her features marred as if the finger of Lucifer had been drawn across them.

Senator Walker discussed the constitutional phase of the question.

The gentlemen who rely upon the 9th section of the 1st article of the Constitution contend that the power impliedly acknowledged to reside in Congress to prohibit the migration of slaves is sufficiently extensive to authorize the interdiction of carrying slaves from one State to another of this Union, or from the States to the Territories belonging to the United States; and that Congress may well regulate the intercourse between the States and Territories, in this regard, and totally prohibit the "migration" of slaves.

The construction which I am disposed to give to this section is—that the word "importation," as its appropriate meaning would indicate, looks abroad and was intended to embrace slaves brought into this country from Africa and elsewhere by water. The word "migration" was intended to embrace such as should be brought into the United States by land, from the contiguous territory belonging to foreign powers. For it would have been idle and vain to have prohibited the "importation" or the bringing of slaves directly into our ports—while there should be no interdiction of "migration" from the territory of foreign powers immediately adjoining the territory of the United States, and it must be recollected that, at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, this country was bordered in different directions by territory belonging to other nations. By giving this construction you satisfy the full meaning of both words.¹

On February 28, by a vote of 97 to 76, the House disagreed to the changes made in its Maine bill by the Senate. The Senate refused to recede from its amendments, and a joint conference committee was appointed by both chambers. On March 2 this committee reported that the Senate should recede from its union of the Maine and Missouri bills, that the House should give up the Tallmadge proviso, and that both chambers should unite in admitting Missouri with the Thomas amendment (the compromise).

The Tallmadge amendment was then struck out in the House by a vote of 90 to 87; the Thomas amendment was passed by a vote of 134 to 42, and a proviso was concurred in to secure the return of fugitive slaves from every part of the Louisiana Purchase. Similar action was taken by the Senate, and the bill went to the President, who, after conferring with his Cabinet as to the constitutionality of the Thomas amendment and receiving a unanimous opinion in the affirmative, signed the Missouri bill on March 6, 1820. The President had already (on March 3, 1820) signed the act admitting Maine.

In the Senate debate the chief speakers whose speeches were reported were: in favor of the restriction of slavery, Jonathan Roberts [Pa.] and Walter Lowrie [Pa.], Rufus King [N. Y.]; opposed, Freeman Walker [Ga.], Nicholas Van Dyke [Del.], James Barbour [Va.], and William Pinkney [Md.].

THE ADMISSION OF MISSOURI

SENATE, JANUARY 13-FEBRUARY 16, 1820

SENATOR ROBERTS.—I am willing to consider Missouri as an inchoate State; no one will more gladly see her admitted into the Union; but I wish to see the page of her constitution irradiated with the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty—to see her become a party to that covenant round which the patriots of '76 pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. The committee have attached the admission of Missouri to the bill for admitting Maine, under the pretext of congeniality. How insufficient the pretence! What ludicrous

Mr. LOWRIE.—In the Constitution it is provided that "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808," etc. In this debate it seems generally to be admitted, by gentlemen on the opposite side, that these two words are not synonymous; but what their meaning is they are not so well agreed. One gentleman tells us it was intended to prevent slaves from being brought in by land; another gentleman says it was intended to restrain Congress from interfering with emigration from Europe.

These constructions cannot both be right. I shall give you no construction of my own, but refer to the authority of James Madison and James Wilson, who were both members of the Constitutional Convention, and who gave their construction to these words, long before this question was agitated. Mr. Madison observes that to say this clause was intended to prevent emigration does not deserve an answer. And Judge Wilson says expressly it was intended to place the new States under the control of Congress as to the introduction of slaves.

It is further said that the Louisiana treaty guarantees their property to all the inhabitants of Missouri, and that this property embraces slaves. The inhabitants then there were the parties we admit to this treaty; and, whatever may have been their rights or their property, they are not touched by this amendment. But farther proof is still wanted, because it is denied that the word property, in this treaty, means slaves. Here I slaves and free persons, brought or coming from abroad. "Migration" implied voluntary action—importation, involuntary. The puzzle in the clause came from the use of both words, and from the necessity as well as the impossibility of finding a consistent meaning for each one. The care of the Constitution, in the use of language, was known. Far from using an equivocal phrase, it would not use two of the same import where one was enough; yet here was an exception—a departure from that laudable care; and, according to Mr. Madison, it was done on purpose, and for the ease of scrupulous consciences. Mr. Madison, in his letter of November, 1810, to Mr. Robert Walsh, thus accounts for it: "Some of the States had scruples about admitting the term 'slaves' into the instrument; hence the descriptive phrase, 'migration, or importation of persons'; the term migration allowing those who were scrupulous of acknowledging expressly a property in human beings to view imported persons as a species of emigrants, while others might apply the term to foreign malefactors sent or coming into the country. It is possible, though not recollected, that some might have had an eye to the case of freed blacks as well as malefactors." So that this phrase, "migration," which gave so much trouble to our Congress, and excited such alarming apprehension in one-half of the Union, was only a mode of getting a unanimous vote for the same thing, to wit: the non-importation of Africans for slaves after a certain day.—Thomas H. Benton in "Debates of Congress."

ask in rule of construction that is foreign to the subject. Apply to the writers on the law of nations; let them pass upon these words; try them by the principles of the Constitution; submit them to the test of reason; there all speak the same language; they tell you that slaves and property are not convertible terms. In the history of our Government, we have a case fully in point: When Virginia ceded the Northwestern Territory to Congress, it was on condition that it should become a member of the Federal Union, and have the same rights, sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States. This language is as strong as that of the treaty with France; neither can it be denied that, at the time Virginia made this cession, there were in this territory a number of inhabitants professing to be her citizens and owning slaves.

Congress, with the knowledge of these facts, and the deed of violence before them, passed the ordinance of 1787, by which slavery was banished from this fair portion of our territory.

Humanity to the slaves themselves, it is said, requires the rejection of this amendment. How is the matter of fact on this point? Every gentleman here knows the situation of slaves in the South—the husband is in one family, the wife in another, the children in another. In removing, no respect to these relations can be paid—all must be disregarded; the husband and the wife must part, to meet no more; the father is dragged away, and the mother and the children left, or they are taken and he by force is compelled to stay behind; or, if he escapes after them, he is pursued, bound, and brought back. This, sir, is not fancy; these scenes, but a few months ago, I witnessed in person, among emigrants going to this said Missouri. Our humanity may be called sickly, but it gives no sanction to scenes like these.

Gentlemen have endeavored to prove that, by opening the extensive regions of the West to the introduction of slaves, nothing is thereby done to spread slavery; that, whether they are admitted west of the Mississippi or not, the number remains the same. I presume, sir, that every gentleman here has paid some attention to the principle which governs the population of the human race. It is capable of demonstration that the population increases faster than the means of subsistence; the one increases in a geometrical, the other in an arithmetical, progression. In every nation the population presses more or less against the means of subsistence, and from its very nature must continue to do so until the end of time.¹ by latitude and longitude, which is inoperative on the left, but is omnipotent on the right bank of a river? Such a doctrine is well calculated to excite our solicitude; for, although the gentlemen who now hold it are sincere in their declarations, and mean to content themselves with a triumph in this controversy, what security have we that others will not apply the doctrine to the South generally?

Let it not be supposed that in the abstract I am advocating slavery. Take all other human things, it is mixed with good and evil—the latter, no doubt, preponderating. Whether slavery was ordained by God himself in a particular revelation to his chosen people, or whether it be merely permitted as a part of that moral evil which seems to be the inevitable portion of man, are questions I will not approach; I leave them to the casuists and the divines. It is sufficient for us, as statesmen, to know that it has existed from the earliest ages of the world, and that to us has been assigned such a portion as, in reference to their number and the various considerations resulting from a change of their condition, no remedy, even plausible, has been suggested, though wisdom and benevolence united have unceasingly bemoaned over the subject.

However dark and inevitable may be the ways of heaven, who is he that arrogantly presumes to arraign them? The same mighty power that planted the greater and the lesser luminary in the heavens permits on earth the bondman and the free. To that Providence, as men and Christians, let us bow. If it be consistent with his will, in the fulness of time, to break the fetter of the slave, he will raise up some Moses to be their deliverer. To him commission will be given to lead them up out of the land of bondage. At his approach, seas will subside and mountains disappear. When the revelation shall be made, and the jubilee of emancipation be proclaimed, philanthropy will lift its voice to swell the joyful note, which, sweeping the continent and the isles of the new world, and resounding through the old, shall cause the oppressor to let go his prey, the dungeon to surrender its victim, and give emancipation to the slave. Till then let us draw consolation from the reflection that, however incomprehensible this dispensation may be to us, it is a link in that great concatenation which is permitted by omnipotent power and goodness, and must issue in universal good.

Senator Rufus King of New York followed with a speech which was not reported. Its arguments can, however, be inferred from the succeeding speech of Apply these principles to the case before us, and what becomes of the gentleman's argument? Seventy years ago the penetrating mind of Dr. Franklin discovered this principle. Go, says he, to Africa, and see if you can discover the gap from whence the negroes have come, that have blackened half America, the West Indies, and many other places! The spring of population will always keep the number full. A market extended as the forests of your Western regions is thus opened for the sale of human flesh. Every inducement which avarice or the insatiable love of gain could desire is held out to the slaveholder to increase the number of his slaves. Under such inducements this class of population will increase with a rapidity heretofore unknown. Even at the rate of increase from 1800 to 1810, in a single century there will be upward of twenty-seven millions of slaves in the United States. This single fact, founded as it is on arithmetical certainty, is sufficiently alarming; but, sir, it points you to a very different policy from the one contended for by the honorable members on the other side.

SENATOR VAN DYKE.—Sir, it must be admitted by every statesman that this Constitution never was designed to have jurisdiction over the domestic concerns of the people in the several States. No, sir, these are wisely left exclusively to the State sovereignties, as their natural guardians. The proposed amendment, if adopted, will regulate, by an irrevocable provision in a statute, one of the domestic relations of the people of the State of Missouri. If Congress can regulate one, why not all of these domestic relations? Even the contract of marriage and the period of release from guardianship may become the subject of discussion in some future Congress, on the admission of some future State. If such a power exists, who shall stay its hand or prescribe its limits?

SENATOR BARBOUR.—The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks shall we suffer Missouri to come into the Union with the savage mark of slavery on her countenance? I appeal to that gentleman to know whether this be language to address to an American Senate, composed equally of members from States precisely in the condition that Missouri would be in, were she to tolerate slavery. Are these sentiments calculated to cherish that harmony and affection so essential to any beneficial results from our Union? But, sir, I will not imitate this course, and I will strive to repress the feeling which such remarks are calculated to awaken.

Gentlemen assure us that they do not mean to touch slavery in the old States. What kind of ethics is this that is bounded Senator William Pinkney of Maryland. These two were the giants of the contest.

SENATOR PINKNEY.—Mr. President, the sentiments of the gentleman from New York [Senator King], if not borrowed from, are identical with, the worst visions of the political philosophy of France when all the elements of discord and misrule were let loose upon that devoted nation. I mean "the infinite perfectibility of man and his institutions," and the resolution of everything into a state of nature.

Sir, it is not an occasion like this, although connected, as contrary to all reasonable expectation it has been, with these fearful and disorganizing theories, which would make our estimates, whether fanciful or sound, of natural law, the measure of civil rights and political sovereignty in the social state, that can harm the Union. It must indeed be a mighty storm that can push from its moorings this sacred bark of the common safety. I will continue to cherish the belief, in defiance of the deadly speculations which, invoking the name of God to aid their faculties for mischief, strike at all establishments, that the union of these States is formed to bear up against far greater shocks than, through all vicissitudes, it is ever likely to encounter.

Sir, it is avowed that, while Maine is to be ushered into the Union with every possible demonstration of studious reverence on our part, and on hers with colors flying, and all the other graceful accompaniments of honorable triumph, the more infantine and feeble Missouri is to be repelled with harshness, and forbidden to come at all unless with the iron collar of servitude about her neck, instead of the civic crown of republican freedom upon her brows, and is to be doomed forever to leading strings unless she will exchange those leading strings for shackles.

I am told that you have the power to establish this odious and revolting distinction, and I am referred for the proofs of that power to various parts of the Constitution, but principally to that part of it which authorizes the admission of new States into the Union.

I think I may assume that if such a power be anything but nominal it is much more than adequate to the present object; that it is a power of vast expansion, to which human sagacity can assign no reasonable limits; that is a capacious reservoir of authority, from which you may take, in all time to come, as occasion may serve, the means of oppression as well as of beneficence.

John Pickens

I shall not, I am sure, be told that I exaggerate this power. No man can contradict me when I say that, if you have this power, you may squeeze down a new-born sovereign State to the size of a pigmy, and then, taking it between finger and thumb, stick it into some niche of the Union, and still continue, by way of mockery, to call it a State in the sense of the Constitution. You may reduce it to a thing of skin and bone, and then place the ominous skeleton beside the ruddy and healthful members of the Union, that it may have leisure to mourn the lamentable difference between itself and its companions, to brood over its disastrous position, and to seek, in justifiable discontent, an opportunity for separation, and insurrection and rebellion. What may you not do by dexterity and perseverance with this terrific power? You may give to a new State, in the form of terms which it cannot refuse, a statute book of a thousand volumes, providing not for ordinary cases only, but even for possibilities; you may lay the yoke, no matter whether light or heavy, upon the necks of the latest posterity; you may send this searching power into every hamlet for centuries to come, by laws enacted in the spirit of prophecy, and regulating all those dear relations of domestic concern which belong to local legislation, and which even local legislation touches with a delicate and sparing hand. This is the first inroad. But will it be the last? This provision is but a pioneer for others of a more desolating aspect. It is that fatal bridge of which Milton speaks,¹ and when once firmly built, what shall hinder you to pass it when you please for the purpose of plundering power after power, at the expense of new States, as you will still continue to call them, and raising up prospective ills, irrevocable and immortal, which shall leave to those States the empty shadows of domestic sovereignty, and convert them into petty pageants, in themselves contemptible, but rendered infinitely more so by the contrast of their humble faculties with the proud and admitted pretensions of those who, having doomed them to the inferiority of vassals, have condescended to take them into their society and under their protection?

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." It is objected that the word "may" imports power, not obligation—a right to decide—a discretion to grant or refuse.

To this it might be answered that power is duty, on many occasions. But let it be conceded that it is discretionary. What consequence follows? A power to refuse, in a case like this, does not necessarily involve a power to exact terms. You must look to the result, which is the declared object of the power. Whether you will arrive at it or not may depend on your will; but you cannot compromise with the result intended and professed.

What, then, is the professed result? To admit a State into this Union.

What is that Union? A confederation of States equal in sovereignty, capable of everything which the Constitution does not forbid, or authorize Congress to forbid. It is an equal Union between parties equally sovereign. They were sovereign, independently of the Union. The object of the Union was common protection for the exercise of already existing sovereignty. The parties gave up a portion of that sovereignty to insure the remainder. As far as they gave it up by the common compact they have ceased to be sovereign. The Union provides the means of defending the residue, and it is into that Union that a new State is to come. By acceding to it the new State is placed on the same footing with the original States. It accedes for the same purpose; that is, protection for its unsundered sovereignty. If it comes in shorn of its beams—crippled and disparaged beyond the original States—it is not into the original Union that it comes. For it is a different sort of Union. The first was Union inter pares; this is a Union between disparates, between giants and a dwarf, between power and feebleness, between full proportioned sovereignties and a miserable image of power—a thing which that very Union has shrunk and shriveled from its just size, instead of preserving it in its true dimensions.

It is into "this Union"—that is, the Union of the Federal Constitution—that you are to admit or refuse to admit. You can admit into no other. You cannot make the Union, as to the new State, what it is not as to the old; for then it is not this Union that you open for the entrance of a new party. If you make it enter into a new and additional compact, is it any longer the same Union?

If I am told that, by the bill relative to Missouri, you do not legislate upon a New State, I answer that you do; and I answer, further, that it is immaterial whether you do or not. But it is upon Missouri, as a State, that your terms and conditions are to act. Until Missouri is a State, the terms and conditions are nothing. You legislate in the shape of terms and conditions prospectively; and you so legislate upon it that when it comes into the Union it is bound by a contract degrading and diminishing its sovereignty, and is to be stripped of rights which the original parties to the Union did not consent to abandon, and which that Union (so far as depends upon it) takes under its protection and guaranty.

It is said that the word may necessarily implies the right of prescribing the terms of admission.

Give to that word all the force you please, what does it import? That Congress is not bound to admit a new State into this Union. Be it so for argument's sake. Does it follow that when you consent to admit into this Union a new State you can make it less in sovereign power than the original parties to that Union; that you can make the Union as to it what it is not as to them; that you can fashion it to your liking by compelling it to purchase admission into a Union by sacrificing a portion of that power which it is the sole purpose of the Union to maintain in all the plenitude which the Union itself does not impair? Does it follow that you can force upon it an additional compact not found in the compact of Union; that you can make it come into the Union less a State, in regard to sovereign power, than its fellows in that Union; that you can cripple its legislative competency (beyond the constitution which is the pact of Union, to which you make it a party as if it had been originally a party to it) by what you choose to call a condition, but which, whatever it may be called, brings the new government into the Union under new obligations to it, and with disparaged power to be protected by it?

I may be told, perhaps, that the restriction, in this case, is the act of Missouri itself; that your law is nothing without its consent, and derives its efficacy from that alone.

No State or Territory, in order to become a State, can alienate or surrender any portion of its sovereignty. It is under an incapacity to disqualify itself for all the purposes of government left to it in the Constitution, by stripping itself of attributes which arise from the natural equality of States, and which the Constitution recognizes, not only because it does not deny them, but presumes them to remain as they exist by the law of nature and nations. Inequality in the sovereignty of States is unnatural, and repugnant to all the principles of that law. Hence we find it laid down by the text writers on public law that "Nature has established a perfect equality of rights between independent nations"; and that, "whatever the quality of a free sovereign nation gives to one it gives to another."¹

The Constitution of the United States proceeds upon the truth of this doctrine. It takes the States as its finds them, free and sovereign alike by nature. It receives from them portions of their power for the general good, and provides for the exercise of it by organized political bodies. It diminishes the individual sovereignty of each, and transfers what it abstracts to the Government which it creates; it takes from all alike, and leaves them relatively to each other equal in sovereign power.

One of the most signal errors with which the argument on the other side has abounded is this of considering the proposed restriction as if leveled at the introduction or establishment of slavery. And hence the vehement declamation which, among other things, has informed us that slavery originated in fraud or violence.

That slavery, like many other human institutions, originated in fraud or violence may be conceded; but, however it originated, it is established among us, and no man seeks a further establishment of it by new importations of freemen to be converted into slaves.

It can be nothing to the purpose of this argument, therefore, as the gentlemen themselves have shaped it, to inquire what was the origin of slavery. What is it now, and who are they that endeavor to innovate upon what it now is (the advocates of this restriction who desire change by unconstitutional means, or its opponents who desire to leave the whole matter to local regulation) are the only questions worthy of attention.

Sir, if we too closely look to the rise and progress of long-continued establishments and unquestioned rights, we may discover other subjects than that of slavery with which fraud and violence may claim a fearful connection, and over which it may be our interest to throw the mantle of oblivion. What was the settlement of our ancestors in this country but an invasion of the rights of the barbarians who inhabited it? That settlement, with slight exceptions, was effected by the slaughter of those who did no more than defend their native land against the intruders of Europe, or by unequal compacts and purchases, in which feebleness and ignorance had to deal with power and cunning. The savages who once built their huts where this proud capitol,¹ rising from its recent ashes, exemplifies the sovereignty of the American people, were swept away by the injustice of our fathers, and their domain usurped by force, or obtained by artifice yet more criminal. Our continent was full of those aboriginal inhabitants. Where are they or their de-

The gentlemen can scarcely be sincere believers in their own principle. They have apprehensions, which they endeavor to conceal, that Missouri, as a State, will have the power to continue slavery within its limits; and, if they will not be offended, I will venture to compare them, in this particular, with the duelist in Sheridan's comedy of "The Rivals," who, affecting to have no fear whatever of his adversary, is, nevertheless, careful to admonish Sir Lucius to hold him fast.

Let us take it for granted, however, that they are in earnest in their doctrine, and that it is very necessary to impose what they prove to be an unnecessary restraint; how do they support that doctrine?

The honorable gentleman on the other side [Mr. King] has told us, as a proof of his great position, that man cannot enslave his fellow man, in which is implied that all laws upholding slavery are absolute nullities; that the nations of antiquity, as well as of modern times, have concurred in laying down that position as incontrovertible.

He refers us, in the first place, to the Roman law, in which he finds it laid down as a maxim: Jure naturalis omnes homines ab initio liberi nascebantur.¹ From the manner in which this maxim was pressed upon us, it would not readily have been conjectured that the honorable gentleman who used it had borrowed it from a slaveholding empire, and still less from a book of the Institutes of Justinian, which treats of slavery, and justifies and regulates it. Had he given us the context, we should have had the modifications of which the abstract doctrine was, in the judgment of the Roman law, susceptible. We should have had an explanation of the competency of that law, to convert, whether justly or unjustly, freedom into servitude, and to maintain the right of a master to the service and obedience of his slave.

The honorable gentleman might also have gone to Greece for a similar maxim and a similar commentary, speculative and practical.

He next refers us to Magna Charta. I am somewhat familiar with Magna Charta, and I am confident that it contains no such maxim as the honorable gentleman thinks he has discovered in it. The great charter was extorted from John, and his feeble son and successor, by haughty slaveholding barons, who thought only of themselves and the commons of England (then inconsiderable), whom they wished to enlist in their efforts against the Crown. There is not in it a single word which scendants? Either "with years beyond the flood," or driven back by the swelling tide of our population from the borders of the Atlantic to the deserts of the West. You follow still the miserable remnants, and make contracts with them that seal their ruin. You purchase their lands, of which they know not the value, in order that you may sell them to advantage, increase your treasure, and enlarge your empire. Yet further; you pursue as they retire; and they must continue to retire until the Pacific shall stay their retreat, and compel them to pass away as a dream. Will you recur to those scenes of various iniquity for any other purpose than to regret and lament them? Will you pry into them with a view to shake and impair your rights of property and dominion?

If it is incompetent to sovereign power to continue slavery in Missouri, in respect of slaves who may yet be carried thither, show me the power that can continue it in respect of slaves who are there already. Missouri is out of the old limits of the Union, and beyond those limits, it is said, we can give no countenance to slavery, if we can countenance or tolerate it anywhere. It is plain that there can be no slaves beyond the Mississippi at this moment but in virtue of some power to make or keep them so. What sort of power was it that has made or kept them so? Sovereign power it could not be, according to the honorable gentlemen from Pennsylvania and New Hampshire [Messrs. Roberts, Lowrie, and Morrill], and if sovereign power is unequal to such a purpose, less than sovereign power is yet more unequal to it. The laws of Spain and France could do nothing; the laws of the territorial government of Missouri could do nothing toward such a result, if it be a result which no laws, in other words, no sovereignty, could accomplish. The treaty of 1803 could do no more in this view than the laws of France, or Spain, or the territorial government of Missouri. A treaty is an act of sovereign power, taking the shape of a compact between the parties to it; and that which sovereign power cannot reach at all it cannot reach by a treaty. Those who are now held in bondage, therefore, in Missouri, and their issue are entitled to be free, if there be any truth in the doctrine of the honorable gentlemen; and if the proposed restriction leaves all such in slavery it thus discredits the very foundation on which it reposes. To be inconsistent is the fate of false principles; but this inconsistency is the more to be remarked, since it cannot be referred to mere considerations of policy, without admitting that such considerations may be preferred, without a crime, to what is deemed a paramount and indispensable duty.

condemns civil slavery. Freemen only are the objects of its protecting care. "Nullus liber homo" is its phraseology. The serfs who were chained to the soil, the villains regardant and in gross were left as it found them. All England was then full of slaves, whose posterity would by law remain slaves as with us, except only that the issue followed the condition of the father instead of the mother. The rule was "Partus sequitur patrem,"¹ — a rule more favorable undoubtedly, from the very precariousness of its application, to the gradual extinction of slavery, than ours, which has been drawn from the Roman law, and is of sure and unavoidable effect.

Of the Declaration of our Independence, which has also been quoted in support of the perilous doctrines now urged upon us, I need not now speak at large. The self-evident truths announced in the Declaration of Independence are not truths at all, if taken literally; and the practical conclusions contained in the same passage of that declaration prove that they were never designed to be so received.

The Articles of Confederation contain nothing on the subject, while the actual Constitution recognizes the legal existence of slavery by various provisions. The power of prohibiting the slave trade is involved in that of regulating commerce, but this is coupled with an express inhibition to the exercise of it for twenty years. How, then, can that Constitution which expressly permits the importation of slaves authorize the national government to set on foot a crusade against slavery?

The clause respecting fugitive slaves is affirmative and active in its effects. It is a direct sanction and positive protection of the right of the master to the services of his slave, as derived under the local laws of the States. The phraseology in which it is wrapped up still leaves the intention clear, and the words, "persons held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof," have always been interpreted to extend to the case of slaves, in the various acts of Congress which have been passed to give efficacy to the provision, and in the judicial application of those laws. So also in the clause prescribing the ratio of representation—the phrase, "three-fifths of all other persons," is equivalent to slaves, or it means nothing. And yet we are told that those who are acting under a Constitution which sanctions the existence of slavery in those States which choose to tolerate it are at liberty to hold that no law can sanction its existence!

We are informed that there is a clause in the Constitution which declares that Congress shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government; that slavery and such a form of government are incompatible; and, finally, as a conclusion from these premises, that Congress not only have a right, but are bound to exclude slavery from a new State. Here, again, sir, there is an edifying inconsistency between the argument and the measure which it professes to vindicate. By the argument, it is maintained that Missouri cannot have a republican form of government and at the same time tolerate negro slavery. By the measure it is admitted that Missouri may tolerate slavery, as to persons already in bondage there, and be nevertheless fit to be received into the Union. What sort of Constitutional mandate is this, which can thus be made to bend, and truckle, and compromise, as if it were a simple rule of expediency that might admit of exceptions upon motives of countervailing expediency? There can be no such pliancy in the peremptory provisions of the Constitution. They cannot be obeyed by moieties and violated in the same ratio. They must be followed out to their full extent, or treated with that decent neglect which has at least the merit of forbearing to render contumacy obtrusive by an ostentatious display of the very duty which we in part abandon. If the Decalogue could be observed in this casuistical manner, we might be grievous sinners, and yet be liable to no reproach. We might persist in all our habitual irregularities, and still be spotless. We might, for example, continue to covet our neighbors' goods, provided they were the same neighbors whose goods we had before coveted, and so of all the other commandments.

The debates in the House of Representatives on the various phases of the Missouri bill extended from January 26 to March 2, 1820. In these the speakers were clearly aligned as pro-slavery or anti-slavery in sentiment, the two classes with few exceptions hailing the one from the North, the other from the South.

The chief pro-slavery speakers were: Alexander Smyth [Va.], Robert W. Reid [Ga.], Benjamin Hardin [Ky.], Louis McLane [Del.], Philip P. Barbour [Va.], Charles Pinckney [S. C.] and John Tyler [Va.]; the leading anti-slavery speakers were: Henry Meigs [N. Y.], John W. Taylor [N. Y.], Joseph Hemphill [Pa.], John Sergeant [Pa.], William Darlington [Pa.] and James Stevens [Conn.].

Henry Clay, as Speaker of the House, did not take a prominent part in the debate nor was he called on to vote upon the measure. "It was afterwards," says Senator Benton, "when the constitution formed by Missouri was resisted on account of the free negro and mulatto clause, and which revived the original question with all its portentous consequences, that Mr. Clay took the lead which earned for him the title of Pacificator."

The debate in the House centered around the Taylor compromise proviso.

THE MISSOURI COMPROMISE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 26-MARCH 2, 1820

On January 26 Mr. Meigs introduced a resolution devoting the public lands to the colonization of freedmen. He said:

There is a wonderful singularity in the present controversy, which destroys all confidence in the weight and value of that process of mind which we so proudly dignify with the title of reasoning. Sir, I never yet knew that reason and logic were to be found on this side or that of a parallel of latitude or longitude. What is the fact in this case? Why, sir, the parallel of latitude of 39 degrees almost precisely marks the division between the reason and argument of the North and South. That line of demarcation separates the slaveholding from the non-slaveholding States. On the south side of that line we find the climate and soil adapted to slaves, and there are the slaves; on the north side of that line we discover that the soil and climate require no slaves, and, therefore, few or no slaves are found. What, sir! is it possible, then, that one-half of us can be rationally and argumentatively on one side of the parallel of latitude, and the other half of us upon the other? I did believe that the truths of philosophy, that reason, that the Principia of Newton were the same in every latitude, in every climate, and on every soil of this globe.

Reason divided by parallels of latitude! Why, sir, it is easy for prejudice and malevolence, by aid of ingenuity, to erect an eternal, impenetrable wall of brass between the North and South, at the latitude of thirty-nine degrees! But, in the view of reason, there is no other line between them than that celestial arc of thirty-nine degrees which offers no barrier to the march of liberal and rational men.

Sir, we have been now for a long time occupied in this debate, mispending our time and the public money. I feel well assured that the body of the people will judge our conduct rightly. They will soon ask us what is the controversy about? Did you, from motives of policy and regard for the welfare of the whites, propose to remove the growing black race from this country? No. Did you, actuated by humane considerations for the unfortunate slaves, propose to redeem them from their bondage and restore them to liberty and the land of their fathers? No. What then? Did you propose to draw such lines of restriction around the slave population as would ere long starve them out, and so prevent their becoming dangerous to the whites? If you did, remember that such is the increasing kindness of the slaveholders, so ameliorated the condition of the slave, that not one slave, not one child less will be born, and not one can die by starvation. Sir, the truth is that nothing has yet been proposed beneficial either to the white or black race in all this long-drawn debate. Give me leave to say, sir, that this consideration induced me to introduce the resolution which now lies upon the table, devoting the public lands to the emancipation and colonization of the unfortunate slaves. If we want some object upon which to exhaust our enthusiasm, here is one worth it all. Not the subjugation of a people, but the redemption of a nation.

Mr. Taylor moved to amend the bill by inserting a clause restricting slavery with a proviso for the return of fugitive slaves.

He supported his amendment with the argument that the power of holding slaves was not a Federal right.

Congress, within its sovereignty, has constantly endeavored to prevent the extension of slavery, and has maintained the doctrine "that all men are born equally free," but has disclaimed, and continues to disclaim, any right to enforce this doctrine upon State sovereignties.

Mr. Smyth opposed this view. He said:

The right to own slaves being acknowledged and secured by the Constitution, can you proscribe what the Constitution guarantees! Can you touch a right reserved to the States or the people? You cannot.

If you possessed power to legislate concerning slavery, the adoption of the proposition on your table, which goes to emancipate all children of slaves hereafter born in Missouri, would be a direct violation of the Constitution, which provides that "no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." And, if you cannot take away that which is in existence, you cannot take away that which will come into existence hereafter. If you cannot take away the land, you cannot take the future crops; and if you cannot take the slaves, you cannot take their issue, who, by the laws of slavery, will be also slaves. You cannot force the people to give up their property. You cannot force a portion of the people to emancipate their slaves.

It has been said that the Constitution vests in Congress a power to make all needful regulations respecting the territory of the United States; and this power, it is supposed, authorizes us to exclude slaves from the territories of the United States, and also to demand from any of those territories about to become States a stipulation for the exclusion of slaves. The clause obviously relates to the territory belonging to the United States as property only. It speaks not of the jurisdiction. A power to dispose of and make all needful regulations respecting the property of the United States is very different from a power to legislate over the persons and property of the people. When the property of the United States is sold and conveyed, it ceases to be an object of the power to make regulations respecting it.

By treaty we are bound to admit Missouri into the Union; to allow her a representation for her slaves; to guarantee to her a republican form of government (that is, a government by and for the people themselves, not a government imposed on them, nor a patrimonial government); and to leave her all power not delegated by the Constitution to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States. Treaties are in part the supreme law of the land and paramount to the constitution of any State; yet you propose to violate the treaty with France by the means of a State constitution, which is of inferior obligation to a treaty.

Every State is interested that every other State shall preserve its rights. The States should possess the same rights, so that the invasion of the rights of one should be the invasion of the rights of all. You will unite in opposition to the States, you will form local parties, the most dangerous of all parties; you will unite the State governments, defending State rights, to the people, defending their property to the amount of five hundred millions. Louisiana, being equally interested in the construction of the treaty, must make common cause with Missouri, and the other slaveholding States may make common cause with them.

If you let the people of Missouri alone to exercise the right of self-government, as it is exercised by the people of the other States, perhaps they may of themselves exclude slavery. If such be their sovereign will and pleasure, be it so. Let the will of the people be done. But if you attempt to force your own will upon them, perhaps they may know and duly appreciate their rights. Then they will not give up the sacred right of self-government. The people who have not a right to legislate for themselves are not free. They do not enjoy a republican form of government. It would be an event to be lamented if any portion of this free people should give up their constitutional rights.

Mr. Reid acknowledged that slavery was "an unnatural state; a dark cloud which obscures half the luster of our free institutions," but he claimed that it was "a fixed evil which we can only alleviate." The welfare of both whites and blacks forbade emancipation.

Can we incorporate them [the blacks] with us, and make them and us one people? The prejudices of the North and of the South rise up in equal strength against such a measure, and even those who clamor most loudly for the sublime doctrine of your Declaration of Independence, who shout in your ears, "all men are by nature equal!" would turn with abhorrence and disgust from a partitioned progeny! Shall we then be blamed for a state of things to which we are obliged to submit? Would it be fair; would it be manly; would it be generous; would it be just, to offer continuance and endorsement to the unfortunate man who wears a cancer in his bosom, because he will not submit to cauterize at the hazard of his existence? For my own part, surrounded by slavery from my cradle to the present moment, I get "Hate the touch of servile hands;

I loathe the sight who strike around!"

that it was, as charged, "the production of usurped power." The States having relinquished power over the Northwest Territory, Congress had been compelled to organize a government there. It had the power to restrict slavery, and, believing it right to do so, had restricted it. When the Territory was divided into States the people endorsed the restriction.

The Constitutional Convention validated the acts of the Congress under the Confederation, including the Ordinance of 1787.

Could the present question in any shape have been proposed to the convention, I appeal to the honor of the committee if, in their opinion, it would have been sustained for a moment by the patriots of that early day? Slavery in the old States could not be extinguished, but, as to States that were to grow up out of the Constitution, it never was intended that they should be inconsistent with the solemn professions made to the world.

Mr. Hemphill argued that the situations of Missouri and of the Northwest Territory were identical with respect to the fact that both regions were "common funds" of the nation. Therefore there was no more injustice in forbidding slaveholders to take their slaves into Missouri than in debarring them from so entering Ohio, Indiana, or Illinois. Let them take their favorite negroes with them as free persons, and the generous act would be repaid by a life-long attachment to them of the grateful servants.

Mr. Hemphill opposed any compromise on the subject. With clear prescience he said:

Under the circumstances, it will be impossible to compromise a question of this character. A compromise usually has for its basis mutual concessions, which are equally obligatory; but, if we should pass a law excluding slavery from the remaining territory, where would be the security that another Congress would not repeal it? It will be but an ordinary act of legislation, and whenever there shall be an application for a new State we shall be met with the same constitutional objections that now exist. It is, in fact, yielding all for which we and I would hail that day as the most glorious in its dawning which should behold, with safety to themselves and our citizens, the black population of the United States placed upon the high eminence of equal rights, and clothed in the privileges and humanities of American citizens! But this is a dream of philanthropy which can never be fulfilled; and whoever shall act in this country upon such wild theories shall cease to be a benefactor and become a destroyer of the human family.

Mr. Reid then argued that slavery should be admitted into the Territories in order to lessen the evil by scattering it.

Slaves, divided among many masters, will enjoy greater privileges and comforts than those who, cramped within a narrow sphere and under few owners, will be doomed to drag a long, heavy, and clanking chain through the space of their existence. Danger from insurrection will diminish. Confidence will grow between the master and his servant. The one will no longer be considered as a mere beast of burden, the other as a remorseless despot void of feeling and compassion. In proportion as few slaves are possessed by the same individual will he look with less reluctance to the prospect of their ultimate liberation. Emancipations will become common, and who knows but that the Great Being, to whose merces all men have an equal claim, may, in the fulness of his time, work a miracle in behalf of the trampled rights of human nature?

On February 4 Mr. Hardin said that the South in this controversy was contending not for victory, but for its political existence.

We have already surrendered to the non-slaveholding States all that region of the American empire between the great rivers Ohio and Mississippi; and if you tear from us that immense country west of the Mississippi, we may at once surrender at discretion, crouch at the feet of our adversaries, and beg mercy of our proud and haughty victors.

Mr. Hardin then suggested that what was essentially the Missouri Compromise be adopted.

Mr. Hemphill discussed the Ordinance of 1787 in its relation to the subject under discussion. He denied that it was, as charged, "the production of usurped power." The States having relinquished power over the Northwest Territory, Congress had been compelled to organize a government there. It had the power to restrict slavery, and, believing it right to do so, had restricted it. When the Territory was divided into States the people endorsed the restriction.

The Constitutional Convention validated the acts of the Congress under the Confederation, including the Ordinance of 1787.

Could the present question in any shape have been proposed to the convention, I appeal to the honor of the committee if, in their opinion, it would have been sustained for a moment by the patriots of that early day? Slavery in the old States could not be extinguished, but, as to States that were to grow up out of the Constitution, it never was intended that they should be inconsistent with the solemn professions made to the world.

Mr. Hemphill argued that the situations of Missouri and of the Northwest Territory were identical with respect to the fact that both regions were "common funds" of the nation. Therefore there was no more injustice in forbidding slaveholders to take their slaves into Missouri than in debarring them from so entering Ohio, Indiana, or Illinois. Let them take their favorite negroes with them as free persons, and the generous act would be repaid by a life-long attachment to them of the grateful servants.

Mr. Hemphill opposed any compromise on the subject. With clear prescience he said:

Under the circumstances, it will be impossible to compromise a question of this character. A compromise usually has for its basis mutual concessions, which are equally obligatory; but, if we should pass a law excluding slavery from the remaining territory, where would be the security that another Congress would not repeal it? It will be but an ordinary act of legislation, and whenever there shall be an application for a new State we shall be met with the same constitutional objections that now exist. It is, in fact, yielding all for which we have been contending, and, if we once give up the ship, slavery will be tolerated in the State of Missouri and we can never alter remove it.

It is true that a compromise was made on the subject of slavery at the adoption of the Constitution, but it was one of an obligatory nature, and it arose out of circumstances that could not be controlled. The Constitution was necessary to save us from domestic discord and foreign ambition; we were then in our infancy; but, now our national strength bids defiance to any nation, where, I ask, is the necessity of deceiving ourselves or our constituents by this mere pretence of a compromise?

The gentlemen on the other side tell us that, if the restriction is carried, the Union will be dissolved. I have a more exalted opinion of the patriotism of the South; they will never cause American blood to be spilled, unless for reasons that would justify them in the eyes of the world; and, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, "the Almighty has no attribute that would side with them in such a cause as this would be." Has it come to this, that the extension of slavery is to be considered as one of the pillars of our liberty? This, indeed, would be a political paradox.

Mr. Melane denied that the Declaration of Independence was referred to slaves.

The Declaration was the act of open resistance on the part of the white freemen of the colonies against the pretensions of the mother country to govern them without their consent; to assert their inalienable right of self-government, and to alter or abolish it whenever it should be necessary to affect their safety and happiness. It was the resistance of freemen to the assumption of a power on the part of Great Britain, precisely similar to that which we are now endeavoring to impose upon the people of Missouri. It expressly asserts the principles that "all just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed" and the right of the people to alter or abolish and institute it anew, as to them shall seem most likely to affect their safety and happiness." I do not deny that the principles of the Declaration of Independence are those of the Constitution; on the contrary, I admit that they are those upon which all our institutions repose; they are those upon which the people of Missouri claim the right to make their own constitution, and resist the imposition of any species of government deriving its powers from any other source. But I contend that it never designed to assume or assert any principle whatsoever in regard to the slave population of the United States, and therefore that it cannot be used in this debate, either as declaratory of their rights or explanatory of the principles of the Constitution and Government in their behalf. It is unreasonable to assert the contrary, when everyone knows that, while the freemen of this country were openly resisting the usurpations of the British Crown, they did not relax in the slightest degree their hold upon the negro slave; and to him it was a matter of entire unconcern who should govern his master, as in all conditions his master would continue to govern him.

I do not advocate the consistency of all this: I take things as I find them under our form of government; though when we throw our eyes toward St. Domingo, and reflect upon the scenes which ensued—the headless enthusiasm which characterized the French Revolution—we cannot fail to admire the cautious wisdom of our ancestors in not hazarding the great object of their struggle by suddenly letting loose their unfortunate, though degraded, slave population. Besides, sir, the principles of the Declaration of Independence would not be satisfied by merely loosening the shackles of the slaves; they would assert not only the rights of a freeman but an equality of those rights, civil and political. And where is the State in the Union in which the emancipated negro has been admitted to the enjoyment of equal rights with the white population? I know of none.

Mr. McLane then replied to the argument that Congress could restrict slavery in a new State because of its constitutional power to make "all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

This clause, he said, was designed to relate to revenue. Nevertheless he admitted it was a plenary grant, but only so long as the regions affected remained in a state of territorial dependence.

The instant we authorize a Territory to form its constitution to enter the Union, its territorial disabilities and the power of Congress over it crumble together in the dust.

He also denied that the power to restrict slavery in a new State could be derived from the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. The prevention in the clause of the migration or importation of certain persons until 1808 related to foreign immigrants only.

The word "migration" cannot apply to the forcible or involuntary removal of a slave from any state, foreign or domestic. It is the voluntary act of a free agent; and a slave has no such will, and is no such agent. It is no exercise of a right when the unhappy slave is taken by his owner from place to place—he obeys a hard fate which he cannot control, and he can with no more propriety be said to migrate than the oxen who is driven from his family and home into involuntary banishment.

Mr. McLane, as a conclusion of his reasoning, argued for restriction of slavery in a territory, but none when it entered the Union. This was a practical solution of the problem, since the applicant for statehood having no slaves in its borders would naturally, of its own desire, restrict slavery in forming its constitution.

Mr. Sargent spoke against compromise as forbidden by the principles of both sides of the controversy. For his part he would never agree to the admission of Missouri with slavery. Slavery once introduced there, the hope of extinguishing it by emigration was destroyed. The reduction in the value of slaves was the only inducement that would ever effect the abolition of the evil institution.

Mr. Barbour repeated his former claim that the Ordinance of 1787 was a usurpation. On this point he quoted an extract from "The Federalist," No. 43, affirming that the acts of the "Old Congress" were "without the least color of constitutional authority." In his "Debates of Congress" Thomas H. Benton gives the following note on this point:

The phrase "constitutional authority," as here used by Mr. Madison, who was the author of this number, could not apply to the Constitution of the United States, as the ordinance was made before that instrument. It could refer only to the Articles of Confederation, which gave the fundamental law to the Old Congress, and was, in fact, its Constitution; and which, untainly, gave to the Congress none of the powers exercised in the enactment of the ordinance; nor was it supposed to grant such powers at the time.

Answering the contention that slavery, being a question adjusted in the Constitution by compromise, was a matter between only the original thirteen States who formed the Constitution, he said:

There were other subjects besides slavery adjusted by compromise; I will mention the most prominent one—that of an equal representation in the Senate. This is incontestably proven by the circumstance that, in the clause providing for amendments, it is declared that the Constitution shall not even be so amended as to deprive any State of its equal suffrage in the Senate without its own consent; this is the only provision which is forever put beyond the reach of amendment, in the ordinary mode. Now, sir, this was emphatically the work of a compromise in a vital part of the Constitution; the principle of gentlemen, if true, would lead to the conclusion that the new States were not entitled to the benefit of this provision, because they were not parties to the compromise; yet no gentleman will maintain this position; and, if he will not, he must give up the other upon the subject of slavery.

But, say, gentlemen, the powers which the Constitution does not give us we can get from the several States by compact. They say that both the United States and the State of Missouri are competent to make a contract; and that, if the one party make a proposition, and the other accept it, this is obligatory on them both. Even if this principle were true, an abundant answer is furnished by an argument which I believe has been already urged, and which I shall therefore only state, without pursuing it; it is that, by the treaty, which was a compact prior in point of time, and paramount in point of obligation, the people of Missouri have acquired certain rights, that therefore it is not competent for you, merely because you are the stronger, to say that you will not comply with its stipulations unless they will agree to another compact, the effect of which will be to deprive them of one of the rights which it gave them.

Gentlemen say that slavery is a moral wrong, and as such cannot be the subject of sovereignty; I answer that it is essential to sovereignty, and the highest act of its exercise is decide what is embraced within its limits, and that the very act of one government attempting to decide this question for another is a glaring violation of the sovereignty of that other; I answer further that sovereignty, in relation to the internal concerns of a State, has no limits but the observation and moral sense of the State itself, unless it relate to a subject the power over which has been specially delegated, and it has been the purpose of my whole argument to prove that this has not been so delegated. Suppose that a state, like ancient Sparta, should by its laws even sanction the barbarous practice of putting its debtors to death; suppose that it was so bad to the moral sense as to permit the most odious crimes against the laws of morality or religion to escape with impunity; have we the power to interfere in these matters of unscripted legislation, unless it be in relation to a subject over which the Constitution gives us power? I must be pardoned for repeating that we have no more than one of the governments of Europe.

The next clause from which the right to impose this restriction is derived is that which gives us power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States. I beg leave to remind the amendment that, as it respects the new Territory of Missouri, we have, by one of our own regulations, given it a legislative body; that we have extended to that body the whole power of legislation, subject only to the limitation that their laws shall not be inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States; a limitation in which every State in the Union is equally subject; the question of slavery is one of a legislative character, it therefore already belongs to them to decide it by our own grant. But we ask gentlemen can a grant of political power be revoked at the will of those who grant it? Would it not excite some surprise in this hall to talk of revoking a common charter of incorporation such as that of the Bank of the United States, unless for some cause of forfeiture of that charter? Whatever is our power over the Territories, it is acknowledged that it coincides with the territorial condition, and that when that ceases the power over them, as such, ceases also. It is acknowledged that we could not impose this condition after the State is admitted; and yet it is contended that it may be done just before its admission, by virtue of a territorial power which must necessarily exist at the moment when the admission takes place; in a word, it is argued that, by virtue of a power confessedly temporary, we can impose a condition in its character perpetual if we so will. I cannot show the glaring inconsistency of this position in so palpable a mode as by showing it to be a case of unscripted law. Let us put the case of question and writ. A gentleman has power to make leases of his ward's land, during his minority, and to expire with it; the moment after his ward reaches majority he has no power over the estate; and yet, sir, upon the principle now contended for, he might enter into a contract the day before the minority ceased which would bind the ward and his heirs forever. If such a proposition as this were stated in the judicial hall, in another part of this Capitol, the gentleman would be told that it could not even be received for discussion.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Hemphill] asked can a man have a vested interest in an unborn human being? And he answered, no. If this be the doctrine, sir, though that gentleman did not apply it, and I believe did not intend to apply it to the old States, I repeat again that it proclaims universal emancipation, after failure of the present generation of slaves. Sir, it is of no importance that the present Congress do not apply it; we are but actors who fret our busy hour upon the stage and then pass away; others will come to act their parts, and these principles may then be put into practical execution in their utmost extent. I will not detain the committee to prove that a property in the parent implies property in the progeny. The maxim, "Partus sequitur ventrem," is as old as the civil law; it is founded upon the immutable principle that wherever I have property in the capital stock I have the same property in its products. He who owns the land owns all the fruit which it produces. If, then, you may admit my property in the parent, you cannot deny it in the child. If, indeed, you deny my right to a vested interest in an unborn human being, you may, perhaps, go one step further and deny the same interest in those who now exist. The argument is as strong in one case as the other. Assume but this principle, and then you need not wait for futurity to do this great work of emancipation. No, sir, you may say at once to every bond man in the United States you are free.

I look upon the Union of these States as the ark of our political safety; if that be lost, we may bid farewell, a long farewell, to all our pleasing hopes and fond anticipations of future greatness and glory. They will be as the illusions of a doubtful dream. But, while I deprecate disunion as the most tremendous evil, I cannot shut my eyes against the light of experience; I cannot turn a deaf ear to the warning voice of history; from these we learn that harmony in the spirit which can alone animate and sustain a confederate republic. While this spirit exists, it is displayed in acts of legislation reciprocally beneficent to every member of the confederacy, and these become new ligaments to bind them together in the bonds of brotherhood; this spirit is not all at once extinguished, nor are the bonds of union suddenly burst asunder; but when, instead of this beneficent spirit of legislation which I have described, a different course prevails, this spirit of harmony gives way successively to jealousy, distrust, and, finally, discord; let but this last spring up among us, you may consider the days of the Republic as numbered, and that it is fast hastening to its dissolution.

When that sad catastrophe shall befall us this noble confederacy which, in its undivided state, could stand against a world in arms, will be broken, if not into its constituent parts, into some minor confederacies, the victims of foreign intrigue and of their own border hatred. Where, then, will be your commerce which covers every sea? Where your army and navy, the means of your defence, the instruments of your glory? They will be remembered only to make the contrast with your then situation more painful. What will become, then, of this boundless tract of Western land, the subject of the present contest, which has poured and would continue to pour such rich streams of wealth into your treasury? It may become the theater on which the title to itself may be decided, not by congressional debate, not by construction of treaties or constitutions, but by that force which always begins where constitutions end. I conjure you, then, beware lest by this measure you excite the discontent of one-half of the Union, by legislating injuriously to them upon a subject in which they have so deep a stake of interest and you have none in point of property; take care that you do not awaken the painful reflection that the federal arm is strong only to destroy.

Charles Pinckney, who had taken a prominent part in the Constitutional Convention [see Vol. I, chapters x and xii], spoke with authority upon the intention of that convention in regard to points which had become subjects of contention in the present debate.

He denied that the North had made a concession to the South in including three-fifths of slave population in the basis of representation in the House of Representatives. Instead, the concession was from the South.

In our first national compact, the Confederation, in which the equality of vote was preserved, the first acquiescence was shown on the subject of not using or even alluding to the word slavery, or making it a part of our political machinery. In this compact the value of the lands and improvements was made the rule for apportioning the public burdens and taxes. But the Northern States, who are always much more alive to their interests than the Southern, found that their acquiescence was inconsistent with their interest; and, as usual, made the latter prevail. They found it was paying too dear for their quies to keep their hand from the slaves any longer. At their instance, and on their motion, as will appear by a reference to the Journals of the Old Congress, the rule was changed, and apportionment was based on population, including the whites and three-fifths of other descriptions. This rule was retained by the Constitutional Convention.

Mr. Pinckney then explained the expectation of the convention in regard to Federal revenue, saying that it was assumed that this would come from direct taxation. Instead, however, Congress early adopted indirect taxation in the form of tariffs and excises, which has resulted in the benefit of the North and the injury of the South. The exports of the States from Maine to Pennsylvania now annually amounted to $18,000,000; those of the other States to $32,000,000, enabling an almost double importation of foreign products on which duties were assessed.

And here let me ask from whence do these exports arise? By whose hands are they made? I answer, entirely by the slaves; and yet these valuable inhabitants, without whom your very Government could not go on, and the labor of two or three of whom in the Northern States is more valuable to it than the labor of five of their inhabitants in the Eastern States, the States owning and possessing them are denied a representation here but for three-fifths, while the whole of the comparatively unproductive inhabitants of the Northern and Eastern States are fully represented here. Is it just—is this equal? And yet they have the modesty to complain of the representation as unjust and unequal; and that they have not the return made them they expected, by taxing the slaves, and making them bear a proportion of the public burdens. Some writers on political economy are of opinion that the representation of a State ought always to be equitably founded on population and taxation. It is my duty to believe that these are the true criterion; for my own State (South Carolina) having, in her House of Representatives, 124 members, 62 of them are apportioned by the white population and 62 on taxation; thus representing the contributions of our citizens in every way, whether arising from services or taxes.

Mr. Pinckney then discussed the "migration" clause in the Constitution.

The reasons for restraining the power to prevent migration hitherto for twenty years were, to the best of my recollection, these: That, as at this time, we had immense and almost immeasurable territory, peopled by not more than two millions and a half of inhabitants, it was of very great consequence to encourage the emigration of able, skilful, and industrious Europeans.

It was maintained that the safest mode would be to pursue the course for twenty years, and not, before that period, put it all into the power of Congress to shut it; that, by that time, the Union would be so settled and our population would be so much increased we could proceed on our own stock, without further accession of foreigners; that, as Congress were to be prohibited from stopping the importation of slaves to settle the Southern States, as no obstacle was to be thrown in the way of their increase and settlement for that period, let it be so with the Northern and Eastern, to which, particularly New York and Philadelphia, it was expected most of the emigrants would go from Europe; and it so happened, for, previous to the year 1808, more than double as many Europeans emigrated to those States as Africans were imported into the Southern States.

Having thus, I trust, proved clearly that you have no right to adopt this inhibition of slavery, but are forbidden to do so by the Constitution, as well as by the treaty, I ought perhaps to stop here; but there are some other points which I ought not to pass unnoticed. One of these is the ordinance of July, 1787, passed by the Old Congress, at the period of the sitting of the convention in Philadelphia, for forming the Constitution, by which that body (the Old Congress) undertook to form a code for the future settlement, government, and admission into the Union of all the territory northwest of the River Ohio ceded by Virginia to the United States in 1785. On this subject I beg leave to remark that, by the Confederation of the United States, the Old Congress had no power whatever but that of admitting new States, provided nine States assented. This ordinance, therefore, in prescribing the forms of government, as they respected legislative, executive, and judiciary powers, in establishing bills of rights, and the times and terms of their admission into the Union, and inhibiting servitude therein, is chargeable with ingratitude and usurpation. It is chargeable with ingratitude when we reflect that the cession of the great tract of country—this rising empire of freemen—was gratuitously, and with noble disinterestedness and patriotism, made by Virginia, that the passing of an ordinance which contained a provision which could not but go to prevent the admission of Virginians there, as they could not move there with their slaves, was a most ungracious and ungrateful return to that State for her liberality, and could not but meet with the disapprobation of this nation.

Let us, sir, recollect the circumstances the Old Congress were in at the time they passed this ordinance: they had dwindled almost to nothing; the convention had been then three months in session; it was universally known a constitution was in its essentials agreed to; and the public were daily expecting (what soon happened) the promulgation of a new form of government for the Union. I ask, sir, was it under these circumstances proper for a feeble, dwindled body, that had wholly lost the confidence of the nation, and which was then waiting its supersession by the people—a feeble, inefficient body, in which only seven or eight States were represented, the whole of which consisted of but seventeen or eighteen men—a number smaller than your large committees; a body literally in the very agonies of political death—was it, sir, even decent in them (not to say lawful or constitutional) to have passed an ordinance of such importance?

Mr. Darlington replied to the argument of Mr. Reid that slavery, admittedly a poison, should be diluted by dispersion throughout the territories.

Rather would he call slavery a contagious disease in the body politic. Like smallpox, it ought to be confined in the smallest possible limits. The Congress of 1787 introduced a sort of political vaccination into the constitutions of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, which effectually secured those States from the evil; and I am also for extending the same salutary process to our infant sister, Missouri. And why? Is it to injure her? Is it to mutilate or disfigure her? No, sir, it is to secure her health and to preserve her beauty!

break down, and which will ever prevent us from carrying into operation, in extenso, this great principle. Take this principle and preach it up to the monarchs of the world; will they descend from their lofty eminences or raise mankind to a level with themselves? No, sir, the principle, although lovely and beautiful, cannot obliterate those distinctions in society which society itself engenders and gives birth to. Liberty and equality are captivating sounds; but they often captivate to destroy. England had her Jack Cades and levelers. Look, I pray you, to revolutionary France. These were the principles of that day. Mark the consequences! Murder and rapine stalked over the land, and the guillotine, the work, too, of a philanthropist of that day, was the sad monument of this fallacy. Liberty and equality were proclaimed by Robespierre and his associates at the very moment when these men were enriching the fields of France with the blood of her citizens. Nor was the doctrine confined to political institutions, but, advancing with a daring step, it fought even with the Creator and mocked at the immutable truth of religion.

Turn your eyes also to South America. The throne of the Incas was washed from under them by the tide which flowed in from Spain. The native of the forest was deprived of his freedom and made to toil for his new master. Then, too, sprung up a philanthropist, who claimed for the Indian an equal rank in creation with the inhabitants of Spain. His claim was admitted, and Africa mourned over the mistake, and her deepest curses may still be uttered against the memory of Las Casas.

But, Mr. Chairman, although I do not believe that this principle of equality can be applied to man in extenso, yet I love it, and admire it as an abstract truth, and will carry it into operation whensoever I can; and, sir, I call on gentlemen to lend me their aid in the present instance. If we cannot raise the black man up to the level of the white—and that we have not the constitutional power to do so none here have denied—let us raise, at least, the white man up to this level. Extend an equality of rights to the people of Missouri. Place them upon a footing with the people of New York, Connecticut, and of the other States. They have the right to alter, to amend, to abolish their constitutions. You say to the people of New York, alter your constitution as you see fit in all its parts. Will you say in the same breath to the people of Missouri, you shall not exercise this right in regard to your constitution? Is this your boasted equality? If it be, sir, "I will have none of it." It is base coin, and will not pass current.

Replying to the argument that all citizens of the United States had common rights in the Territories, and therefore that Congress could not prevent slaveholders going there with their property, he said that it was admitted that Missouri could exclude slavery. What then became of the common right?

My inference, therefore, is that the right to carry slaves into a new State or Territory is not a Federal right, but a local one.

Mr. Tyler delivered a speech of great argumentative force and rhetorical beauty.

"Tell me not of huplied and doubtful powers; against them I weigh the very nature of our Government and the spirit of our institutions. They are founded on the great principle that man is capable of self-government; that he requires no foreign aid in regulating his domestic concerns. Our Revolution was founded on this principle; England denied to us the right to legislate, except by her special authority; nay, she proclaimed the very principle which you now proclaim as applicable to Missouri—the right to bind you by her own system of legislation. To this the American spirit did not bow. It went forth to the battle, in the majesty of its strength, and achieved the victory of our independence. But, sir, the principle which we are called on to adopt goes, by a slightest distance, further than England ever dared to go. Her acts of legislation were fleeting and ephemeral; liable at all times to repeal; but we are to legislate, not only for the present day but for all ages to come. This restriction, if adopted, is unalterable and interminable in its duration. No succeeding generation have any power over it. It constitutes the very essence of the political existence of Missouri. It is the condition precedent, and must, through all future time, attach to the estate.

Gentlemen have exultingly read to us the Declaration of Independence. From it they have gathered that which, as an abstract truth, I am not disposed to deny: "that all men are, by nature, equally free, sovereign, and independent." Can this proposition admit of application to a state of society? Does not its fallacy meet you in every walk of life? Distinctions will exist. Virtue and vice, wealth and poverty, industry and idleness constitute so many barriers, which human power cannot

This is said, too, to be a parental care for Missouri. I am pleased with plain and simple illustrations: would a father act in the way in which you propose to act? The child has attained the age of twenty-one; by the laws of society that child is entitled to an equality of rights with himself; and what would you think of the parent who should say to the child, "Sir, you are now a man, but you shall not exercise the rights of a man, except upon conditions"? Would the child submit? Would a kind parent hold such language?

Missouri is now full grown; this, your offspring, has attained full age; attempt no longer to trammel her; let her set up for herself, and, although you may advise her, do not attempt to force her. Sir, she will not and ought not to submit to force; she would disgrace her parent stock if she did so. The grand Roman spirit which inhabits every portion of this country spurns control. Would you humiliate this spirit if you could? If you would, you cannot do it; but, if you could, your country would have no cause to thank you for so doing.

What will be the consequences if you persist in this course? A sectional feeling is already generated; a geographic line is drawn. Tell me not of that policy which shall divide the people of this country by local feelings and prejudices. This is the bane of a republic—it is the rock which ought to be most cautiously avoided; sir, it is the greatest of all dangers to the union of these States. Take not my poor word for it; Nay, disregard the admonitions of him who has so often been called the Father of his Country. Forget the vocabulary address of Washington. But can you, or will you, close your eyes to the lights of experience? United thrones stand up successfully against the mighty power of Xerxes; and the fall of Leonidas was but the precursor of the glory achieved at Marathon and Plataea. But Sparta wished to dominate over Athens, and their intestine feuds opened the channel to that flood of vandalism which deluged Greece and obliterated all traces of freedom. Such, too, was the fate of the Asiatic League. I beseech gentlemen then to pause, lest they produce a similar division of sentiment in this happy land.

Let us avoid a question like this present. Gentlemen on the opposite side may yield without dishonor. They pursue but a scheme of policy; we are differently situated; we cannot, with our violation of our oaths, support this measure. We believe in our consciences that the Constitution confers on us no such power. For myself, I cannot and will not yield one inch of ground. Let me, then, adjure our brethren from the North to come and sit down once more by our side. I call on them to heal the differences which this measure has produced. Your course is palpable and plain. You have two roads before you; take this, and all is harmony and peace; over that hang doubts and fears. I invoke the Genius of the Constitution to cover and protect us against the evils which threaten us. What if you impose the restriction, and Missouri, instead of submitting, shall form herself into a community and demand admittance, or sever from the Union? Will you then retract? How much more honorable to do it now! Or do you mean to persist in your object at all hazards, and, if she prove refractory, reduce her to submission? Do you believe that Southern bayonets will ever be plunged in Southern hearts?

When the compromise measure was presented to the House by the conference committee Mr. Stevens spoke as follows:

I have listened with pain to the very long, protracted debate that has been had on this unfortunate question. I call it unfortunate, sir, because it has drawn forth the worst passions of man in the course of the discussion.

If the deadliest enemy this country has, or ever had, could dictate language the most likely to destroy your glory, prosperity, and happiness, would it not be precisely what has been so profusely used in this debate—sectional vaunting? Indeed, sir, there is no view of this unhappy division of our country but must be sickening to the patriot and in direct violation of the dictates of wisdom, and the last, though not least, important advice of the Father and Friend of his Country. He forbids the use of the words Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western, as descriptive of the various parts of your country.

But, sir, we have now arrived at a point at which every gentleman agrees something must be done. A precipice lies before us at which perdition is inevitable. Gentlemen on both sides of this question, and in both Houses, indoors and out of doors, have evinced a determination that augurs ill of the high destinies of this country! And who does not tremble for the consequences?

I wish not to be misunderstood, sir. I don't pretend to say that in just five calendar months your Union will be at an end; your Constitution destroyed; your proud trophies, won in the most valiant combat, profaned; glories of half a century, gained by yourselves and your departed friends, and unequaled in the history of any country or people on the face of the earth, made the sport of an envying world; and all this in a sacrilegious contest, at the end of which no wise man would give a "pea-straw for his choice on which side to be found, as the victors would have lost all and the vanquished have nothing left to excite envy.

But, sir, I do say, and, for the verity of the remark, cite the lamentable history of our own time, that the result of a failure to compromise at this time, in the way now proposed, or in some other way satisfactory to both, would be to create ruthless hatred, irradicable jealousy, and a total forgetfulness of the ardor of patriotism, to which, as it has heretofore existed, we owe, under Providence, more solid national glory and social happiness than ever before were possessed by any people, nation, kindred, or tongue under Heaven.

In accordance with the act of Congress Missouri adopted a constitution and presented it to Congress for ratification. This contained a clause by which the State legislature was obliged to pass laws against the entry of free colored persons into the State. The Northern Senators and Representatives objected to this clause as an infringement upon the national Constitution, which declares (Art. IV, sec. 2) that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

After a spirited debate of several weeks in both chambers of the national legislature, at the end of which the Missouri constitution remained unratified, Henry Clay, the Speaker of the House, proposed a conference of committees from the Senate and House which brought forward a compromise measure, allowing the admission of the State provided that the legislature should pass an act declaring that it would never exclude any citizen of another State from the privileges and immunities to which he is entitled under the Constitution of the United States. The measure was adopted by Congress on February 28, 1821, and approved by the President on March 2. The legislature complied with this condition demanded of it and the State was admitted, thus putting an end to the portentous struggle of two years and one-half duration.

THE question of the abolition of slavery in places where it already prevailed by law in distinction to the restriction of the institution to its existing legal limits began to be systematically agitated soon after the Missouri Compromise.

The leader in this movement was Benjamin Lundy, editor of The Genius of Universal Emancipation. In 1829 he was joined by William Lloyd Garrison, who afterwards (January 1, 1831) established The Liberator.

Lundy and other men who became prominent in the abolition movement, such as James G. Birney and Gerrit Smith, had originally been members of the Colonization Society, and to understand the progress of the anti-slavery movement it will be well at this point to discuss briefly the origin and character of the less radical organization.

As early as 1801 President Jefferson and James Madison, then Governor of Virginia, had considerable correspondence on the subject of colonizing free negroes out of the country as a step forward in solving the slavery question. A number of philanthropists early in the century also began to agitate the project, and in 1816 a Colonization Society was organized in Princeton, N. J. A few years afterwards it was reorganized at Washington, D. C., as the "National Colonization Society." Bushrod Washington, a nephew of George Washington, and an Associate-Justice of the Supreme Court, was made its president, and The African Repository was established as its organ.

The society grew rapidly, and by 1827 it had branches in almost every State, and was supported by distinguished people of every political complexion, including James Madison and Henry Clay, as well as Benjamin Lundy and other abolitionists.

In 1821 a region on the east coast of Africa at Cape Mesurado was purchased and named Liberia, its chief town being called Monrovia for President Monroe. On February 7, 1827, the society, through Senator Ezekiel Chambers [Md.], presented a memorial to the Senate asking Government aid to send free negroes to Liberia. The memorial was opposed by Senator Robert Y. Hayne [S. C.]. It was laid on the table.

GOVERNMENT AID TO COLONIZE NEGROES

SENATE, FEBRUARY 7-9, 1827

SENATOR CHAMBERS.—I know no question not immediately involving the very existence of the Government which ought to excite so deeply the anxious reflection of every patriot. That part of the population of the States which it is the object of the society to remove is a degraded, miserable race of beings. They are not, cannot be, citizens of your country—they do not add to your physical energies—they do not effect the legitimate object of any one appropriate class of a well-organized community—they are anything but a laboring class. It were well did they only present a negative character, but your free blacks exert the most deleterious influence. The corrupting poison of their example and their habits has infected our slaves and made them indolent and immoral.

You are advised by intelligent and discreet men whose lives have been devoted to the consideration of this subject that the plan now proposed will probably remove, certainly lessen, these evils. You are advised that the means of accomplishing the plan are in the power and under the legal control of Congress. If authority be required to sanction such opinions, you have it in the deliberate and formal decisions of the legislatures of a large proportion of the States of this Union—States in which slavery is allowed, and States in which it is not allowed. The States of Virginia, Maryland, Kentucky, and Tennessee have each made a legislative declaration of their views upon this subject. Georgia has so far expressed an opinion, in that she has directed the captive Africans, who, by former laws of Congress, were placed at the disposal of the State, to be delivered to this Colonization Society to be sent to Africa.

SENATOR HAYNE.—The gentleman from Maryland has vindicated the object of the society. He insists that it is not the wish or intention of the society to interfere with or in any way disturb the policy of the Southern States. So say the society. But, sir, facts speak stronger than professions. And what are the facts? Are not the members and agents of this society everywhere (even while disclaiming all such intentions) making proclamations that the end of their scheme is universal emancipation? Have we not heard their orators, at their meetings here, openly held under the eyes of Congress, asking whether, when all the free people of color are transported, we are to stop there; and answering their question by the avowal that the great work will be but then begun? Sir, let any man examine the whole scope and tendency of the reports and speeches made to this society, nay, of this very manifesto, published by their authority, and he must be dull of apprehension if he does not perceive that the spirit which lurks beneath their fair professions is hostile to the peace and best interests of the Southern States; and not the less so because it comes clothed in the garb of friendship and with professions of peace and good will. Besides, sir, does not every Southern man know that, wherever the Colonization Society has invaded our country, a spirit of hostility to our institutions has instantly sprung up?

Passing over the indirect evils of this society, what would be the direct tendency and effect of the adoption of its policy by the Federal Government? The national funds are to be appropriated for the purpose of transporting such slaves as their owners may consent to emancipate for that purpose. If this be taken up as a national object; if we have the power and the inclination, and should resolve to appropriate the public money to this object, of course we would be at liberty to offer any temptation we please to induce the owners of slaves to consent. It is useless to disguise the truth—if this policy should ever be adopted by this Government, the members of the society will go directly into the market as the purchasers of our slaves, for the purpose of emancipation and transportation. Now, I will ask gentlemen to contemplate dispassionately the effect that is to be produced on the Southern States, by this Government being notoriously in the market, with its treasury of $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, as the purchasers of our slaves for the purpose of emancipation. Can you touch this mass of a now contented, happy, and useful class of beings without disquieting their minds, creating dissatisfaction, destroying their usefulness, and bringing ruin on the whole community? Much has been already done to destroy the confidence and impair the mutual affection which have hitherto so happily subsisted between the master and his slave; but adopt this policy and they will be destroyed forever. Besides, sir, once bring this Government into the market as purchasers and they will fix their own terms. Once admit the principle, and, in its application, it must inevitably lead to divesting us of our property on such terms as Congress may choose to prescribe; the insidious movements of colonization and abolition societies, the distribution of political tracts, and a few incendiary resolutions introduced into Congress and the State legislatures (events which have, in part, occurred even in our own time) will reduce the value of our property to any standard this Government chooses to prescribe. So it has been in the West Indies, and so it will be here. I am informed by a gentleman who has lived many years in the West Indies that, by the perpetual agitation of this question in Great Britain, in and out of Parliament, lands in that country have been reduced to less than half their value; and slaves to ten pounds per head; and should the British Government choose to purchase them it will be the easiest thing in nature so to shake the public confidence in that species of property as to reduce their value to nothing.

In this view of the subject, can any man be so blind as not to see and feel the dangerous tendency of the measures recommended to us by this society? Sir, the truth cannot be disguised—it must be told. The only safety of the Southern States is to be found in the want of power on the part of the Federal Government to touch the subject at all. Thank God, the Constitution gives them no power to engage in the work of colonization, or to interfere with our institutions, either for good or for evil. This is the very "Ark of the Covenant," in which alone we will find safety.

In December, 1833, the American Anti-Slavery Society was formed in Philadelphia, with Beriah Green as president and Lewis Tappan and John G. Whittier as secretaries.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The first attempts to secure the abolition of slavery were directed upon the District of Columbia as the point of easiest attack, since Congress had sole power over the "Federal District," limited only by conditions of the grants of the territory from Maryland and Virginia, and by the general restrictions of its powers in the Constitution.

During the session of 1828-29 a petition was presented to Congress signed by over 1,000 citizens of the District praying for a gradual emancipation of slavery therein, owing to the great abuses which had arisen in regard to the treatment of the slaves; it was referred to a committee which failed to report it.

Early in the next session (on January 6, 1829) the subject was again brought before the House by Charles Miner [Pa.]. He offered a preamble and resolution; the preamble stated at length such abuses in the District growing out of slavery as the kidnapping of free negroes, use of public prisons for the domestic slave trade, etc., and the resolution declared that a committee be appointed to investigate these abuses and to inquire into "the expediency of providing by law for the gradual abolition of slavery within the District in such manner that the interests of no individual shall be injured thereby."

On January 9 the preamble was separated from the resolutions and the whole was voted upon in sections, the preamble being negatived by a vote of 141 to 37, the first resolution adopted by 120 to 29, and the second resolution adopted by 114 to 66. Nothing, however, came of the inquiry thereby ordered.

On January 13, 1836, Leonard Jarvis [Mo.] moved in the House that "the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia ought not to be entertained by Congress," and that petitions to this effect "ought to be laid upon the table without being referred or printed." On February 8 Henry L. Pinckney [S. C.] moved that a special committee be appointed to consider the petitions, Mr. Jarvis's resolution and all others dealing with the subject, "with instructions to report that Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States," and ought not to interfere in case of the District of Columbia. This was passed by an overwhelming vote, Henry A. Wise [Va.] refusing to vote, saying:

I refuse to vote at all upon such a proposition; because to affirm any proposition by declaratory resolution is to admit it needs affirmation; and because Congress has no constitutional power either to affirm or deny any proposition whatever in relation to slavery in the States.

On May 18, 1836, Mr. Pinckney presented the report of the committee. It was a very exhaustive one, occupying an hour and a half in reading. It concluded with the resolutions it had been instructed to present, together with the Jarvis resolution, expanded so as to prohibit all consideration of resolutions, as well as petitions, on the subject of slavery. After considerable debate the resolutions were adopted: the first, declaring Congress had no constitutional authority to interfere with slavery in the States, by 182 votes to 9; the second, that it ought not so to interfere in the District of Columbia, by 132 votes to 45; and the third, that consideration be refused petitions and resolutions on the subject of slavery, by 117 votes to 68. When the name of John Quincy Adams was called on the third resolution the ex-President rose and, refusing to vote, said: "I hold the resolution to be a direct violation of the Constitution of the United States, the rules of this House, and the rights of my constituents." Mr. Adams resumed his seat amid loud cries of "order" from all parts of the hall.

In the debate on the motion the speakers in behalf of the right of petition were ex-President Adams and Francis Granger [N. Y.], and those in opposition in greater or less degree were Franklin Pierce [N. H.], Waddy Thompson, Jr. [S. C.], and Henry L. Pinckney [S. C.].

THE GAG LAW

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 16, 1835-FEBRUARY 12, 1836

MR. PIERCE.—This was not the last memorial of the same character which would be sent here. It was perfectly apparent that the question must be met now, or at some future time, fully and explicitly, and such an expression of this House given as could leave no possible room to doubt as to the opinions and sentiments entertained by its members. He, indeed, considered the overwhelming vote of the House the other day, laying a memorial of similar tenor, and, he believed, the same in terms, upon the table, as fixing upon it the stamp of reprobation. He supposed that all sections of the country would be satisfied with that expression; but gentlemen seemed now to consider the vote as equivocal and evasive. He was unwilling that any imputation should rest upon the North, in consequence of the misguided and fanatical zeal of a few—comparatively very few—who, however honest might have been their purposes, he believed had done incalculable mischief, and whose movements he knew received no more sanction among the great mass of the people of the North than they did at the South. For one, he, while he would be the last to infringe upon any of the sacred reserved rights of the people, was prepared to stamp with disapprobation, in the most express and unequivocal terms, the whole movement upon this subject.

MR. ADAMS.—I am perfectly satisfied that the true and only method of keeping this subject out of discussion is to refer all petitions of this kind to the Committee on the District of Columbia, or some other committee of the House, to receive their report, and to accept it unanimously. This does equal justice to all parties in the country; it avoids the discussion of this agitating question on the one hand and, on the other, it pays a due respect to the right of the constituent to petition.

From the moment that these petitions are referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, they go to the family vault "of all the Capulets," and you will never hear of them afterward.

But if you are to lay these petitions on the table, if you come to the resolution that this House will not receive any more petitions, what will be the consequence? In a large portion of this country every individual member who votes with you will be left at home at the next election, and some one will be sent who is not prepared to lay these petitions on the table.

What will be the next consequence? Sir, you will have discussion; and, to my regret I say it, discussion has been called for and challenged upon this floor. It has been challenged. And what will the discussion amount to? A discussion upon the merits of slavery. Sir, on such a discussion every speech made by a representative from the north of Mason and Dixon's line, in this House, will be an incendiary pamphlet, and what will you do with them? The speeches of my colleagues, probably of myself, will be incendiary; because, if discussion is thrust upon us, I doubt not I might make a speech as incendiary as any pamphlet upon which such torrents of denunciation have here been poured. If I were capable of the craven and recreant spirit of shrinking from expressing, not probably so much my own sentiments as those of my constituents, I should go home to their scorn, and they would send here a man who would represent them more faithfully.

Well, sir, what becomes of these incendiary pamphlets, the speeches in this House, if they go to the public? What will be done with them by the public press? The newspapers report these speeches; every speech is circulated through your whole country; and how can you arrest it? Will you introduce a resolution that members of this House shall not speak a word in derogation of the sublime merits of slavery? You must have a resolution of this kind, to follow the one laid upon your table this morning—a resolution that no member of this House shall dare to utter an incendiary sentiment? And what is that incendiary sentiment? Why, it is, in substance, the contents of these pamphlets. Well, sir, you begin with suppressing the right of petition; you must next suppress the right of speech in this House; for you must offer a resolution that every member who dares to express a sentiment of this kind shall be expelled, or that the speeches shall not go forth to the public—shall not be circulated. What will be the consequence then? You suppress the right of petition; you suppress the freedom of speech; the freedom of the press and the freedom of religion; for, in the minds of many worthy, honest, and honorable men—fanatics, if you please so to call them—this is a religious question, in which they act under what they believe to be a sense of duty to their God; and, however erroneous may be their conclusions, it is not for me, nor for this House, to judge them. Therefore, sir, in deference to what has been heretofore the usage of this House, in deference to the respect which is due to the right of petition, and the respect which is due to the right of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of religion, I hope that this petition will be left where it has been placed by the House, in the possession of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and that we shall hear no more about it.

MR. THOMPSON.—As to discussing this subject before any human tribunal, I will not. I will not condescend to vindicate to this House or elsewhere this or any other of our domestic institutions. It is no affair of yours; you have no right to touch it, still less to demand a reason of us for its continuance. The gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. Pierce—and I must say that his voice sounded in my ear as the voice of a friend—said that we of the South could not know the state of things at the North; that in his district there was not one abolitionist in five hundred. If I did not know it before, I do now, sir, because he has said so. Let me say, in my turn, that he does not know the state of feeling at the South; and I do, with a full knowledge of all my responsibilities, declare that, in my opinion, nothing will satisfy the excited, the almost frenzied, South but an indignant rejection of these petitions; such a rejection as will, at the same time that it respects the right of petitioning, express the predetermination, the foregone conclusion, of the House on the subject—a rejection, sir, that will satisfy the South and serve as an indignant rebuke to the fanatics of the North. But we are told that such a course, while it would satisfy the South, would offend the people of the North. How so, sir? I had thought that it was the South that was interfered with, the South that was injured, that it was the South that was to be satisfied. Who is it at the North that we are to conciliate? The fanatics? Fanatics, did I say, sir? Never before was so vile a band dignified with that name. They are murderers, foul murderers, accessories before the fact, and they know it, of murder, robbery, rape, infanticide. Sir, this question must be settled; if I may so speak, it must be killed; a just regard to the rights and feelings of the South, to the peace and harmony of this great Republic, the permanency of our institutions, demand it; in short, sir, every consideration which can address itself to a patriot demands it. Yes, sir, in the presence of the armed monarchies of Europe, with all the powerful elements both on this and the other side of the Atlantic, already in incipient commotion, already rumbling in their deep crater, he is wilfully blind who does not see that the time is not distant when union, concert, all the patriotism, all the virtue, all the wisdom of our whole country will be demanded. Shall we, sir, continue to stir this most prolific source of discord, aye, of hatred, or shall we settle it, and forever?

MR. GRANGER.—Sir, who are these petitioners? They are persons who, looking to the letter of the Constitution of their country, and finding there that Congress has the right of exclusive legislation for this district, and not looking beyond that, to the grants of session by the States of Virginia and Maryland, to see under what reservations those grants were made and accepted, and without stopping to ask the still more important question whether the residents of the District of Columbia require any interference, suppose that Congress have the right to legislate upon this subject. Starting upon this abstract proposition, they have supposed they had a right to appear at the bar of this House, and to ask that the seat of Government of a free nation should be inhabited by those only who are free.

Such, sir, is the condition of these petitioners; and I can never consent that they should be designated as murderers, or that their names should be mingled with those of the abolitionists.

Mr. PINCKNEY considered the question settled. The Government had made a solemn covenant upon this subject with the slaveholding States; Congress might violate the Constitution; it could not, would not, violate the public faith. It was bound hand and foot. The South had nothing now to fear, except from those who are determined to continue the agitation of slavery for the purpose of excitement. Abolitionism has attained its height. It has begun to go down, and will soon disappear entirely, if we do not fan the flame ourselves and will only allow our friends in the non-slaveholding States to fight the fanatics in their own way, and not trammel them in their operations by mixing up extraneous and unnecessary questions with the subject of abolition.

CENSURE OF JOHN QUINCY ADAMS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 6-9, 1837

During the next session of Congress, on February 6, 1837, Caleb Cushing [Mass.] presented in the House various petitions from "ladies" of his State praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. These were received and laid on the table, without debate or commitment, under the resolution of the House. John Quincy Adams [Mass.] then rose and said that he presented a petition from nine "ladies" or women (which term he used became afterwards a subject of dispute) of Fredericksburg, Va. He would not name them, he said:

"Because, from the disposition which at present prevailed in the country, he did not know what might happen to them if he did name them. It was not a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, but it was a petition praying Congress to put a stop to the slave trade in the District of Columbia. Whether it was genuine or not, it was not for him to determine."

JOHN Q. [ADAMS] INTRODUCING HAYTIAN AMBASSADE TO LADIES OF NEW ENGLAND

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, under the resolution.

Mr. ADAMS said he held in his hand a paper on which, before it was presented, he desired to have the decision of the Speaker, James K. Polk [of Tennessee]. It was a petition from twenty-two persons, declaring themselves to be slaves. He wished to know whether the Speaker considered such a petition as coming within the order of the House.

The Speaker said he could not tell until he had the contents of the petition in his possession.

Mr. ADAMS said that if the paper was sent to the clerk's table it would be in possession of the House, and if sent to the Speaker he would see what were its contents. He [Mr. A.] wished to do nothing except in submission to the rules of the House.

The Speaker said that it was the first time in the recollection of the Chair that persons not free had presented a petition to this House. The Chair wished to take the sense of the House, which he had a right to do.

DIXON H. LEWIS [Ala.] believed that the House should punish severely such an infraction of its decorum and its rules; and he called on the members from the slaveholding States to come forward now and demand from the House the punishment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

SEATON GRANTLAND [Ga.] would second the motion, and go all lengths in support of it.

Mr. LEWIS said that, if the House would inflict no punishment for such flagrant violations of its dignity as this, it would be better for the representatives from the slaveholding States to go home at once.

JULIUS C. ALFORD [Ga.] said that, if the gentleman from Massachusetts should present this petition, that moment he [Mr. Alford] should move, as an act of justice to the South, which he in part represented, and which he conceived had been treated with indignity, that it be taken from the House and burned; and he hoped that every man who was a friend to the Constitution would support him. There must be an end to this constant attempt to raise excitement, or the Union could not exist much longer. The moment any man should disgrace the Government under which he lived by presenting a petition from slaves praying for emancipation, he hoped that petition would, by order of the House, be committed to the flames.

JOHN M. PATTON [Va.] moved to suspend the rule to enable him to submit a motion to take from the table, to be hereafter disposed of as the House may decide, the paper already presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and which had been laid on the table under the resolution of the House; he alluded to the paper presented as a petition from nine ladies of Fredericksburg. He [Mr. P.] would state in his place, and on his responsibility, that the name of no lady was attached to that paper. He did not believe there was a single one of them of decent respectability. He believed the signatures to be genuine, and he recognized only one name which he had known before, and that was the name of a free mulatto woman of the worst fame and reputation. He therefore moved that the paper which had been received and laid on the table should be taken from the table and returned to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Waddy Thompson [S. C.], moved as an amendment to the motion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Patton] the following resolution:

Resolved, That the honorable John Quincy Adams, by the attempt just made by him to introduce a petition purporting on its face to be from slaves, has been guilty of a gross disrespect to this House, and that he be instantly brought to the bar to receive the severe censure of the Speaker.

He said: The gentleman from Massachusetts offered to present a petition from slaves, and so purporting to be on its face, in open and wilful violation of what he knew to be the rules of this House, and insulting to a large portion of its members. Does the gentleman, even in the latitude which he gives to the right of petition, think that it includes slaves? If he does not, he has wilfully violated the rules of the House and the feelings of its members. Does that gentleman know that there are laws in all the slave States, and here, for the punishment of those who excite insurrection? I can tell him that there are such things as grand juries; and if, sir, the juries of this District have, as I doubt not they have, proper intelligence and spirit, he may yet be made amenable to another tribunal, and we may yet see an incendiary brought to condign punishment.

Mr. LEWIS offered the following amendment, which he suggested to his friend from South Carolina [Mr. Thompson] to accept as a modification:

Resolved, That John Quincy Adams, a member from the State of Massachusetts, by his attempt to introduce into this House a petition from slaves, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, committed an outrage on the rights and feelings of a large portion of the people of this Union; a flagrant contempt on the dignity of this House; and, by extending to slaves a privilege only belonging to freemen, directly invites the slave population to insurrection; and that the said member be forthwith called to the bar of the House, and be censured by the Speaker.

Mr. THOMPSON accepted the modification.

Mr. ADAMS then rose and said: Gentlemen are really consuming the time of the House in such a manner that I think the obligation rests upon me to ask them to modify their resolution. It may be as severe as they propose; but I ask them to change the matter of fact a little, so that when I come to the bar I may not, in one single word, put an end to their resolution.

I did not present the petition. I said I had a paper purporting to be a petition from slaves. I asked the Speaker whether he considered such a paper as included within the general order of the House, that all petitions, memorials, resolutions, and papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery should be laid on the table. I intended to take the decision of the Speaker before I went one step toward presenting or offering to present that petition.

If the House should choose to read the petition, I can state to them they would find it something very much the reverse of that which the resolution states it to be; and if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Lewis] still shall choose to bring me to the bar of the House, he must amend his resolution in a very important particular; for he probably may have to put into it that my crime has been for attempting to introduce the petition of slaves that slavery should not be abolished.

Mr. THOMPSON was sorry to see the air of levity which it is attempted to throw over this matter. Is it a light thing, for the amusement of others, to irritate, almost to madness, the whole delegation from the slave States? It is intimated that the petition does not pray for the abolition of slavery, but a very different object. It makes not the slightest difference; it is the attempt to introduce a petition from slaves for any object; as insolent if it be for one purpose as for another.

Mr. T. then further modified his resolution by substituting the three following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the honorable John Q. Adams, by an effort to present a petition from slaves, has committed a gross contempt of this House.
2. Resolved, That the member from Massachusetts above named, by creating the impression and leaving the House under such impression, that and that slaves can be heard in a legislative body only through the agency of their owners? But if the petition was a hoax, then the conduct of the gentleman was still more unjustifiable. It was adding insult to injury. The gentleman, if such is his disposition, may enjoy this joke, and enjoy this scene; but farces of this kind neither suit the humor of the slaveholding States nor comport with the character and dignity of the legislature of the nation.

GEORGE C. DROMGOOLE [Va.] said he preferred action on a question of this character rather than debate, and he had risen only for the purpose of requesting the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Thompson] to accept a modification he would send to the clerk's table.

The modification was read, as follows:

1. Resolved, That the honorable John Quincy Adams, a member of this House, by stating in his place that he had in his possession a paper purporting to be a petition from slaves, and inquiring if it came within the meaning of a resolution heretofore adopted (as preliminary to its presentation), has given color to the idea that slaves have the right of petition, and of his readiness to be their organ; and that for the same he deserves the censure of this House.
2. Resolved, That the aforesaid John Q. Adams receive a censure from the Speaker, in the presence of the House of Representatives.

Mr. THOMPSON accepted the above as a substitute for his own resolutions.

Mr. ALFORD.—Mr. Speaker, the member from Massachusetts would screen himself from the censure of this House because he has not sent his petition from slaves to your table. Sir, he has sent the petition from the free negroes of Fredericksburg, and that is as wrong and insulting to us as if it were from slaves. The Constitution of these United States no more allows the one than the other, and both are equally insulting.

Sir, there seems to be some difference of opinion among our friends here as to what course we ought to pursue in this awful crisis of our beloved country. Some of our friends, as patriotic as any, have urged, in this debate, that we ought not to sit here and submit to this outrageous course of things; that, if it does not cease, we should go home. No, sir; no, sir; this must not be; we will neither submit nor retire. If they prosecute this measure in this House by attempts at legislating us out of our rights, we will resist it here by legislative acts as long as we can; and if at last they prove too strong for us, and succeed in passing unconstitutional laws, to rob us of our property, to murder our wives and children, still we will not the said petition was for the abolition of slavery, when he knew that it was not, has trifled with the House.

3. Resolved, That the honorable John Q. Adams receive the censure of the House for his conduct referred to in the preceding resolutions.

FRANCIS W. PICKENS [S. C.] said that presenting the petition was in itself admission that Mr. Adams had communication with slaves, and was evidence, in law, of collusion. It broke down the principle that the slave could be known only through his master. For this he was indictable, under statute, for aiding and abetting insurrection; and for such conduct is he not amenable to the censure of this House? The privilege of speech protected a member from being questioned before any other tribunal, but does not exempt him from being questioned before this House.

CHURCHILL C. CAMBRELENG [N. Y.] observed: When the honorable member from Alabama [Mr. Lewis] presented his resolution he felt that, great as the sacrifice was to bring to the bar of this House one who had occupied the highest station on earth, as President of the United States, yet it ought to be made. But now, after having heard the explanation of the honorable gentleman [Mr. Adams], he viewed the subject altogether in a different light. It appeared to him that that gentleman [Mr. Adams] had been hoaxed by some young men in Fredericksburg. The contents of the petition were known in this House before the gentleman from Massachusetts announced them. It was manifestly designed to make him appear ridiculous by presenting a petition praying for his own expulsion. It came from a slaveholding quarter, and was no doubt designed to insult him for presenting so frequently abolition petitions.

HENRY L. PINCKNEY [S. C.]—It seems, then, that the petition which the gentleman offered to present is not a petition in point of fact; that it is nothing more than a quiz, or a hoax, which has been played off upon the gentleman himself; and that, probably, in retaliation for the joke practiced on himself, he determined to carry it still further by playing it off upon the House. But whether the petition was genuine or not; whether it prayed for the abolition of slavery or the expulsion of the gentleman himself; and whether the gentleman was in jest or earnest, his conduct was unquestionably reprehensible, and such as ought to be visited with the severest censure of the House. If the petition was genuine, it was an indignity to the House to have offered to present it, purporting, as it did, to come from slaves. Does not the gentleman know that the right of petition only attaches to the free white people of the Union, submit; they must change the Constitution before they can bind us by any laws of abolition; this they never can do if the South is true to itself. And true we shall be, I hope in God, to our Constitution, our wives, our children, and our country. If still they pursue us to the last, and attempt to do by force what they never can do by law, we will not be found wanting; we will not desert this Capitol nor this country. This is the Old Dominion; this land is ours as well as theirs; it was ceded by Virginia and Maryland, where slavery is tolerated by law. Shall we leave it, then, to the dominion of force, and that, too, inflicted by the unhallowed arm of the wild and worse than savage fanatic? No, never!

Let me tell gentlemen it is a firm and unconquerable resolution never to surrender one jot or tittle of our constitutional rights upon this subject. We have a common interest in this Government, a common title in this capital; it bears the name of the immortal Washington, and he was a Southern man. Shall we, then, ever surrender the one or desert the other? No, never! Never until this fair city is a field of Waterloo and this beautiful Potomac a river of blood.

CALEB CUSHING [Mass.]—Gentlemen talk to us of these our great fundamental rights—as the freedom of speech, of opinion, of petition—as if they were derived from the Constitution of the United States. I scout such a doctrine. If there were a drop in my veins that did not rebel against the sentiment, it would be bastard blood. Sir, I claim to be descended from the king-killing Roundheads of the reign of Charles the First; through a race of men not unremembered in peace or war; never backward in the struggles of liberty; a family upon the head of a member of which the first price of blood was set by Great Britain, in revenge for his early devotion to the cause of independence. I venerate their character and their principles. I am ready to do as they did—to abandon all the advantages of country, home, fortune, station—to fly to some Western wilderness—and to live upon a handful of parched corn and a cup of cold water, with God's blessing on honest independence—sooner than surrender one jot or tittle of those great principles of liberty which I have sucked in with my mother's milk. I disdain to hold these rights by any parchment title. The people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the people of every State of this Union, came into it in the full possession and fruition of all these rights. We did not constitute this Government as the means of acquiring new rights, but for the protection of old ones, which nature had conferred upon us; which the Constitution rightly regards as preëxisting rights; and as to which all the Constitution does is to provide that these rights neither you nor any power on earth shall alter, abrogate, or abridge. They are rights of Heaven's own giving. We hold them by the supreme tenure of revolution. We hold them by the dread arbitrament of battle. We hold them by the concession of a higher and broader charter than all the constitutions in the land—the free donation of the eternal God, when he made us to be men. These, the cardinal principles of human freedom, he has implanted in us and placed them before and behind and around us for our guard and guidance, like the cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night which led the Israelites through the desert. It is a liberty, native, inborn, original, underived, imprescriptible; and acknowledged in the Constitution itself, as preëminently before and above the Constitution.

Now, in their denunciations of the North, it is these, the very primordial rights of the universal people of the United States, that gentlemen from the South assail. They strike at the freedom of opinion, of the press, and of speech, out of doors—and the rights of petition and debate in this House.

It seems to be imputed as a crime, to a portion of the inhabitants of the non-slaveholding States, that they entertain sentiments condemned by a majority of this nation. But can it be a crime? I appeal once again to that portion of the members from the South who are foremost in this debate—I mean the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Thompson] and his friends—who on certain subjects differ in opinion with a great majority of their countrymen; and I ask them whether they stand prepared to abide by and sustain the doctrine that opinions unacceptable to the majority are a moral or political crime? Will they apply to themselves the rule of judgment which they urge so vehemently against the people of the North? Will they deliberately sanction such an odious doctrine? I know they cannot. They must perceive that it is impossible by any act of the will to control the conclusions of the mind. It is our duty, in all the contingencies of life, to weigh well the facts and the reasonings upon which our judgments are to be formed; to apply to every question a conscientious desire to arrive at the truth; to spare no means to inform ourselves rightly as to the matters which the mind is to judge. But the result is not a thing within the scope of the will. And it is monstrous, therefore, to bring opinions to the bar of legal censure. It is a violation of the interior sanctuary of a man's own a social, moral, and political evil. I will not, Mr. Speaker, debate the question whether slavery be or be not, in the abstract, a social, moral, or political evil, but I refer to what the honorable gentleman said to prove what are the grievances of the abolitionists and what their objects. Slavery, according to his exposé of their views, is their grievance—universal emancipation, then, must be their object.

If they prevail in that object, through the action of Congress, what becomes of the rights of the slave States, as guaranteed to them by the Constitution? What becomes of the Government? Sir, it is plain that the end of these things, if successful, terminates in the overthrow of the Government.

MR. PATTON then moved the following amendment of the motion before the House:

Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present to the House any petition from the slaves in this Union ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the House, the rights of the Southern States, and unfriendly to the Union.

Resolved, That the honorable John Q. Adams having solemnly disclaimed all design of doing anything disrespectful to the House, in the inquiry he made of the Speaker, as to the petition purporting to be from slaves, and having avowed his intention not to offer to present the petition to the House, was of opinion that it ought not to be presented—therefore, all further proceedings in regard to his conduct do now cease.

MR. THOMPSON accepted.

MR. ADAMS.—Petition, sir, is a right belonging to every human creature, which does not depend upon the condition of the petitioner, and which cannot be denied to man in any condition. This, sir, is the principle involved in the inquiry put by me to the Chair—a principle more than recognized by the Constitution, which has declared that this right shall suffer no abridgment, no limitation whatever! If you now abolish this principle, this first and humblest right given from God to every human being, a limitation will next be put to the right of petitioning, in the fullest extent to which party madness might hereafter be inclined to carry it. If the House shall decide that the paper I possess comes under the order of the House of the 18th of January, I will present the petition, and in doing so shall be doing my duty—a duty of the highest importance to my country, to humanity, and to human nature. What, sir? Will you put the right of petitioning, of craving for help and mercy and protection, on the footing of political privileges? It is an idea which has not even been entertained by the utmost extreme of human despotism; no despot, of any age or clime, soul. It is the very acme of tyranny. The arbitrary power to condemn and punish opinion is that which gave birth to the Protestant Reformation, and which has rendered the Inquisition a byword of odium and reproach. It is that self-same thing from which our fathers fled—the Puritans, the Catholics, the Quakers, the Huguenots—when they left their native Europe to found an asylum for conscience in this New World. It is that which has nerved the arm and edged the sword in every contest of liberty which lightens along the history of civilized man.

Sir, I put it to gentlemen, in all directness and sincerity, do they suppose that angry attacks on the freedom of opinion, of speech, of the press, of petition, of debate are likely to check the spread in the United States of that disapprobation of slavery which is but another form, conversely considered, of the love of liberty? Do they deem it possible to smother the opinions and stifle the petitions of the free men of the United States? Ay, and of the free women too? For I confess it seems to me a strange idea to uphold, in this enlightened age, that woman, refined, educated, intellectual woman, is to have no opinion or no right to express that opinion. Do gentlemen soberly think their cause can be strengthened in the country by bringing to the bar of the House for contempt, by subjecting to censure, by expelling a representative of one of the free States, because he may have given color to the idea that slaves can petition Congress?

RICHARD FRENCH [Ky.] said: The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Cushing] contended that the right of petition was a natural right, derived from our Creator; and, being a natural right, so derived, belonged to all human beings. If that gentleman meant that all men have the natural right to supplicate the Deity, he is right. If he meant that all men, while in a state of nature, had the right to petition their fellow-beings for what they wanted, he is right. If he meant that all men, in their personal relations and intercourse, have the same right now, he is right. But if he meant that all men have the right to petition the Government, I think he is wrong.

Sir, there was a time when civil government did not exist; and how can a man be said to have a natural right to petition a political being who had no voice in its creation—who is neither party nor privy to the body politic?

That gentleman was pleased also to favor us with what he termed the abstract opinions of the abolitionists—opinions which, as he said, they honestly and conscientiously entertained. And what are those opinions? That slavery is, in the abstract, has ever denied this humble privilege to the poorest or the meanest of human creatures. If this House decides that it will not receive petitions from slaves, under any circumstances, it will cause the name of this country to be enrolled among the first of barbarous nations. A petition is a supplication; and supplication for what? For relief from those who have the power to give relief, and who are placed in a situation to attend to the cry of distress. That would be a sad day, sir, in my opinion, when a vote should pass this House that would not receive a petition from slaves! What would it lead to? When the principle is once begun of limiting the right of petition, where would it stop? Gentlemen have objected to the petition immediately preceding that which I presented because it came from colored people! from color! That, sir, is giving color to an idea with a witness! The honorable gentleman makes it a crime because I presented a petition which he affirms to be from colored women, which women were of infamous character, as the honorable gentleman says, prostitutes, I think the gentleman said.

MR. PATTON explained. He did not say they were prostitutes; the objection he made was that the petition came from free mulattoes in the South; he did not object on the ground of opposition to the right of petition, but because he considered that the House ought to refuse to open its doors to applications from the Southern slaves. As to the infamous character of the women in question he mentioned that, not as if he deemed it a reason for refusing the right to petition, but because he wished to wipe away the stain from the ladies of Fredericksburg, as these women had been called "ladies of Fredericksburg" by the honorable gentleman [Mr. Adams]. He was sure that no ladies from Fredericksburg had sent such a petition to this House.

MR. ADAMS continued: He was not certain that he called them ladies or whether the petition itself had not stated that they were ladies. Whenever he presented petitions from ladies he was not in the habit of using that term for their designation; the word "woman" was an expression much dearer to his heart than that of "lady." But to return to the idea he was about to enforce. He thought the honorable gentleman had said that they were infamous; but the proposition which he would ever maintain was that the sacred right of petition, of begging for mercy, as it did not depend upon condition, so also it did not depend upon character; it was a right which could not be denied to the poorest, the humblest, and the most wretched; and, moreover, it was a right which could not be refused to the most vile, the most abandoned, or most infamous. He did not, however, know that they were in the present case infamous, but he thought that was the word used in debate by the honorable gentleman, and that it was so reported in the National Intelligencer.

Mr. Patton again explained. He had not said that he knew those women.

Mr. Adams continued: He was glad to hear the honorable gentleman disclaim any knowledge of them; for he had been going to ask, if they were infamous women, then who was it that had made them infamous? Not, he believed, their own order, but their masters; and he had heard it said, in proof of this fact, and he was inclined to believe it was the case, that there existed great resemblances in the South between the progeny of the colored people and the white man who claimed the possession of them. Thus, perhaps, the charge of being infamous might be related upon those who made it, as originating from themselves.

[Great agitation in the House.]

If you once admit the principle that the right of petition is limited, and will not apply to slaves, the next thing will be to limit it still further, by extending the limitation to free colored people; and, after this, the next limitation will be to the question of the character of the petitioners; then the next limitation will be to inquire on what side of political parties are the petitioners; and then, sir, from one side all petitions will be perfectly good and respectable, but on the other side all the petitions will be from people of bad character, according to the representations of any member who may say he does not know who they are; they will be all infamous, sir, who are on the wrong side. This will be the case. To this state will things come if the right of petition shall be limited by peculiar distinctions, and shall be made to rest on such grounds as those which have been relied upon in this debate.

I do not propose, sir, to go through all the speeches which fell upon me so thickly, which came down, pouncing upon me like so many eagles upon a dove, calling me infamous, with other harsh expressions; nay, from one quarter of the House I heard cries, "Expel him! Expel him!" All of these, sir, remind me of what Dame Quickly says: "Oh! day and night, but these are bitter words." But, sir, I was to be found guilty, sir, for permitting the House to believe as true a thing which there had not been one word uttered by me authorizing them even to infer, much less to believe.

I did not get up soon enough to set all these gentlemen right, to show them the best way to censure me, and prevent them from running wild in the manner they had done, bringing forward resolutions in such rapid succession, but all of them, unfortunately for the movers, contrary to facts. I beg the honorable gentlemen [Messrs. Lewis and Thompson] to remember that in offering this resolution to the House, inflicting censure upon one who has never, in all his parliamentary career, given offence to them, they went a little beyond the bounds of that course of conduct which is due from one gentleman of this House to another; and I would only give them one word of friendly admonition that, when in future they may wish to censure me, they would first be careful to pay more attention to facts.

If the law of South Carolina is a good argument to the gentlemen from South Carolina [Mr. Thompson], and if a member of that legislature is made amenable for words spoken in debate, not only to the legislature but also to the grand and petit juries—if that, sir, is the law of South Carolina, I thank God I am not a citizen of South Carolina! [Great agitation.]

Such a sentiment, sir, uttered in this House, such a threat held out to the representatives of this nation, when it shall come before the world in the report of this debate, cannot fail to excite contempt and amazement; and it will be a matter of no less surprise that, when utterance was given to such a sentiment, it was not immediately rebuked by the Speaker. What, sir! We, the representatives of the nation, are all of us subject to the grand jury of the District of Columbia for words here spoken? We from the Northern and Eastern States are liable, sir, to be indicted as felons and incendiaries for presenting petitions not exactly agreeable to some members from the South? Is that the tenure on which we hold our seats? If it is, I wish the House may pass the resolution that whoever hereafter proposes to hand up a petition from slaves is an enemy to the Union.

If, when the gentleman [Mr. Thompson], instead of coming at once to a solution of that question, brought forward his resolution of censure against me—sir, if he thought to frighten me from my purpose—if that, sir, was his object, he mistook his argument. I am not to be intimidated by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Thompson], nor by all the grand juries in the universe. The right by which every member of this House holds his seat here is of the deepest and utmost importance to the whole nation; and I trust this debate will be read by every portion of the country, and that, among other astonishing things in this debate, the astonishing threat of the gentleman will not be forgotten. We have heard, sir, of the great superiority of Anglo-Saxon blood. What, sir! is there a drop of that blood flowing in the veins of any man who will subscribe to such a political doctrine as this? How little does such a person understand of the true principles of freedom in relation to the powers of a legislative assembly! I would ask every member of this House what would have been the issue if, in the British House of Commons, one member of Parliament should tell another member that, for what he had said or done in Parliament, he should be made amenable to the grand jury of the city of Westminster? Sir, it would be too ridiculous for indignation; it would excite one universal shout of laughter; it would from thenceforth render him who had uttered the menace

"Dreaded to retch his whole life long,
And the sad burden of some merry song."

It is not possible for me to make any defence in any system or order. What defence can be made against this new crime of giving order to blood? But, I beg to say, I should deem it to be the basest cowardly which has ever befallen me in the course of a life checked with many vicissitudes if a vote of censure from this House should pass upon my name or upon any action of mine in this House. And now, when I thus speak, am I treating with contempt this House? Have I ever done so? Has not the honor of this House been among the first and dearest sentiments of my heart? I have reverenced this House as the representatives of the whole people of this Union. I have further felt that sentiment which is called the esprit de corps. I stood in this House if I have not been the first to come forward and defend its honor and dignity on more than one occasion. And now am I to be brought to the bar for a contempt of this House, for doing that which was done in the most respectful manner which it was possible to devise? For asking a question of the Speaker—consulting him first upon the advisability of a petition by the rules of the House? If I am deserving censure for making this inquiry of the Speaker, your Speaker, who made the inquiry of the House, is much more deserving of censure. But if a majority of this House shall be found to pass censure on me, be it so; and if I have an enemy, let him know that he has triumphed; for a worse calamity could not befall me on earth.

Here I will say that I am not conscious of having given the least particle of offence to the House, nor of having done anything which I would not do over again. My conduct was dictated by a sense of duty, and in the same persuasion of what was my duty I remain still unshaken. But, sir, among other things alleged as reasons for censuring me, it has been said I have trifled with the House. I have already disclaimed, and again I not only disclaim any such intention but I deny that any man in this House has ever had cause to believe that I ever trifled with the House. I never was more serious in any moment of my life; therefore, I am unwilling that a resolution should pass containing the declaration that the House ceased all further action on the subject because I made disclaimers. I renounce all advantages on the ground of my having made a disclaimer. While I totally disclaim any intention of trifling with the House, while I totally disclaim any purpose of offending or provoking any of the members of this House, while I totally disclaim any contemptuous course or any violation of the rules and orders of the House, sir, at the same time, I disclaim not any particle of what I have done; not a single word of what I have said do I unay; nay, I am ready to do and to say the same again to-morrow.

The question was then taken on the first resolution and decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 105.

The question was then taken on the second resolution, and passed in the negative—yeas 21, nays 137.

Mr. Adams fulfilled his promise in overflowing measure by presenting hundreds of abolition petitions to Congress, only to see them all subjected to the formal process of tabling or reference to the oblivion of a committee room.

During the debates in the Senate on the anti-slavery petitions frequent reference was made by the Southern Senators to "incendiary" publications and pictures sent South through the mails by Northern abolitionists, which, it was claimed, were calculated to excite the slaves to revolt, and, like the insurgent negroes of San Domingo, massacre the white owners and their wives.

and children. Thomas H. Benton [Mo.], in a speech upon the subject, exhibited one of these pictures in the Senate chamber. As described by him it represented "a large and spreading Tree of Liberty, beneath whose ample shade a slave owner was at one time luxuriously reposing, with slaves fanning him; at another, carried forth in a palanquin, to view the half-naked laborers in the cotton field, whom drivers, with whips, were scourging to the task."

President Jackson, in his message at the beginning of the session, had already brought the subject of these publications to the attention of Congress, and suggested that the Federal legislature should enact such measures as would prevent the Postoffice Department, "which is designed to foster an amicable intercourse and correspondence between all the members of the Confederacy" from "being used as an instrument of an opposite character."

On motion of John C. Calhoun [S. C.] the Senate appointed a special committee consisting of three Southerners and two Northerners, of which he was made chairman, to report on the matter. The committee brought in a bill subjecting to penalties any postmaster who should knowingly put in the mail any publication or picture touching on the subject of slavery to go into any State or Territory where such prints were forbidden by its laws.

The bill was accompanied by a voluminous report of a minority of the committee, which was evidently framed by Senator Calhoun. Parts of this report occasioned much controversy, the chief issues being (1) its presentation of the "compact" theory of the United States Government, which, if accepted, would justify the South Carolina "Nullifiers" for their actions,¹ and (2) its assumption that the internal peace of the slave States was in imminent danger from the actions of the Abolitionists, and therefore that it was the right of these States to demand that the free States suppress the abolition agitation at its sources within their borders.

such as their ancestors were when brought into the country, have ever advanced in the same period so rapidly in numbers and improvement.

To destroy the existing relations would be to destroy this prosperity and to place the two races in a state of conflict which must end in the expulsion or extirpation of one or the other. No other can be substituted, compatible with their peace or security. The difficulty is in the diversity of the races. So strongly drawn is the line between the two, in consequence of it, and so strengthened by the force of habit and education, that it is impossible for them to exist together in the same community, where their numbers are so nearly equal as in the slaveholding States, under any other relation than that which now exists. Social and political equality between them is impossible. No power on earth can overcome the difficulty. The causes resisting lie too deep in the principles of our nature to be surmounted. But, without such equality, to change the present condition of the African race, were it possible, would be but to change the form of slavery. It would make them the slaves of the community instead of the slaves of individuals, with less responsibility and interest in their welfare on the part of the community than is felt by their present masters; while it would destroy the security and independence of the European race if the African should be permitted to continue in their changed condition within the limits of those States. They would look to the other States for support and protection, and would become, virtually, their allies and dependents; and would thus place in the hands of those States the most effectual instrument to destroy the influence and control the destiny of the rest of the Union. It is against this relation between the two races—that the blind and criminal zeal of the abolitionists is directed—a relation that now preserves in quiet and security more than 6,500,000 of human beings, and which cannot be destroyed without destroying the peace and prosperity of nearly half the States of the Union, and involving their entire population in a deadly conflict that must terminate either in the expulsion or extirpation of those who are the object of the misguided and false humanity of those who claim to be their friends. He must be blind indeed who does not perceive that the subversion of a relation which must be followed with such disastrous consequences can only be effected by convulsions that would devastate the country, burst asunder the bonds of Union, and ingulf in a sea of blood the institutions of the country. It is madness to suppose that the slaveholding States would quietly submit

ABOLITION AND DISUNION

MINORITY REPORT OF SENATOR CALHOUN ON SUPPRESSING ANTI-SLAVERY AGITATION

He who regards slavery in those States simply under the relation of master and slave, important as that relation is, viewed merely as a question of property to the slaveholding section of the Union, has a very imperfect conception of the institution and the impossibility of abolishing it without disasters unexampled in the history of the world. To understand its nature and importance fully, it must be borne in mind that slavery, as it exists in the Southern States, involves not only the relation of master and slave but also the social and political relations of two races of nearly equal numbers, from different quarters of the globe, and the most opposite of all others in every particular that distinguishes one race of men from another. Emancipation would destroy these relations would divest the masters of their property, and subvert the relation, social and political, that has existed between the races from at most the first settlement of the Southern States. It is not the intention of the committee to dwell on the pecuniary aspect of this vital subject, the vast amount of property involved, equal at least to $950,000,000; the ruin of families and individuals; the impoverishment and prostration of an entire section of the Union, and the fatal blow that would be given to the productions of the great agricultural staples, on which the commerce, the navigation, the manufactures, and the revenue of the country almost entirely depend. As great as these disasters would be, they are nothing compared to what must follow the subversion of the existing relation between the two races, to which the committee will confine their remarks. Under this relation the two races have long lived in peace and prosperity, and if not disturbed would long continue so to live. While the European race has rapidly increased in wealth and numbers, and at the same time has maintained an equality, at least morally and intellectually, with their brethren of the non-slaveholding States, the African race has multiplied with not less rapidity, accompanied by great improvement physically and intellectually, and the enjoyment of a degree of comfort with which the laboring class in few countries can compare, and confessedly greatly superior to what the free people of the same race possess in the non-slaveholding States. It may, indeed, be safely asserted that there is no example in history in which a savage people, to be sacrificed. Every consideration—interest, duty, and humanity, the love of country, the sense of wrong, hatred of oppressors and treacherous and faithless confederates, and finally despair—would impel them to the most daring and desperate resistance in defence of property, family, country, liberty, and existence. But, wicked and cruel as is the end aimed at, it is fully equalled by the criminality of the means by which it is proposed to be accomplished. These, as has been stated, consist in organized societies and a powerful press, directed mainly with a view to excite the bitterest animosity and hatred of the people of the non-slaveholding States against the offices and institutions of the slaveholding States. It is easy to see to what disastrous results such means must tend. Passing over the more obvious effects, their tendency to excite to insurrection and servile war, with all its horrors, and the necessity which such tendency must impose on the slaveholding States to resort to the most rigid discipline and severe police, to the great injury of the present condition of the slaves, there remains another, threatening incalculable mischief to the country. The inevitable tendency of the means to which the abolitionists have resorted to effect their object must, if persisted in, and in completely alienating the two great sections of the Union. The incessant action of hundreds of societies and a vast printing establishment throwing out daily thousands of artful and inflammatory publications, must make, in time, a deep impression on the section of the Union where they freely circulate, and are mainly designed to have effect. The well-informed and thoughtful may hold them in contempt, but the young, the inexperienced, the ignorant and thoughtless will receive the poison. In process of time, when the number of proselytes is sufficiently multiplied, the artful and profligate, who are ever on the watch to seize on any means, however wicked and dangerous, will unite with the fanatics and make their movements the basis of a powerful political party that will seek advancement by diffusing, as widely as possible, hatred against the slaveholding States. But, as hatred begets hatred, and animosity animosity, those feelings would become reciprocal, till every vestige of attachment would cease to exist between the two sections, when the Union and the Constitution, the offspring of mutual affection and confidence, would forever perish. Such is the danger to which the movements of the abolitionists expose the country. If the force of the obligation is in proportion to the magnitude of the danger, stronger cannot be imposed than is at present on the States within whose limits the danger originates, to arrest its further progress—a duty they owe, not only to the States whose institutions are assailed, but to the Union and Constitution, as has been shown, and, it may be added, to themselves.

John P. King of Georgia, spokesman of the majority of the committee, said that positions had been assumed and principles insisted upon by Mr. Calhoun which were not only inconsistent with the bill reported, but, he thought, inconsistent with the "existence of the Union itself, and which, if established and carried into practice, must hasten and in its dissolution."

In reply to Senator King Senator Calhoun said:

SLAVERY PARAMOUNT TO FEDERAL LAWS

REPRESENTATIVE CALHOUN

The legislatures of the South, backed by the voice their constituents expressed through innumerable meetings, have called upon the non-slaveholding States to express the movements made within the jurisdiction of those States against their peace and security. But a step has been taken, and a law has been passed, or even proposed. Nor have we been less disappointed as to the proceedings of Congress. Believing that the general Government has no right or authority over the subject of slavery, we had just grounds to hope Congress would refuse all jurisdiction in reference to it, in whatever form it might be presented. The very opposite course has been pursued. Abolition petitions have not only been received in both Houses, but received on the most obnoxious and dangerous of all grounds—that we are bound to receive them; that is, to take jurisdiction of the question of slavery whenever the abolitionists may think proper to petition for its abolition, either here or in the States. Thus far, then, we of the slaveholding States have been grievously disappointed. One question still remains to be decided that is presented by this bill. To refuse to pass this bill would be virtually to acquiesce with the abolitionists—would be to make the officers and agents of the postoffice department in effect their agents and abettors in the circulation of their incendiary publications in violation of the laws of the States. It is your unquestionable duty, as I have demonstrably proved, to abstain from their violation; and, by refusing or neglecting to discharge that duty, you would clearly enlist, in the existing removed from office. It would be necessary also for the deputy postmasters referred to in this bill to make themselves acquainted with all the various laws passed by the States touching the subject of slavery, and to decide on them, no matter how variant they might be with each other. The bill conflicts with that provision in the Constitution which prohibits Congress from passing any law to abridge the freedom of speech or of the press. What is the liberty of the press? It is the liberty of printing as well as the liberty of publishing, in all the ordinary modes of publication; and is not the circulation of papers through the mails an ordinary mode of publication? I am afraid that we are in some danger of taking a step in this matter that we may hereafter have cause to regret, by its being contended that whatever in this bill applies to publications touching slavery applies to other publications that the States might think proper to prohibit, and Congress might, under this example, be called upon to pass laws to suppress the circulation of political, religious, or any other description of publications which produced excitement in the States. In this bill in accordance with the general force and temper of the Constitution and its amendments? It is not in accordance with that provision of the instrument under which the freedom of speech and of the press was secured. Whatever laws the State legislatures might pass on the subject, Congress is restrained from legislating in any manner whatever, with regard to the press. It will be admitted that, if a newspaper came directed to me, I have a property in it; and how could any man, then, take that property and burn it without due form of law? And I do not know how this newspaper could be pronounced an unlawful publication without a legal trial. The right of an individual in his papers is secured to him in every free country in the world. In England, it is expressly provided that the papers of the subject shall be free from all unreasonable searches and seizures—language to be found in our Constitution. This principle established in England, so essential to liberty, has been followed out in France, where the right of printing and publishing is secured in the fullest extent, the individual publishing being amenable to the laws for what he publishes, and every man prints and publishes what he pleases, at his peril.

The bill was finally rejected by a vote of 25 to 19, 61 votes of the majority being from slave States.

In a tie vote on one of the preliminary stages Martin Van Buren [N. Y.], Vice President of the United States controversy, on the side of the abolitionists against the Southern States. Should such be your decision, by refusing to pass this bill, I shall say to the people of the South, look to yourselves—you have nothing to hope from others. But I must tell the Senate, be your decision what it may, the South will never abandon the principles of this bill. If you refuse co-operation with our laws, and conflict should ensue between your and our law, the Southern States will never yield to the superiority of yours. We have a remedy in our hands, which, in such events, we shall not fail to apply. We have high authority for asserting that, in such cases, "State interposition is the rightful remedy"—a doctrine first announced by Jefferson—adopted by the patriotic and Republican State of Kentucky by a solemn resolution in 1798, and finally carried out into successful practice on a recent occasion, ever to be remembered, by the gallant State which I, in part, have the honor to represent. Let it be fixed, let it be riveted in every Southern mind, that the laws of the slaveholding States for the protection of their domestic institutions are paramount to the laws of the general Government in regulation of commerce and the mail, and that the latter must yield to the former in the event of conflict; and that, if the Government should refuse to yield, the States have a right to interpose, and we are safe. With these principles, nothing but concert would be wanting to bid defiance to the movements of the abolitionists, whether at home or abroad, and to place our domestic institutions, and with them, our security and peace, under our own protection, and beyond the reach of danger.

FREEDOM OF THE MAILE

SENATOR WEBSTER

SENATOR DANIEL WEBSTER opposed the bill because of its vagueness and obscurity in not sufficiently defining what were the publications the circulation of which it intended to prohibit. It is impossible to say what publications might not be prohibited from circulation. No matter what is the publication, whether for or against slavery, if it touches the subject in any shape or form, it will fall under the prohibition. Even the Constitution of the United States might be prohibited, and the person who is clothed with the power to judge in this delicate matter is one of the deputy postmasters, who, notwithstanding the difficulties with which he is encompassed in coming to a correct decision, must decide correctly, under pain of being and President of the Senate, had given his casting vote in favor of the bill. In his inaugural address as President, March 4, 1837, Mr. Van Buren referred to his position on the abolition question as follows:

Perceiving, before my election, the deep interest this subject was beginning to excite, I believed it a solemn duty fully to make known my sentiments in regard to it; and now, when every motive for misrepresentation has passed away, I trust that they will be candidly weighed and understood. At least they will be my standard of conduct in the path before me. I then declared that, if the desire of those of my countrymen who were favorable to my election was gratified, "I must go into the presidential chair the inflexible and uncompromising opponent of every attempt, on the part of Congress, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, against the wishes of the slaveholding States; and also with a determination equally decided to resist the slightest interference with it in the States where it exists." I submitted also to my fellow-citizens, with fullness and frankness, the reasons which led me to this determination. The result authorized me to believe that they have been approved, and are corded in, by a majority of the people of the United States, including those whom they most immediately affect. It now only remains to add that no bill conflicting with these views can ever receive my constitutional sanction.

On December 20, 1837, William Slade [Vt.] presented in the House two memorials on the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. He had entered into a general denunciation of slavery when Henry A. Wise [Va.] called him to order for speaking beside the question. The Speaker, John White [Ky.], asked Mr. Slade to confine his remarks to the subject. Mr. Slade continued, quoting from the Declaration of Independence.

Thorsen Hopkins Hakey [Ga.] and R. Barnwell Rhett [S. C.] called upon the delegations of their respective States to withdraw from the House to the room of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Southern Representatives met in the committee room and Mr. Rhett brought forward two resolutions: (1) that, the Constitution having failed to protect the South in the peaceable possession and enjoyment of their rights and peculiar institutions, it was expedient that the Union be dissolved, and (2) that a committee of two members from each State be appointed to report upon the best means of peaceably dissolving it. It was intended to present these in Congress, where, though certain to be tabled, they would serve to voice the protest of the South against the abolition agitation.

Mr. Rhett's propositions were negatived by the conference, and one by John M. Patton [Va.] was adopted, to the effect that all petitions, etc., on slavery be laid on the table without being read or debated. Upon the next day Mr. Patton read the resolution for the information of the members and asked leave to submit it. John Quincy Adams [Mass.] objected, whereupon Mr. Patton moved for a suspension of the rules in order to submit the resolution. To carry this motion a two-thirds majority was necessary, and this was obtained on the vote, 135 yeas to 60 nays. The resolution was then submitted, and Mr. Patton, to shut off debate, moved the "previous question." Mr. Adams rose to speak when his voice was drowned by cries of "Order!" from over the House. The question (requiring only a majority) was carried against a minority vote of 74, and the gag law was thereby extended to forbid petitions on slavery even to be read in the House.

Abolition of Slavery or the Slave Trade in the District of Columbia—Isaac P. Walker [Wis.] Moves in the Senate to Extend the Constitution Over the Territories: Debate on the Subject Between Daniel Webster [Mass.] and John C. Calhoun [S. C.]; Senator Walker's Motion Modified by John M. Berrien [Ga.], and Passed—Contest for Speaker of the House of Representatives: Howell Cobb [Ga.] Elected—Threats of Disunion Made by Richard K. Meade [Va.], Robert Toombs [Ga.], Alexander H. Stephens [Ga.], William F. Colcock [S. C.], Thomas L. Clingman [N. C.].

ON August 8, 1846, a bill was introduced in the House to appropriate $2,000,000 for defraying extraordinary expenses which might be incurred in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations (i. e., in connection with the Mexican War) to be applied by the President. To this David Wilmot, a Democrat from Pennsylvania, offered as an amendment a proviso which had been drafted by Judge H. R. Brinkerhoff [O.]: that, if any part of the appropriation were to be used to purchase Mexican territory, "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall ever exist in any part of said territory except for crime, whereof the party shall first be duly convicted." The amendment was adopted by a vote of 83 to 64, and the bill as amended was passed by a vote of 85 to 79. The bill, with, of course, the proviso, failed to come to a vote in the Senate owing to the closing of the session.

During the recess of Congress the legislatures of every Northern State from New Hampshire to Ohio inclusive, and also Delaware, approved the proviso, both parties voting in its favor. It was expected that at the next session it would pass both Houses.

Early in this session (December 24, 1847), therefore, Senator Lewis Cass [Mich.], in order to defeat the proviso, enunciated a new doctrine in a letter to Alfred O. P. Nicholson, a Representative from Tennessee, saying that the principle of the Wilmot Proviso "should be kept out of the national legislature, and left to the people of the Confederacy in their respective local governments." This became known as the doctrine of "popular sovereignty." It was eagerly accepted by the Southern Democrats and pro-slavery Democrats in the

THE WILMOT PROVISIO

North, such as Stephen A. Douglas [Ill.], and they read anti-slavery Democrats, such as Wilmot, out of the party.

A bill appropriating $3,000,000 with the proviso was introduced in both Houses. It passed in the House on February 15 (115 yeas to 106 nays) with the proviso, but the proviso was stricken out in the Senate on March 1, and in this form the bill was accepted by the House on March 3, 115 yeas to 81 nays.

In the debates in the House leading speakers in behalf of the proviso were Wilmot, Timothy Jenkins [N. Y.], and Joshua R. Giddings [O.] William H. Brockenbrough [Fla.] was the principal speaker in opposition.

THE WILMOT PROVISIO

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 8-MARCH 3, 1847

MR. WILMOT.—Sir, it will be recollected by all present that, at the last session of this Congress, an amendment was moved to a bill of a similar character by me, in the form of a proviso, by which slavery should be forever excluded from any territory that might be subsequently acquired by the United States from the Republic of Mexico.

Sir, permit me to say that upon that occasion that proviso was sustained by a very decided majority of this House. Nay, sir, more; it was sustained, if I mistake not, by a majority of the Republican party on this floor. And I am prepared to show, I think, that the entire South were then willing to acquiesce in what appeared to be, and, so far as the action of this House is concerned, in what was, the legislation, will, and declaration of this Union on the subject. It passed in this House. Sir, there were no threats of disunion sounded in our ears. It passed here, and it went to the Senate, and it was the judgment of the public, and of many men well informed, that, had it not been defeated there for the want of time, it would have passed that body and become the established law of the land.

Sir, the friends of this Administration, of whom I am one, did not then charge upon me, did not throw the whole burden upon me, nor upon those who acted with me, of having, by the introduction and support of that proviso at an untimely period of the question, defeated a measure especially necessary for the establishment of peace between this country and Mexico.

You! no abolitionists were filibustered against me then. I was not then denounced as an abolitionist. And there was then no cry that the Union was to be severed in consequence of the proviso. But I fear that the hostility and the warning of Northern men on this question have induced the South to assume a bolder attitude. Why, sir, in God's name, should the Union be dissolved for this? What do we ask in this matter? We ask but sheer justice and right. Sir, we ask the neutrality of this Government on this question of slavery. I have stood up at home and fought, time and again, against the abolitionists of the North. I stand by every compromise of the Constitution. I adhere to its letter and its spirit. And I would never invade one single right of the South. So far from it am I that I stand ready, at all times and upon all occasions, as do nearly the entire North, to sustain the institutions of the South as they exist, with our money and with our blood, when that day comes, as many—many Southern men—fear it may come. When that day comes, sir, the North stands with them. We go for every compromise of the Constitution.

But, sir, this is another question—entirely another question. We ask that this Government preserve the integrity of free territory against the aggressions of slavery—against its wrongful encroachments. Sir, I was in favor of the annexation of Texas. I supported it with the whole influence which I possessed, and I was willing to take Texas in as she was. I sought not to change the character of her institutions. Texas was a slave country, and, although it was held out to us, that two slaves and two free States might be made out of it, yet the whole of Texas was given up to slavery, every inch. We voted for the annexation of Texas. The Democracy of the North was for it; to a man. We are for it now—firmly for it. Sir, we are fighting this war for Texas, and for the South. But, we are told, California is ours. And all we ask in the North is that the character of its territory be preserved. It is free, and it is part of the established law of nations, and all public law, that, when it shall come into this Union, all laws there existing, not inconsistent with its new allegiance, will remain in force. This fundamental law, which prohibits slavery in California, will be in force; this fundamental law, which prohibits slavery in New Mexico, will be in force. Shall the South invade it? Shall the South make this Government an instrument for the violation of its neutrality, and for the establishment of slavery in these territories, in defiance of law? That is the question. There is no question of abolition here, sir. It is a question whether the South shall be permitted, by aggression, by invasion of right, by subduing free territory and planting slavery upon it, to wrest this territory to the accomplishment of its own sectional purposes and schemes? That is the question. And shall we of the North submit to it? Must we yield this? It is not, sir, in the spirit of the compact; it is not, sir, in the Constitution.

Mr. JENKINS denounced the war as a presidential war, and a war of conquest, and would vote for this "Wilmot Proviso" as the most effectual means, if carried, of bringing it to a speedy termination. The object of the Administration was to acquire new territory to make it slave territory, and if this prohibition of slavery were imposed by Congress, their warlike spirit would quickly subside.

Mr. BRUCE, of Missouri, said, upon the subject of the "Wilmot Proviso," unlike many gentlemen from the South, he had no fears for the institution of slavery, or for the dissolution of the Union; not from any wilful blindness, but because, after calm reflection, it appeared to him that whenever the governments of this country, either State or Federal, had undertaken to legislate in advance of public opinion, and prescribe rules for public opinion, their enactments were but a dead letter on the statute book. Any legislation at this time, declaring that lands which may hereafter be acquired by the United States shall be occupied by one portion of the country to the exclusion of the other, would be perfectly futile and ineffectual. From the beginning of the Government down to the present day, the North and the South had been advancing with giant and equal stride toward the West, and no arbitrary line could restrain the advances of the institutions of either. The Missouri compromise line had only been acquiesced in by the South because north of that line slavery could not go, from the nature of the case, so as to be for the interest of the people.

But granting that the principles of the amendment could be enforced (in case it were adopted), Mr. B. presented a picture of the blighting influence it would entail upon the South, resulting finally in the extermination of the entire white race in that section; a consequence disastrous in the extreme to the North and all sections of our country.

On the other hand, if this institution were allowed to take its natural course, and to spread southward and westward, by diffusion it would lose its strength, and in the course of a century, he prophesied, its very existence itself. It was already beginning to ebb in the Southern States, he asserted, and white labor and industry were coming in to take the place of those of the slave.

Mr. HARRISON said that the country was at a crisis. Congress was to decide whether or not the blood and treasure poured out on American soil were for the purpose of establishing slavery upon territory hitherto consecrated to freedom. Gentlemen from the South solemnly warn us that, if we persist in our determination to exclude slavery from the acquired territory, the Union will be dissolved. For his part he preferred to see it rent into a thousand fragments rather than have his country disunited and its moral purity sacrificed by the prosecution of a war for the extension of human bondage.

He welcomed the issue. It had to be met; there would be no compromise between slavery and freedom, any more than between crime and virtue.

He referred at length to the united opposition of Northern men of all parties against prosecuting the war to extend slavery, and predicted that the Administration which was responsible for this policy would be repudiated at the next election.

When we next assemble here the Whigs will probably constitute a majority of this body. Will they, by their votes, increase our national debt, by continuing our conquests in Mexico? Will they send more of our fellow citizens there to be sacrificed to this Moloch of slavery? If so, they, too, will suffer the penalty due to such crimes, and in turn will be driven from power.¹

After an extended reply to the argument that there could rightly be any property in man, Mr. Goldings concluded his speech as follows:

Our political horizon is overcast; "clouds and darkness are round about us"; impenetrable darkness shuts the future from our view. Foreign war and internal strife, animosities and heart burnings, indicate that this nation is doomed to suffer the just penalty incurred by the oppression, outrage, and crime which we have perpetrated upon our fellow men. If God deals out to offending nations retributive justice, we cannot escape His displeasure. Yet, when the just penalty of our transgressions shall have been visited upon us; when thousands more of our brethren shall have fallen victims to this unholy war, ¹The Democrats were defeated the following year. The Whigs took up the war, and carried it on, and were again driven from power, precisely according to this prophecy.

and tens of thousands more, widows and orphans, shall weep and mourn under bereavement; when the immorally brought upon our nation, by this war, shall have tortured the hearts of hundreds of thousands of mothers and wives and daughters, and the righteous punishment for our transgressions shall have been meted out to us; our rulers, our legislators, will acknowledge that "righteousness alone spalleth a nation," while "sin is a reproach to any people."

On February 19, 1847, John C. Calhoun [S. C.] introduced in the Senate resolutions on the subject of slavery in the Territories. In the way of introduction he gave statistics showing that the balance of power was shifting in favor of the free States, and that, unless all the territory about to be acquired from Mexico, including that above the line of the Missouri compromise, were to be left free to introduce slavery, "the Government would be overwhelmingly in the hands of the non-slaveholding States." Thomas H. Benton [Mo.] and Daniel Webster [Mass.] opposed the resolutions.

"LET US BE DONE WITH COMPROMISES!"

HARRISON CALHOUN

Sir, if this state of things is to go on; if this determination, so solemnly made, is to be persisted in—where shall we stand, as far as this Federal Government of ours is concerned? We shall be at the entire mercy of the non-slaveholding States. Can we look to their justice and regard for our interests? Now, I ask, can we rely on that? Ought we to trust our safety and prosperity to their mercy and sense of justice? These are the solemn questions which I put to this and the other side of the chamber.

Sir, what is the entire amount of this policy that there shall be no further addition to the slaveholding States? I will not say that it is designed. I will not say from what cause it originated. I will not say whether blind fanaticism on one side, whether a hostile feeling to slavery entertained by many not fanatic on the other, has produced it; or whether it has been the work of men who, looking to political power, have considered the agitation of this question as the most effectual mode of obtaining the spoils of this Government. I look to the fact itself. It is a policy now openly avowed as one to be persisted in. It is a scheme, Mr. President, which aims to monopolize the powers of this Government, and to obtain sole possession of its territories.

Now, I ask, is there any remedy? Does the Constitution afford any remedy? And, if not, is there any hope? These, Mr. President, are solemn questions—not only to us, but, let me say to gentlemen from the non-slaveholding States, to them. Sir, the day that the balance between the two sections of the country—the slaveholding States and the non-slaveholding States—is destroyed, is a day that will not be far removed from political revolution, anarchy, civil war, and widespread disaster. The balance of this system is in the slaveholding States. They are the conservative portion—always have been the conservative portion—always will be the conservative portion, and with a due balance on their part may, for generations to come, uphold this glorious Union of ours. But if this scheme should be carried out—if we are to be reduced to a handful—if we are to become a mere ball to play the presidential game with—to count something in the Baltimore caucus—if this is to be the result—woe, woe, I say, to this Union!

How, then, do we stand in reference to this territorial question—this public domain of ours? Why, sir, what is it? It is the common property of the States of this Union. They are called “the Territories of the United States.” And what are the “United States” but the States united? Sir, these Territories are the property of the States united; held jointly for their common use. And is it consistent with justice, is it consistent with equality, that any portion of the partners, outnumbering another portion, shall oust them of this common property of theirs—shall pass any law which shall proscrib the citizens of other portions of the Union from emigrating with their property to the Territories of the United States? Would that be consistent, can it be consistent with the idea of a common property, held jointly for the common benefit of all? Would it be so considered in private life? Would it not be considered the most flagrant outrage in the world, one which any court of equity would restrain by injunction—which any court of law in the world would overrule?

Mr. President, not only is that proposition grossly inconsistent with the Constitution, but the other, which undertakes to say that no State shall be admitted into this Union which shall not prohibit by its constitution the existence of slaves, is equally a great outrage against the Constitution of the United States. Sir, I hold it to be a fundamental principle of our political system that the people have a right to establish what government they may think proper for themselves; that every State about to become a member of this Union has a right to form its own government as it pleases; and that, in order to be admitted, there is but one qualification, and that is that the government shall be republican. Now, sir, it is proposed, from a vague, indefinite, erroneous, and most dangerous conception of private individual liberty, to overrule this great common liberty which the people have of framing their own constitution! Sir, the right of self-government on the part of individuals is not near so easily to be established by any course of reasoning as the right of a community or State to self-government. And yet, sir, there are men of such delicate feeling on the subject of liberty—men who cannot possibly bear what they call slavery in one section of the country—(although it was not so much slavery as an institution indispensable for the good of both races)—men so squeamish on this point that they are ready to strike down the higher right of a community to govern themselves in order to maintain the absolute right of individuals in every possible condition to govern themselves!

Mr. President, the resolutions that I intend to offer present, in general terms, these great truths. It is due to the States which we represent that there should be a fair expression of what is the sense of this body. Upon that expression much depends. It is the only stand which we can make under the Constitution. It is the only position we can take that will uphold us with anything like independence—which will give us any chance at all to maintain an equality in this Union, on those great principles to which I have referred. Overrule these principles, and we are nothing! Preserve them, and we will ever be a respectable portion of the Union.

Sir, here let me say a word as to the compromise line. I have always considered it as a great error—highly injurious to the South, because it surrendered, for mere temporary purposes, those high principles of the Constitution upon which I think we ought to stand. I am against any compromise line.

I see my way in the Constitution. I cannot in a compromise. A compromise is but an act of Congress. It may be overruled at any time. It gives us no security. But the Constitution is stable. It is a rock. On it we can stand. It is a firm and stable ground, on which we can better stand in opposition to fanaticism than on the shifting sands of compromise, Let us be done with compromises. Let us go back and stand upon the Constitution!

Well, sir, what if the decision of this body shall deny to us this high constitutional right, not the less clear because deduced from the whole body of the instrument and the nature of the subject to which it relates? What, then, is the question? I will not undertake to decide. It is a question for our constituents—the slaveholding States. A solemn and a great question. If the decision should be adverse, I trust and do believe that they will take under solemn consideration what they ought to do. I give no advice. It would be hazardous and dangerous for me to do so. But I may speak as an individual member of that section of the Union. There I drew my first breath. There are all my hopes. There are my family and connections. I am a planter—a cotton planter. I am a Southern man and a slaveholder; a kind and a merciful one, I trust—and none the worse for being a slaveholder. I say, for one, I would rather meet any extremity upon earth than give up one inch of our equality—one inch of what belongs to us as members of this great republic. What! acknowledge inferiority! The surrender of life is nothing to sinking down into acknowledgment of inferiority.

I have examined this subject largely—widely. I think I see the future if we do not stand up as we ought. In my humble opinion, in that case, the condition of Ireland is prosperous and happy—the condition of Hindustan is prosperous and happy—the condition of Jamaica is prosperous and happy, to what the Southern States will be if they should not now stand up manfully in defence of their rights.

Mr. President, I desire that the resolutions which I now send to the table be read.

The resolutions were read as follows:

Resolved, That the Territories of the United States belong to the several States composing this Union, and are held by them as their joint and common property.

Resolved, That Congress, as the joint agent and representative of the States of this Union, has no right to make any law, or do any act whatsoever, that shall directly, or by its effects, make any discrimination between the States of this Union, by which any of them shall be deprived of its full and equal right in any Territory of the United States, acquired or to be acquired.

Resolved, That the enactment of any law which should directly, or by its effects, deprive the citizens of any of the States of this Union from emigrating, with their property, into any of the Territories of the United States, will make such discrimination, and would, therefore, be a violation of the Constitution, and the rights of the States from which such citizens emigrated, and in derogation of that perfect equality which belongs to them as members of this Union, and would tend directly to subvert the Union itself.

Resolved, That it is a fundamental principle in our political creed that a people, in forming a constitution, have the unconditional right to form and adopt the government which they may think best calculated to secure their liberty, prosperity, and happiness; and that, in conformity thereto, no other condition is imposed by the Federal Constitution on a State, in order to be admitted into this Union, except that its constitution shall be republican; and that the imposition of any other by Congress would not only be in violation of the Constitution, but in direct conflict with the principle on which our political system rests.

SENATOR BENTON.—Mr. President, there is something yet to be done to give effect to the ten regiment bill, and other important measures require our attention. Now, if anybody thinks that I am going to lay aside the necessary business of the session to vote on such a string of abstractions, he is greatly mistaken.

SENATOR CALHOUN.—The Senator says he cannot take up abstractions. The Constitution is an abstraction. Property is an abstraction. All the great rules of life are abstractions. The Declaration of Independence was made on an abstraction; and when I hear a man declare that he is against abstract truth in a case of this kind I am prepared to know what his course will be! I certainly supposed that the Senator from Missouri, the representative of a slaveholding State, would have supported these resolutions. I moved them in good faith, under a solemn conviction of what was due to those whom I represent, and due the whole South and the whole Union. I have as little desire as any Senator to obstruct public business. All I want is a decision, and a decision before the three million bill is decided.

SENATOR BENTON.—The Senator from South Carolina says he calculated on my support. He is mistaken. He knows very well from my whole course in public life that I never would leave public business to take up firebrands to set the world on fire.

SENATOR CALHOUN.—The Senator does not at all comprehend me. I expressed a hope that he would be found ready to support the principles presented in my resolutions.

SENATOR BENTON.—I shall be found in the right place. I am on the side of my country and the Union.

WEBSTER observed that, should the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina be taken up, he (Mr. Webster) should follow the example thus set him, and call up his own as follows:

Resolved, That the war now existing with Mexico might not be prematurely terminated for the acquisition of territory to form new States to be admitted into the Union.

Resolved, That it ought to be objected to the Government of Mexico, that the Government of the United States does not desire to recognize the Republic of Mexico, and is ready to treat with the Government of that republic for peace, for a blood adjustment of boundaries, and for just indemnities due by either Government to the citizens of the other.

Mr. Calhoun never called for the consideration of his resolutions, consequently Mr. Webster never called up his, nor was any further notice of either taken in the Senate.

In his "Thirty Years' View" (1856) Senator Benton thus comments on Calhoun's resolutions:

THE FIREBRAND RESOLUTIONS OF SENATOR CALHOUN

MISSOURI DEBATE

The resolutions were sent out to all the slave States, and adopted by some of them; and there commenced the great slavery agitation, founded upon the dogma of "no power in Congress to legislate upon slavery in the territories," which has led to the abrogation of the Missouri compromise line—which has filled the Union with distraction—and which is threatening to bring all Federal legislation, and all Federal elections, to a mere sectional struggle, in which one-half of the States is to be arrayed against the other. The resolves were evidently introduced for the mere purpose of carrying a question to the slave States on which they could be formed into a unit against the free States; and they answered that purpose as well as rejection by the Senate as with it, and were accordingly used in conformity to their design without any such rejection, which it cannot be repeated too often—could in no way have decided the constitutional question which they presented.

There were new resolutions—the first of their kind in the (United) sixty years' existence of the Federal Government—contrary to its practice during that time contrary to Mr. Calhoun's slavery resolutions of 1838—contrary to his early and long support of the Missouri compromise—and contrary to the re-enactment of that line by the authors of the Texas annexation law. That re-enactment had taken place only two years before, and was in the very words of the anti-slavery action of '47, and of the Missouri compromise prohibition of 1820, and was voted for by the whole body of the unionists, and was not only considered and supported by Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of State, but carried into effect by him in the dispatch of that messenger to Texas in the expiring moments of his power.

The words of the re-enactment were: "And in such States or States as shall be formed out of said territory north of the said Missouri's compromise line, slavery or involuntary servitude (except for crime) shall be prohibited." This clause established that compromise line in all that long extent of it, which was added to Spain by the treaty of 1819, which became Texas by her separation from Mexico, and which became slave soil under her laws and constitution. So that, up to the third day of March, in the year 1845—not quite two years before the date of those resolutions—Mr. Calhoun, by authentic acts, and the two Houses of Congress, by recorded votes, and President Tyler, by his approving signature, acknowledged the power of Congress to prohibit slavery in a territory; and not only acknowledged the power, but exercised it and actually prohibited slavery in a long strip of country, enough to make a "State or States," where it then legally existed.

Those resolutions of 1847, called firebrand at the time, were further characterized as nullification a few days afterwards, when Mr. Benton said of them, that, "as Nullity was in the young Texas many Mexicans, so did he see in them many nullifications."

On July 13, 1848, after the treaty of peace with Mexico the Senate elected a committee to frame a bill for the territorial governments of Oregon, California, and New Mexico. John M. Clayton [Del.] was chairman of the committee.

On July 14 this committee reported its bill—the provisions of which will transpire in the course of the debate which thereupon ensued.

The chief speakers in favor of the bill were Clayton, John H. Clarke [H. L.], Sydney Breese [H. L.], Samuel H. Phelps [V. L.], Edward A. Hannagan [Ind.], Andrew P. Butler [N. C.], Henry B. Foote [Miss.], Alfred Iverson [Ga.], and Beverly Johnson [Md.]; and the chief speakers who opposed it were Jacob W. Miller [N. J.], Thomas Fitzgerald [Mich.], Thomas Corwin [O.], Joseph H. Underwood [Ky.], George F. Badger [N. C.], and John A. Dix [N. Y.].

IV—10

TERRITORIAL ORGANIZATION OF OREGON, CALIFORNIA AND NEW MEXICO

SENATE, JULY 12, 1848

SENATOR CLAYTON said that he felt it due, in justice to each and every one of his colleagues, to say that, amid all these long conferences and laborious discussions on the various topics necessarily considered by them, the most considerate spirit had been evinced by them, each endeavoring to maintain the honor and interest, not merely of his own section of country, but that of the whole nation, and each endeavoring to yield so much as he felt could be properly and honorably conceded, without the sacrifice of what was essentially due to his own constituents, and the people of all the States. After a full interchange of views, a vote was taken on a proposition moved by the Senator from Missouri [David R. Atchison], "that the spirit of the Missouri compromise be adopted to govern the settlement of all the Territories of the United States." On this question the committee divided, five for and three against the motion. As the condition of the territory was now said to be different from that to which that compromise applied in 1820, a motion was made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Underwood] to amend that proposition, by providing that "all the territory in New Mexico and California, south of the parallel of 36° 30', shall be placed on the same footing in all respects as to slavery that existed in Louisiana while it was a Territory." On this question the committee divided, four for the motion and four against it.

At this stage of the proceedings all compromise appeared to be impossible. But the committee proceeded afterwards to consider a proposition to endeavor to adjust the great question, at least so far as to enable Congress to extend the laws over and provide for the administration of justice in the territories, leaving for the present the settlement of it to the laws of population, or the adaptation of soil, climate, and all circumstances to the various kinds of labor. While it was admitted on all sides that by far the greatest portion of the Territories was properly adapted to free labor, and would necessarily be free soil forever, yet it was also with equal unanimity conceded that there was a portion of it where free labor never could be introduced, owing to the climate and the peculiar productions of that portion. It was thought that if Oregon, which no one thought can ever be slaveholding, could be organized as the people of that Territory desired, by the temporary adoption of their present laws interdicting or prohibiting slavery till the territorial legislature proposed to be organized, by a popular vote, under the bill referred to us, could enact some law on the subject, most of the objections would be obviated, without any sacrifice of principle by those who urged them, and that, after thus disposing of the question, so far as relates to Oregon, the Territories of California and New Mexico could be organized in the same bill by the appointment of a governor, secretary, and judges, to compose, according to the old precedents, a temporary legislature for each of those Territories, but without the power to legislate on the subject of slavery, thus placing that question beyond the power of the territorial legislatures, and reserving the right to introduce or prohibit slavery in those two Territories on the Constitution, as the same should be expounded by the judges, with a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It was thought that by this means Congress would avoid the decision of this distracting question, leaving it to be settled by the silent operation of the Constitution itself; and that, in case Congress should refuse to touch the subject, the country would be slaveholding only where, by the laws of nature, slave labor was effective and free labor could not maintain itself. On the other hand, in case Congress should hereafter choose to adopt the compromise line of 36° 30' (north of which, I suppose, it is not expected that slave labor can be introduced), or any other rule of settlement, it will be free to act as to its wisdom and patriotism shall seem fit.

After many conflicts of opinion these views thus generally expressed were substantially agreed upon with great unanimity.

I do not expect, sir, that this or any other proposition which the wit of man can possibly suggest will prevent agitation on this subject, which is now daily spreading through the country, and, I fear, dividing it into geographical parties. If the Missouri compromise of 36° 30' should be adopted, the agitators would immediately raise the standard of repeal and agitate as fiercely as ever. They will agitate after the passage of any bill. But this bill resolves the whole question between the North and South into a constitutional and a judicial question. It asks of men of all sections only to stand by the Constitution, and suffer that to settle the difference by its own tranquil operation. If the Constitution settles the question either way, let those who rail at the decision vent their indignation against their ancestors who adopted it. We offer no bill to introduce slavery by congressional enactment into any free territory. If, as the South contends, the Constitution gives the right to carry their slaves there, they will maintain that right. If, as the North contends, the Constitution confers no such right, they will vindicate their claim. It is the honest opinion of a large majority of the committee that by the passage of this bill the safety of the Union will be placed beyond the reach of agitation, and that the question, and the only question, which now threatens to endanger it may be, not immediately, but ultimately, put at rest forever.

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN stated that the bill now reported received the sanction of six out of the eight members of the committee, two of the members (of whom he was one) objecting to it. His views and the views of his State (Rhode Island) were decidedly against the introduction of slavery into a free State, and against the extension of slavery to any territory which we may have acquired by conquest. He intended to move again in the Senate the amendment which he had unsuccessfully proposed in committee. As far as he understood the opinion of the committee, it was that the Territory of Oregon was in every sense a free Territory. On looking over the bill, he found that this principle did not seem to be sufficiently carried out in the construction of the bill. He stated that it was his intention to move an amendment to the sixth section of the bill, the closing paragraph in: "All the laws passed by the legislative assembly shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States, and, if disapproved, shall be null and of no effect." To this he moved to add a proviso, that no law on the subject of slavery shall be in force until it shall have received the approval of Congress.

It was urged in committee that, on the Territories of California and New Mexico coming into the possession of the United States, every owner of a slave would have a right to bring his property into the Territories. To this it was objected that, this being a constitutional question, it should be referred to the supreme court of the Territory, with an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. To this effect he also proposed to submit an amendment.

SENATOR MILLER referred to the debate which had already taken place, on the power of Congress to abolish slavery, in which it was strenuously denied by the Senators from the Southern States; yet, in this bill there was an assumption of the power, in the clause prohibiting the passage of any law which abolishes slavery. Believing in this power, he was not opposed to its exercise, but he was opposed to its admission for the benefit of one part of the Union, and not of the other. He had prepared an amendment providing that the laws now in existence in the Territories shall continue in force. As to the prohibition of the territorial legislatures in Mexico to pass any laws respecting slavery, what did it mean but a prohibition of the passing of any laws abolishing slavery? Slavery would then, of course, go to California and New Mexico, as there is no law there to prevent it. If a person takes his slave there, and his property is taken, and he appeals to the Supreme Court, the court will probably decide that, as Congress has passed no law prohibiting slavery there, slavery may exist there. And while the question remains undecided, the slave will stand on the same footing with his master—under the protection of the Constitution—and absolute bloodshed may ensue. He alluded to the difficulty which would stand in the way of any slave who desired to bring his case, by a writ of habeas corpus, before a judicial tribunal for decision; he illustrated this by the case of the agent of the State of Massachusetts, Mr. Samuel May, who was sent to Charleston, South Carolina, for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the law where he could have no lawyer to aid him, and was himself imprisoned, and then compelled to leave the State.

SENATOR HUNTER: If the Senator from New Jersey will allow me, I will ask him if the question of servitude could not be brought before the Supreme Court of the United States, very readily, by an action, by the slave, of assault and battery and false imprisonment? Such a suit would bring up the question fairly, and without the intervention of a jury. The person claimed as a slave brings his action, and there never has been found any difficulty in obtaining the aid of counsel, even in slave States, for such purpose. The master pleads to the action that terro it is he holds the plaintiff in his custody, as he has a right to do, for he is his slave. The slave replies, setting forth the fact that California, on itscession to the United States, was free; that slavery did not exist there, and that it is not recognized by the Constitution of the United States or any act of Congress, and that by virtue of that Constitution he is free. The defendant denies, and the question of law arising thereon is decided by the court, and, if the decision be against the slave, the Supreme Court of the United States have jurisdiction under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, because a decision has been pronounced against a right claimed under the Constitution. [Monroe vs. Apsado, in 5th Peters' Rep.]

SENATOR MILLER resumed. He was willing to vote for a bill which prohibited slavery in any Territory which was free at the time of the passage of the bill. If slavery existed in a Territory at the time of its acquisition by the United States, he would leave it to the people to determine whether it should continue. He would not vote for its abolition there. He had not voted against the continuance of slavery when Texas was admitted into the Union, because it had previously been in existence there. For whose benefit should we now extend slavery in California and New Mexico, where it has already been abolished? Great Britain had introduced slavery in this country, and what was the general tone of public opinion on this subject? Was it not termed a curse which had been entailed on us by Great Britain? And shall we extend this curse to the Territories over which we extend our protection?

The South asserted that it had a greater interest in the question than the North. This he denied. He denied that the South had any exclusive privileges to carry her slaves to the Territories for sale. The North had an equal right to enjoy the profit of such a traffic, and had therefore as great an interest in the question as the South. Slavery does not exist now on the Pacific, and by his vote it should never be permitted there.

The proper way to settle the question was by the legislative authority. The people would not rebel against the law, and he was not disposed to surrender the power of Congress over the subject.

SENATOR PIERCE. What was the condition in which California and New Mexico have come under our care? Slavery has been abolished there. Such is the state in which we receive them. By the laws of nations, the laws of all conquered countries remain until changed by the conqueror. If those laws are to be retained, there is an express law constituting a prohibition of slavery, and this will continue until we shall change it. He insisted that there was nothing in the bill to warrant the belief that it could ever carry slavery into those territories. If there was cowardice in the bill, he had no fear on the subject. He would rather attach the term to the weathercock of popular impulse, to him who fears to do a wise act, but he should offend none transient caprice. If there were any to whom responsibility should attach, it was to those who voted for the annexation of Texas, out of which grew the Mexican war. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Niles] had given the casting vote on the question of the annexation of Texas, and he was responsible for all the difficulties which had grown out of it. That Senator had thrown the most offensive epithets on this bill and its originators, and he was bound to come forward and aid in a compromise. If the old coat and jacket of anyone are to be stuffed with straw and burnt in effigy, they should be those of the Senator from Connecticut rather than mine.

SENATOR FERGUSON had strong objections to parts of the bill, yet if he thought it would produce harmony and peace he would vote for it, although it would be his last act, and he should thereafter be plunged in disgrace. But he feared, from what he had heard, that his friends were doomed to disappointment. There was a political storm enging in the North, the effects of which no one could foresee. It threatened to come upon us like a whirlwind, and who can tell where it may be stayed? He alone was responsible for his own acts. He would give another reason why he voted against the raising of the committee. He was not in very good humor at that time, because he had heard imputations thrown on Northern States, and, among others, upon the State represented by him, on the subject of fugitive slaves.

SENATOR CORWIN said that it was fitting that slavery should follow conquest—the law in both cases is simply the law of force. Slavery had its origin in capture.

As in the case of lands acquired by conquest, long possession and continued acquiescence (in the judgments of men) ripen the claim into legal right, so, in the case of legal slavery, the captive, originally held only by force, in time, by the law of men, and by the judgment of men, becomes property!! And we are told by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] that the posterity of such become properly only through the magical influence of those words, Roman words: "Pactus acquiritur servituti."—"The child follows the condition of its mother." Admirable—philosophical—rational—Christian—maxim!!! If the mother be captured in war, it seems then the will of a just God, "whose tender mercies are over all his works," that her offspring to the remotest time shall be doomed to slavery. What sublime morality, what lovely justice combine to sanctify this article in that new doctrine of freedom which we say it is our destiny to give to the world! All over the world the air is vocal with the shouts of men made free. Bivvy gale that blows across the Atlantic comes freighted with the death groans of a king; every vessel that touches your shores bears with her tidings that the captives of the Old World are at last becoming free—that they are seeking, through blood and slaughter—blindly and madly, it may be—but nevertheless resolutely—deliverance from the fetters that have held them in bondage. What does it all mean? It means that they have been redeemed from political servitude; and in God's name I ask, if it be a boon to mankind to be free from political servitude, must it not be accepted as a matter of some gratulation that they have been relieved from personal servitude—absolute subjection to the arbitrary power of others?

According to the doctrine preached in these halls—in free America—instead of sending shouts of gratulation across the water to these people, we should send to them groans and commiseration for their folly, calling on them to beware how they take this business into their own hands—informing them that universal liberty is a curse; that, as one man is born with a right to govern an empire, he and his posterity must continue to exercise that power, because in this case it is not exactly partus sequitur ventrem, but partus sequitur patrem—that is all the difference. The crown follows the father! Under your law the chain follows the mother!

Senator Corwin then reverted to the American Revolution.

The men of 1776 did not believe that one man was born “booted and spurred” to ride another. And, if, as they said, no man was born to rule another, did it not follow that no man could rightfully be born to serve another? Sir, in those days, Virginia and Virginia's sons, Washington and Jefferson, had as little respect for that maxim, partus sequitur ventrem, as for that other cognate dogma, “Kings are born to rule.”

Mr. President, these men, when they spoke of slavery and its extension, did not get up some hybrid sort of “compromise” and consult some supreme court. They declared slavery an evil, a wrong, a prejudice to free colonies, a social mischief, and a political evil; and, if these were denied, they replied, “These truths are self-evident.” And from the judgments of men they appealed to no earthly court; they took an appeal “to the Supreme Judge of the World.” When I am asked to extend to this new empire of ours, now in its infancy, an institution which they pronounced an evil to all communities; when I refuse to agree with some here whose judgments I revere, and whose motives I know to be pure, I can only say I stand where our fathers stood of old, I am sustained in my position by the that a curious commentary upon that wonderful thing called human reason?

SENATOR UNDERWOOD.—It is regulated by a line!

SENATOR CORWIN.—Yes, by 36° 30', and what is black on one side of the line is white on the other, turning to jet black again when restored to its original locality. How is that? Can I have confidence in the Supreme Court of the United States, when my confidence fails in Senators around me?

I recollect very well when we did not stop to inquire how the Supreme Court had decided or ordained. It had decided, with John Marshall at its head—a man whose lightest conjectures upon the subject of constitutional law have always had with me as much weight as the well-considered opinion of almost any other man—that Congress had power to establish just such a bank as you had;¹ but with what infinite scorn did Democratic gentlemen—Jackson Democrats as they chose to be called—curl their lips when referred to that decision of the Supreme Court. Then the cry was, “We are judges for ourselves; we make no law unless we have the power to enact it.” Now, however, the doctrine is that here is one only tribunal competent to put the matter at rest forever.

Senator Corwin criticized the impracticability and injustice of the method of getting a decision of the Supreme Court as laid down in the bill. To test the law a man must go to California with his slaves. “I do not know how it may be in other parts of the world,” said Senator Corwin, “but in the State of Ohio we do not travel three thousand miles to get justice.”

Sir, this bill seems to me a rich and rare legislative curiosity. It does not enact “a law,” which I had supposed the usual function of legislation. No, sir; it only enacts “a law-suit.” So we virtually enact that, when the Supreme Court say we can make law, then we have made it!

In the meantime, said the Senator, while the case is under consideration in the Supreme Court, slavery will have taken root and appeal will be made by the advocates of slavery against interference with vested property interests.

The greatest absurdity in the bill, however, was that, men who founded the first system of rational liberty on earth. I ask any Southern man, if there were not a slave on this continent, would you send your ships to Africa and bring them here? If you would not bring them from the shores of Africa—buying them with some imagined “partus sequitur ventrem” branded on them somewhere—how can you prove to me that it would be right to transfer them from Maryland or Virginia, three thousand miles, to the shores of the Pacific? If slavery were a curse to you in the beginning, but struck its roots so deep into your social and municipal system, as was then said, that it could not be eradicated entirely, how is it that you call upon me, as a matter of conscience and duty, to transfer this curse to an area of square miles greatly exceeding that of the thirteen States when the Confederation was formed? Is it true that I am obliged to receive into my family a man with the smallpox or the leprosy, that they may be infected? But the gentleman from Virginia has said that it must be done. Why? Because it is compassion to the slave. He can not be nurtured in Virginia; your lands are worn out. Sir, that statement sounded ominous in my ears. It gave rise to some reflection. Why are your lands worn out? Are the lands of Pennsylvania worn out? Are those of Connecticut worn out? Is not Massachusetts more productive to-day than when the foot of the white man was first impressed upon her soil? Your lands are worn out, because the slave has turned pale the land wherever he has set down his black foot! It is slave labor that has done all this. And must we then extend to these Territories that which produces sterility wherever it is found, till barren desolation shall cover the whole land? If you can call upon me, as a matter of compassion, to send the slave to California or Oregon, you can call upon me by the same sacred obligation to receive him into Ohio as a slave, and I would be just as much bound, as a citizen of Ohio, to say that the Constitution should be so construed as to admit slaves there, because they have made the land in Virginia barren, and they and their masters were perishing, till Ohio had also become a wilderness.

It is a sad commentary upon the perfection of human reason that, with but a very few exceptions, all eminent lawyers on this floor from the South have argued that you have no right to prohibit the introduction of slavery into Oregon, California, and New Mexico; while, on the other hand, there is not a man in the free States, learned or unlearned, clerical or lay, who has any pretensions to legal knowledge, but believes in his conscience that you have a right to prohibit slavery. Is not as in all cases before the Supreme Court, the appellant must give bond to twice the value of the property in dispute; in this case a negro must give bonds to twice the value of himself!

Under this complexity of legal quibbling and litigation, it is expected that the negro will stand before the bar and contend with his master, and, coming on to Washington, will prosecute his appeal two years before the Supreme Court, enjoying the opportunity of visiting his old friends about Baltimore!

SENATOR UNDERWOOD regarded it as our true policy to let slavery alone. Climate and population are continuing to drive slavery further and further to the South, to the latitude where free labor could not flourish. He read a number of extracts from a pamphlet in his hands, showing that in the first stage after the introduction of slavery the increase of slaves is great; in the second stage, the white population increases in an equal ratio with the slaves; and, in the third stage, the slave race diminishes rapidly.

SENATOR BUTLER said the discussion had worn a calm and temperate character until yesterday, when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Corwin] poured forth from his full mind arguments and statements which had forever banished from his breast the hope of a successful termination of the efforts at compromise.

If it was a question how much the non-slaveholding States had gained from the labor of the slaveholding States, the figures of rhetoric would soon give way before the figures of arithmetic. If the forefathers of the South, when they gave their consent to the Constitution, had supposed that they were giving to the North authority for the unlimited expansion of their political power, while they were imposing on the South the Procrustean process, by which she was always to be clipped and kept within narrow fetters, would they have ever given their consent to the instrument?

He commented severely on the course of the Eastern States in refusing to give up the fugitive slaves from the South.

He was not disposed to indulge in declamation. He had admired the oratory of the Senator from Ohio, which he characterized as equally beautiful and ad captandum,¹ but he charged that the love of power was at the bottom of it. He ridiculed the moral tone of the Senator's speech, and related an anecdote of a party of clergymen at a religious revival, who were called to dine on venison, when, after the blessing had been asked, one whispered to the clergyman that Pequod had killed the deer on Sunday. What was to be done? The minister told his brethren that the venison had been killed on Sunday. Could they eat it? Why, you have asked a blessing, I believe! Yes. Well, then, that will partly consecrate the venison; so we may eat the meat, and then give Pequod thirty-nine lashes. This was morality! and such was the morality of the North in its treatment of the South.

SENATOR FOOTE feared that the decision of the Supreme Bench, as that court is now constituted, would be against the South. And then, said he, where are we? He laid it down that the Northern men were the shrewdest men in the Union. He had traveled over every part of the Union to the Rio Grande, and had found Yankees everywhere; and he had never found one who was not anxious to own a slave. And they were the most rigid of masters—they were masters indeed. As soon as a Yankee could command four hundred dollars he laid it out in a slave, because in a cotton-growing country he knew that a slave was the most valuable property he could possess. He admired the Yankees very much. He had never desired to hang them all. And if he had, as had been charged against him, ever used such an expression in the heat of the moment, he would now retract it. He was perfectly satisfied that the Yankees would never vote for the abolition of slavery if they could gain any profit by continuing it.

SENATOR IVERSON spoke on the general subject of slavery, alleging the insecurity of trusting to Northern compromises, contending that both the Whig candidates¹ were unsound on this question, and arguing the hopelessness of the cause of the South in the event of their success.

Senator Johnson defended the Supreme Court against the charges of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Corwin].

While statesmen, politicians, were found differing on a subject, the Supreme Court was unanimous. On the question of the constitutionality of the United States Bank, while Congress was deciding one way, the court was unanimously the other way. The members of the Supreme Court were not politicians. They were born in a different atmosphere, and they addressed themselves to different hearers. Politicians were always differing and disputing—one taking this side of a question, and another not willing to leave the decision of the question to a court, so large a portion of which were opposed to slavery.

Mr. Dix defended the State of New York against the charge of refusing to surrender fugitives from justice, claimed under requisition from the State of Virginia. He alleged that this was not the act of the State, but of the governor. He read the resolutions adopted by the legislature, of which he was a member, which condemned the course of the governor.

The bill was adopted in the Senate on July 26 by a vote of 33 to 22. It then went to the House, where, on motion of Alexander H. Stephens [Ga.] it was laid on the table by a vote of 112 to 97, 8 Southern Whigs and 31 Northern Democrats voting with all the Northern Whigs in the affirmative. The charge was made by some of the Democrats that these Southern Whigs were acting in the interest rather of their party than of their section, but this Mr. Stephens repelled, saying that the Supreme Court, to whom the bill left the decision, was certain to pronounce against the claim that slavery was allowable in the Territories solely by virtue of the Constitution; he cited many opinions of the Court,¹ showing that it had repeatedly upheld this view, namely, that "the Constitution recognizes and guarantees slavery wherever it exists by local law, but establishes it nowhere where it is prohibited by law."

In lieu of the bill Stephens urged that the Southern Representatives refuse to make any appropriations for carrying out the treaty with Mexico until the rights of the South in regard to taking their slaves into the Territories had been secured.

The House having tabled the Senate bill proceeded to organize a territorial government for Oregon alone. A bill to this effect incorporating the prohibition of slavery as set forth in the Ordinance of 1787 was passed on August 2, 1848, by a vote of 129 to 71.

On August 3 the House bill came before the Senate. It was debated until August 10, when it was passed with an amendment offered by Stephen A. Douglas [Ill.], taking an opposite view, all equally honest. How desirable, then, in a case of such importance as this, to call in a third party, rather than that we should be driven to despair—above all, to bloodshed.

He was not the advocate of slavery itself; he never had been so. He would rejoice to see the institution at an end, and it was with sincere regret he admitted that it was the agitation which had been stirred up in the North which had alone prevented the friends of freedom from emancipating the slaves in Maryland. He alluded to Connecticut, from which State the compromise was opposed as having scarcely become a free State, and to Ohio, where free negroes were treated as slaves.¹

The Senator from Ohio had complained that California was three thousand miles from Washington, and no slave could find means to employ a lawyer to carry up his case. He would reply to this that there could not be found in the whole Southern bar a lawyer who would not gratuitously give his services to a black man, to free him from slavery, where there was a reasonable ground for the application. He also referred to the readiness of judges to decide in favor of the slave. And he believed that, if this bill should pass, there would be always found at the Southern bar members who would be ready to sue out the freedom of slaves who were entitled to it. The question whether a slave owner is entitled to carry his slaves into the territory will be decided on the first appeal, and that will decide the matter in every future case which can arise. The question rises above party and sectional considerations. It assumes the character and dignity and importance of a national one.

SENATOR BADGER regarded this bill as a complete surrender of the rights of the South. Among the powers granted to Congress by the Constitution, he included that of governing the territory ceded to the nation. That power included either the introduction or the abolition of slavery in the territories ceded to us. The power of acquiring territory has been sustained by the decision of the Supreme Court, and the acquisition of territory carries with it the power to govern the territory, and the power to govern includes the power to regulate slavery.

He believed negro slavery would be as effectually excluded by this bill as if the Wilmot proviso, or any other bill, had passed. He had a respect for the Supreme Court, but he was by a vote of 33 to 21. On the following day the House refused to concur in the amendment, and the Senate, on August 12, accepted the House bill intact by a vote of 29 to 25. The reason for this acceptance was the nomination at Buffalo, N. Y., on August 9 of Free Soil candidates for President and Vice-President, Martin Van Buren [N. Y.] and Charles Francis Adams [Mass.] pledged against the extension of slavery into any of the Territories, California and New Mexico, as well as into Oregon. The Liberty party was now merged with the Free Soil party.

On the debates in the Senate the following were the chief speakers: pro-slavery, James M. Mason [Va.], Andrew P. Butler [S. C.], John C. Calhoun [S. C.], John Bell [Tenn.], General Samuel Houston [Tex.] and W. Johnson [Ga.]; anti-slavery, William L. Dayton [N. J.], Daniel Webster [Mass.] and John M. Niles [Conn.].

THE OREGON BILL

SENATE, AUGUST 3-12, 1848

SENATOR MASON attributed to the committee the design to evade the slavery question. He referred to the convention about to be assembled at Buffalo, for the choice of a standard-bearer. But one god was to be worshiped there, and that god was power—the power to trample down the Constitution of the country. He referred to the recent decision of Virginia not to regard any law of the United States which should prevent her citizens from carrying their slaves into any of the Territories. He and his constituents were willing to be bound by the principle of the compromise, but it was not to be expected that they would go one single step beyond it. It would be to expect them to submit to insult.

SENATOR DAYTON replied, to the threats held out by the Senator from Virginia, that if she was to be forced another step, she would proclaim nullification. He repudiated for the Whig party this question as the great issue to be tried at the coming election. The questions of free soil and slavery were not the great questions of the Whig party. They constituted too narrow a ledge for that party to stand on. Nor would it be generally understood that this was the great issue with the Democratic party.

SENATOR WEBSTER said that his objection to slavery was irrespective of lines and points of latitude; it took in the whole country, and the whole question. He was opposed to it in every shape, and in every qualification, and was against any compromise of the question.

As to California and New Mexico, he said it was easy to foresee to what the acquisition of this territory would lead. He congratulated himself that he had taken no part in the late war, except to oppose its commencement with all his might, and at the close to oppose the treaty with all his might. He believed the war itself to be a calamity, and he greatly feared that the treaty would turn out to be the most permanent calamity.

SENATOR BUTLER disapproved of this policy of giving especial protection to the Territories north of the Missouri line of compromise, and giving to the North all that valuable portion of the Union. The resolutions of the State of Virginia, which were referred to the other day by a Senator from that State [Mr. Mason], had been responded to by all the Southern States of the Union. He would tell the Senate that his advice to his constituents would be to go to these new Territories with arms in their hands; to go as armed communities and take possession of the lands which they had helped to acquire and see who would attempt to dispossess them. Would the military force of the United States shoot down the plowman at his plow? So help him God, he would so advise his constituents, to take with them their property there, and settle at all hazards. The subtleties and sophisms of the laws of nations would be feeble barriers to the spirit which would show itself in the South. Times and circumstances had changed the character of this bill for the establishment of a Territory in Oregon from what it was two years ago. Then it was comparatively innocent; now he regarded it as a masked battery, from behind which the institutions of the South were to be assailed with a firm determination to subvert them. The South would not fear a contest. She was ready to meet her opponents in a fair and open manner, but she would rise indignant against these covert attacks. He was ready to embark in the boat with his State, and to trust it to the care of Heaven.

SENATOR CALHOUN referred to the insurrection of the slaves in the West India Islands; and the same spirit, though suppressed, exists here. He dreaded the result which would follow if the same spirit which now animated the North should continue to grow and spread. He referred to the positions taken by the South and the North on the slave question. The latter had been unable to meet the arguments of the Southern Senators, and turned out of the direct course to discuss the question of the extension of territory, which was not connected with the subject, and was not advocated by a single Representative from his State. He would now tell the people of the South that they can never settle this question until they take it into their own hands. He admitted that the South was poor in comparison with the North. Slavery had benefited all mankind—all countries but the South. Slavery, like the waters of the Nile, had spread its fertilizing influence over all the world. It had benefited all but the Southern planter, who had been the tutor, the friend, as well as the master, of the slave, and had raised him up to civilization.

SENATOR NILES said that the movement of the North was forced upon them by the Southern attempt to mix up this slavery question with the politics of the country. It had been given out by the South that no candidate for the Presidency should be supported there who did not pledge himself against the Wilmot proviso. Now, when this course was taken it was incumbent on the North to make a countervailing movement.

SENATOR BUTLER said the South did not take this course until ten of the Northern States had pledged themselves in an opposite manner.

SENATOR NILES admitted that this was true. But here was the distinction: the Northern States merely asserted their opinions as a principle, while the South follow up their pledge by an awful threat of nullification if their wishes are not complied with.

SENATOR WEBSTER said that he had been among the earliest to oppose acquisition of foreign territory. He referred to the maxim of Lord Bacon—that the best way to avoid any domestic disputes or difficulties was to avoid the occasion for them; and said that, in accordance with this maxim, he [Mr. W.] had always opposed the acquisition of foreign territory. There were wiser heads than Lord Bacon's now. There are persons who will provoke occasions, or certainly will meet them, and adopt circumstances as they may arise. He enumerated the difficulties in which this acquisition of territory had plunged us. He was not apprehensive of any disunion. He never contemplated its possibility. He was not one of those who accustom themselves to speak of such a contingency. An earthquake may come, a volcano may burst forth; but human foresight can do nothing to prevent such calamities. So the dissolution of the Union is among those possible calamities. He believed there was a disposition everywhere to support the Union, and that five out of six of our citizens would be glad to give back the new Territories we have acquired.

SENATOR JOHNSON said that the South honestly held the opinion that Congress has no power to prohibit slavery. He believed the contrary opinion was entertained with equal honesty in the North. If the North, having the majority, insist on exercising the power, what can follow but the degradation of the South, or the dissolution of the Union? The only remedy was a just and honorable compromise.

SENATOR CALHOUN said: The North is determined to exclude the property of the slaveholder, and of course the slaveholder himself, from its territory. The effect of this determination of the North was to convert all the Southern population into slaves; and he would never consent to entail that disgrace on his posterity. He denounced any Southern man who would not take the same course. Gentlemen were greatly mistaken, if they supposed the Presidential question in the South would override this more important one. The separation of the North and the South is completed. The South has now a most solemn obligation to perform—to herself—to the Constitution—to the Union. She is bound to come to a decision not to permit this to go on any further, but to show that, dearly as she prizes the Union, there are questions which she regards as of greater importance than the Union.

Gentlemen may do with this bill as they please. If they will not give now what the South asks as a compromise, she will, at the next session, demand all, and will not be satisfied with anything less.

SENATOR BELL believed that the Senator from South Carolina, and those who concurred with him, had placed the South in a wrong position, when they assumed that, by the decision of this question, the die would be cast, and the issue must now be made which involves the dissolution of the Union. Until a vote of Congress should, on the subject of the Southern Territories, actually separate the Union, he never would believe that such a vote could be given.

SENATOR HOUSTON was ready to vote for the admission of Oregon, even with the prohibition of slavery attached to it, as it could never affect the southern Territories. He remembered the cry of disunion and nullification when the high tariff was imposed. That cry reached him in the wilderness, an exile from kindred, and friends and sections; but it rung in his ears, and wounded his heart. He had heard the menaces and cries of disunion until he had become familiar with them, and they had now ceased to produce alarm in his bosom. He had no fear of the dissolution of the Union, when he recollected how it had been established, and how it had been defended. It could not be the interest of the North to destroy the South, notwithstanding the papers signed by old men, and old women, and pretty little girls, praying for abolition—these could not ruffle the Union. The intelligent and manly spirits of the North would rise up to defend the Union. He wished no separation of the States. He had too much confidence in the North to fear any injury from that section. And he thought the South—and he was a Southern man—should make some sacrifice for the purpose of reconciliation with the North. Oregon cannot obtain protection and good government, except from Congress; and he hoped these would be extended to her.

MR. JOHNSON, in reply to the Senator from Texas, declared that the South could not with any propriety rely on the magnanimity of the North. He also took exception to the course of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Bell], who, as a Southern man, looked forward to the day when the South would be saved by Northern generosity. The incendiary publications which had been circulated, as blood in the human body, through every vein and artery, with numerous other acts of notoriety, might be quoted to show the character of Northern generosity.

The South had asked us only to keep off legislative action on this subject. They asked only that the question should be submitted to the Supreme Court, to be decided upon in conformity with the Constitution. But the compromise based on this principle had been laid on the table by the other House—rejected without any of that courtesy and magnanimity which the Senators from Missouri and Texas had promised to us.

SENATOR WEBSTER said: Although slavery as attached to the South exists in other countries, he knew not that slaves transferable as chattels, to be separated from the globe, were to be found but in America, and in the colonies of America. He remembered when this was regarded as an evil fixed on us by the mother country, and it must be considered as an entailment. He referred to the original introduction of slavery in the South, and assumed that no one, as far as he could gather from the acts and debates in Congress, had contemplated any extension of it to new territory. In the Convention, and in the first Congress, it was conceded that slavery was a State institution, and that Congress had no power over it. He was of this opinion, and he would countenance no efforts to produce excitement by the introduction of these questions.

As the Senator from Georgia desires to leave the question to the decision of the civilized world, and as he acquiesced in that course, how would it then stand? The Southern Senators say we deprive them of the right to go into these newly acquired Territories with their property. We certainly do not prevent them from going into these Territories with what is in general law called property. But these States have by their local laws created a property in persons, and they cannot carry these local laws with them. Slavery is created and exists by a local law, which is limited to a certain section; and it is asked that Congress shall establish a local law in other Territories, to enable Southern Senators to carry their particular law with them. No man can be held as a slave, except the local law shall accompany him. The slave is held to be free, until evidence shall be presented to prove that he is a slave.

He was not willing to extend the area of slavery, or to increase the slave representation in the other House. He thought enough had been yielded when twenty representatives from slave States, elected by three-fifths, were in the House of Representatives.

President Polk approved the bill, but in doing so sent a special message to Congress in which he advocated the submission to the people of California and New Mexico of the question whether these territories should be organized with or without slavery.

POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY

PRESIDENT POLK

Ought we now to disturb the Missouri and Texas compromise? Ought we, at this late day, in attempting to annul what has been so long established and acquiesced in, to excite sectional divisions and jealousies; to alienate the people of different portions of the Union from each other, and to endanger the existence of the Union itself?

Why should our institutions be endangered, because it is proposed to submit to the people of the remainder of our newly acquired territory lying south of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes, embracing less than four degrees of latitude, the question whether, in the language of the Texas compromise, they "shall be admitted (as a State) into the Union with or without slavery"? Is this a question to be pushed to such extremities by excited partisans on the one side or the other, in regard to our newly acquired distant possessions on the Pacific, as to endanger the union of thirty glorious States which constitute our Confederacy? I have an abiding confidence that the sober reflection tion and sound patriotism of the people of all the States will bring them to the conclusion that the dictate of wisdom is to follow the example of those who have gone before us, and settle this dangerous question on the Missouri compromise, or some other equitable compromise, which would respect the rights of all, and prove satisfactory to the different portions of the Union.

The Democratic party had met in convention at Baltimore May 22, 1848, and nominated Senator Lewis Cass [Mich.] for President and William O. Butler [Ky.] for Vice-President.

The principle of popular or "squatter" sovereignty was almost unanimously repudiated in the convention, and that of non-interference by the Federal Government with the "rights of property" (i. e., slavery) in the States was defeated by a vote of 246 to 36; yet, before Congress, then in session, dispersed, the rejected principles, as we have seen, became, the one the leading tenet of the party, and the other its almost equally accepted corollary.

In the ensuing election the Free Soil candidates, while securing no electoral votes, polled 291,263 popular votes. A majority of these were drawn from the Democratic party, this being particularly the case in New York State, whose 36 electoral votes were thereby thrown to the Whig candidates, and determined their election, the electoral vote being 163 for Taylor and Fillmore, and 127 for Cass and Butler. Although the political views of General Taylor were little known (he had never voted at any election, though he professed himself a Whig), owing to the fact that he was a Louisianian it was assumed by many in the South that he would not antagonize that section by his position on slavery, and he accordingly received the votes of Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, and Florida, whereas the Northern Democrats in Congress were incensed, and decided to cut loose from their Southern colleagues on the question of slavery in the Territories.

In his annual message at the opening of the next session of Congress (December 5, 1848) President Polk repeated his recommendations about organizing the new Territories with the following addition:

If Congress, instead of observing the course of non-interference, leaving the adoption of their own domestic institutions to the people who may inhabit these Territories; or if, instead of extending the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific, shall prefer to submit the legal and constitutional questions which may arise to the decision of the judicial tribunals, as was proposed in a bill which passed the Senate at your last session, an adjustment may be effected in this mode. If the whole subject be referred to the judiciary, all parts of the Union should cheerfully acquiesce in the final decision of the tribunal created by the Constitution for the settlement of all questions which may arise under the Constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States.

Congress is earnestly invoked, for the sake of the Union, its harmony, and our continued prosperity as a nation, to adjust at its present session this, the only dangerous question which lies in our path.

The House, on December 13, by a vote of 108 to 80 instructed the Committee on Territories to bring in territorial bills for California and New Mexico "excluding slavery therefrom." One week later (December 20) the committee reported such a bill for California, and on January 3, 1849, another for New Mexico. On February 27 the California bill was passed by an almost sectional vote of 126 to 87. The New Mexico bill was not reached during the session.

Owing to the discovery of gold in California January 19, 1848, within a year the population had increased so rapidly that the people applied to Congress for admission to the Union. The Senate referred the matter to a select committee of which Stephen A. Douglas [Ill.] was made chairman. On January 29, 1849, Senator Douglas reported a bill to admit California as a State "upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever, so soon as it shall contain the proper number of inhabitants, and they should establish for themselves a constitution and republican form of government"—an implicit recognition of the principle of "Popular Sovereignty."

On February 5 Robert M. T. Hunter [Va.] presented in the Senate resolutions of the Virginia legislature against applying the Wilmot proviso to the admission of any State or the organization of any territory south of the line established by the Missouri compromise, and against the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in the District of Columbia, threatening in either event "a determined resistance at all hazards and to the last extremity."

On these resolutions Senator Hunter spoke as follows:

PROTEST OF VIRGINIA AGAINST THE WILMOT PROVISIO

SENATOR HUNTER

Some two years since, Virginia felt it to be her duty, under the circumstances which surrounded her, to declare her opinions as to the right of Congress to prohibit slavery in territory to be acquired either by conquest or treaty. These resolutions denied the power of Congress "to control, directly or indirectly," the institution of slavery, so as to impair the rights of the slaveholder; they declared that the territory to be acquired by the United States from any foreign power would be the common property of the States, and that any Federal legislation which directly or indirectly prevented the citizens of any of the States from emigrating to it with their property, of whatever description, would violate the Constitution and the rights of the States, would derogate from that perfect equality which belongs to the States of this Confederacy, and tend to subvert the Union itself; they proclaimed that if the Wilmot proviso should be adopted, in disregard of the spirit and principles of the Missouri compromise, and of every consideration of right, justice, and fraternal feeling, the people of Virginia could have no difficulty in choosing between the only alternatives that would then remain—of abject submission to aggression and outrage on the one hand, or determined resistance on the other, at all hazards and to the last extremity. They declared it to be the duty of every man from every section of this Confederacy, if he loves the Union, to oppose the passage of such a law; and, in the event of its enactment, they warned the slaveholding States, and every citizen thereof, that it would be their duty, as they valued their dearest privileges, their sovereignty, their independence, and their rights of property, to take firm, united, and concerted action in that emergency. Again, at the present session of the legislature, these resolutions have been solemnly reaffirmed.

Sir, we have been taught to believe that our Constitution, if administered truly, and in a spirit of justice and fraternal feeling, contained more securities for human happiness and the liberty of the citizen than any other instrument ever devised by the art of man. But the Union which we love is a confederacy of equals. The Constitution which we cherish makes no invidious distinction between States or citizens, but distributes equally its blessings and its burdens. Such is the Union and such is the Constitution which the blood of our fathers was shed to procure; and shall their sons so far fail in reverence to it as to agree to the subversion of the very principle which lies at the foundation of the structure? Sir, this cannot, ought not to be. The South cannot consent to be made the Jamaica or even the Ireland of this Confederacy, without an effort to prevent it. It would not be for the glory or even for the interest of the non-slaveholding States to force us to such extremities if they could. Sir, they can have no interest in forcing us to extremities; and

I believe that they would pause in that progress which is inevitably leading to such a result, if they understood fully how we think and feel on this subject. Alas! sir, that it should be so; but we have ceased to study and consider the feelings and opinions of each other in the true spirit of fraternal affection.

On February 20, 1849, Isaac P. Walker [Wis.] moved in the Senate to amend a general appropriation bill by extending the Constitution of the United States to the Territories. Upon this a constitutional debate, one of the most important in American history, arose between Daniel Webster [Mass.] and John C. Calhoun [S. C.].

EXTENSION OF THE CONSTITUTION TO THE TERRITORIES

SENATE, FEBRUARY 4, 1849

SENATOR WEBSTER said: Mr. President, it is of importance that we should seek to have clear ideas and correct notions of the question which this amendment of the member from Wisconsin has presented to us; and especially that we should seek to get some conception of what is meant by the proposition, in a law, to "extend the Constitution of the United States to the Territories." Why, sir, the thing is utterly impossible. All the legislation in the world, in this general form, could not accomplish it. There is no cause for the operation of the legislative power in such a manner as that. The Constitution—what is it? We extend the Constitution of the United States by law to a Territory! What is the Constitution of the United States? Is not its very first principle that all within its influence and comprehension shall be represented in the legislature which it establishes, with not only a right of debate and a right to vote in both Houses of Congress, but a right to partake in the choice of the President and Vice-President? And can we by law extend these rights, or any of them, to a Territory of the United States? Everybody will see that it is altogether impracticable. Well, sir, the amendment goes on, and says that the revenue laws shall, so far as they are suitable, be applied in the Territories. Now, with respect to that qualification, made by the honorable member from Wisconsin, I shall like to know if he understands it as I suppose he does. Does the expression, "as far as suitable," apply to the Constitution or the revenue laws, or both?

SENATOR WALKER.—It was not the proposition to extend the Constitution beyond the limits to which it was applicable.

SENATOR WEBSTER.—It comes to this, then, that the Constitution is to be extended as far as practicable; but how far that is to be decided by the President of the United States, and therefore he is to have absolute and despotic power. He is the judge of what is suitable and what is unsuitable, and what he thinks is suitable is suitable, and what he thinks unsuitable is unsuitable. He is "omnis in hoc"; and what is this but to say, in general terms, that the President of the United States shall govern this territory as he sees fit till Congress makes further provision? Now, if the gentleman will be kind enough to tell me what principle of the Constitution he supposes suitable, what discrimination he can draw between suitable and unsuitable, which he proposes to follow, I shall be instructed. Let me say that in this general sense there is no such thing as extending the Constitution. The Constitution is extended over the United States and over nothing else, and can extend over nothing else. It cannot be extended over anything except over the old States and the new States that shall come in hereafter, when they do come in. There is a want of accuracy of ideas in this respect that is quite remarkable among eminent gentlemen, and especially professional and judicial gentlemen. It seems to be taken for granted that the right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, and every principle designed to protect personal liberty is extended by force of the Constitution itself over every new Territory. That proposition cannot be maintained at all. How do you arrive at it by any reasoning or deduction? It can be arrived at only by the loosest of all possible constructions. It is said this must be so, else the right of the habeas corpus would be lost. Undoubtedly these rights must be conferred by law before they can be enjoyed in a Territory.

Sir, if the hopes of some gentlemen were realized, and Cuba were to become a possession of the United States by cession, does anybody suppose that the habeas corpus and the trial by jury would be established in it by the mere act of cession? Why more than election laws and the political franchises, or popular franchises? Sir, the whole authority of Congress on this subject is embraced in that very short provision that Congress shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories of the United States. The word is Territories; for it is quite evident that the compromises of the Constitution looked to no new acquisitions to form new Territories. But, as they had been acquired from time to time, new Terri-teries have been regarded as coming under that general provision for making rules for Territories. We have never had a Territory governed as the United States are governed. The legislature and judiciary of Territories have always been established by a law of Congress. I do not say that, while we sit here to make laws for these Territories, we are not bound by every one of those great principles which are intended as general securities for public liberty. But they do not exist in Territories till introduced by the authority of Congress. These principles do not, proprio vigore, apply to any one of the Territories of the United States, because that Territory, while a Territory, does not become a part, and is no part, of the United States.

SENATOR CALHOUN.—I am very happy, sir, to hear this proposition thus asserted, for it will have the effect of narrowing very greatly the controversy between the North and the South, as it regards the slavery question in connection with the Territories. It is an implied admission that, if the Constitution does extend to the Territories, the South will be protected in the enjoyment of its property—that it will be under the shield of the Constitution. You can put no other interpretation upon the proposition which the gentlemen have made, that the Constitution does not extend to the Territories.

Then the simple question is, does the Constitution extend to the Territories, or does it not extend to them? Why, the Constitution interprets itself. It pronounces itself to be the supreme law of the land.

SENATOR WEBSTER.—What land?

SENATOR CALHOUN.—The land; the Territories of the United States are a part of the land. It is the supreme law, not within the limits of the States of this Union merely, but wherever our flag waves—wherever our authority goes, the Constitution in part goes, not all its provisions certainly, but all its suitable provisions. Why, can we have any authority beyond the Constitution? I put the question solemnly to gentlemen: if the Constitution does not go there, how are we to have any authority or jurisdiction whatever? Is not Congress the creature of the Constitution? does it not hold its existence upon the tenure of the continuance of the Constitution; and would it not be annihilated upon the destruction of that instrument, and the consequent dissolution of this confederacy? And shall we, the creature of the Constitution, pretend that we have any authority beyond the reach of the Constitution? Sir, we were told a few days since that the courts of the United States had made a decision that the Constitution did not extend to the Territories without an act of Congress. I confess that I was incredulous, and I am still incredulous that any tribunal pretending to have a knowledge of our system of government, as the courts of the United States ought to have, could have pronounced such a monstrous judgment. I am inclined to think that it is an error which has been unjustly attributed to them; but, if they have made such a decision as that, I for one say that it ought not and never can be respected. The Territories belong to us; they are ours; that is to say, they are the property of the thirty States of the Union; and we, as the representatives of those thirty States, have the right to exercise all that authority and jurisdiction which ownership carries with it.

Sir, there are some questions that do not admit of lengthened discussion. This is one of them. The mere statement is sufficient to carry conviction with it. And I am rejoiced to hear gentlemen acknowledge that, if the Constitution is there, we are under its shield. The South wants no higher ground to stand upon. The gentlemen have put us upon high ground by the admission that their only means of putting their claims above ours is to deny the existence of the Constitution in California and New Mexico. Now, is there a more fundamental principle than that the States of which this Federal Union is composed have a community of interest in all that belongs to the Union in its federative character? And that the territory of the United States belongs to the Union in that capacity is declared by the Constitution, and that there shall be, in all respects, perfect equality among all the members of the confederacy. There is no principle more distinctly set forth than that there shall be no discrimination in favor of one section over another, and that the Constitution shall have no halfway operation in regard to one portion of the Union, while it shall have full force and effect in regard to another portion.

SENATOR WEBSTER.—The honorable Senator from South Carolina alludes to some decision of the United States courts as affirming that the Constitution of the United States does not extend to the Territories. I can assure him that the same thing has been decided by the United States courts over and over again for the last thirty years.

The Constitution, as the gentleman contends, extends over the Territories. How does it get there? I am surprised to hear a gentleman so distinguished as a strict constructionist affirming that the Constitution of the United States extends to the Territories without showing us any clause in the Constitution in any way leading to that result; and to hear the gentleman maintaining that position without showing us any way in which such a result could be inferred increases my surprise.

The Constitution of the United States extending over the Territories and no other law existing there! Why, I beg to know how any government could proceed, without any other authority existing there than such as is created by the Constitution of the United States? Does the Constitution of the United States settle titles to land? Does it regulate the rights of property? Does it fix the relations of parent and child, guardian and ward? The Constitution of the United States establishes what the gentleman calls a confederation for certain great purposes, leaving all the great mass of laws which is to govern society to derive their existence from State enactments. That is the just view of the state of things under the Constitution. And a State or a Territory that has no law but such as it derives from the Constitution of the United States must be entirely without any State or territorial government. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, conversant with the subject as he must be, from his long experience in different branches of the Government, must know that the Congress of the United States have established principles in regard to the Territories that are utterly repugnant to the Constitution. The Constitution of the United States has provided for them an independent judiciary; for the judge of every court of the United States holds his office upon the tenure of good behavior. Will the gentleman say that in any court established in the Territories the judge holds his office in that way? He holds it for a term of years, and is removable at executive discretion. How did we govern Louisiana before it was a State? Did the writ of habeas corpus exist in Louisiana during its territorial existence? Or the right to trial by jury? Who ever heard of trial by jury there before the law creating the territorial government gave the right to trial by jury? No one. When new territory has been acquired it has always been subject to the laws of Congress, to such law as Congress thought proper to pass for its immediate government, for its government during its territorial existence, during the preparatory state in which it was to remain until it was ready to come into the Union as one of the family of States.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina argues that the Constitution declares itself to be the law of the land, and that, therefore, it must extend over the Territories. "The land," I take it, means the land over which the Constitution is established, or, in other words, it means the States united under the Constitution. But does not the gentleman see at once that that argument would prove a great deal too much? The Constitution no more says that the Constitution itself shall be the supreme law of the land than it says that the laws of Congress shall be the supreme law of the land. It declares that the Constitution and the laws of Congress passed under it shall be the supreme law of the land.

SENATOR CALHOUN.—The laws of Congress made in pursuance of its provisions.

SENATOR WEBSTER.—Well, I suppose the revenue laws are made in pursuance of its provisions; but, according to the gentleman's reasoning, the Constitution extends over the Territories as the supreme law, and no legislation on the subject is necessary. This would be tantamount to saying that the moment territory is attached to the United States, all the laws of the United States, as well as the Constitution of the United States, become the governing will of men's conduct and of the rights of property. Sir, this is a course of reasoning that cannot be maintained. The Crown of England often makes conquests of territory. Who ever heard it contended that the constitution of England, or the supreme power of Parliament, because it is the law of the land, extended over the territory thus acquired, until made to do so by a special act of Parliament? The whole history of colonial conquests shows entirely the reverse. Until provision is made by act of Parliament for a civil government, the territory is held as a military acquisition. It is subject to the control of Parliament, and Parliament may make all laws that they deem proper and necessary to be made for its government; but until such provision is made the territory is not under the dominion of English law. And it is exactly upon the same principle that territories coming to belong to the United States by acquisition or by cession, as we have no jus colonizans, remain to be made subject to the operation of our supreme law by an enactment of Congress.

SENATOR CALHOUN.—I shall be extremely brief in noticing the arguments of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and I trust decisive. His first objection is, as I understand it, that I show no authority by which the Constitution of the United States is extended to the Territories. How does Congress get any power over the Territories?

SENATOR WEBSTER.—It is granted in the Constitution in so many words: the power to make laws for the government of the Territories.

SENATOR CALHOUN.—Well, then, the proposition that the Constitution does not extend to the Territories is false to that extent. How else does Congress obtain the legislative power over the Territories? And yet the honorable Senator says I assign no reason for it. I assigned the strongest reason. If the Constitution does not extend there, you have no right to legislate or to do any act in reference to the Territories.

Well, as to the next point. The honorable Senator states that he was surprised to hear from a strict constructionist the proposition that the Constitution extends itself to the Territories. I certainly never contended that the Constitution was of itself sufficient for the government of Territories without the intervention of legislative enactments. It requires human agency everywhere; it cannot extend itself within the limits of any State, in the sense of which the gentleman speaks of it. It is, nevertheless, the supreme law, in obedience to which, and in conformity with which, all legislative enactments must be made. And the proposition that the Constitution of the United States extends to the Territories so far as it is applicable to them is so clear a proposition that even the Senator from Massachusetts, with his profound talent, cannot disprove it. I will put the case of some of the negative provisions of the Constitution. Congress shall make no law concerning religion, nor create titles of nobility. Can you establish titles of nobility in California? If not, if all the negative provisions extend to the Territories, why not the positive? I do not think it necessary to dwell any longer upon this point.

SENATOR WEBSTER.—The precise question is whether a Territory, while it remains in a territorial state, is a part of the United States. I maintain it is not. And there is no stronger proof of what has been the idea of the government in this respect than that to which I have alluded, and which has drawn the honorable member's attention. Now, let us see how it stands. The judicial power of the United States is declared by the Constitution to be "vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress shall from time to time ordain and establish." The whole judicial power, therefore, of the United States is in these courts. And the Constitution declares that "all the judges of these courts shall hold their offices during good behavior." Then the gentleman must admit that the legislation of Congress heretofore has not been altogether in error; that these territorial courts do not constitute a part of the judicial power of the United States, because the whole judicial power of the United States is to be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as Congress shall establish, and the judges of all these courts are to have a life tenure under the law; and we do not give such tenure, nor never did, to the judges of these territorial courts. That has gone on the presumption and true idea, I suppose, that the territories are not even part of the United States, but are subject to their legislation. Well, where do they get this power of legislation? Why, I have already stated that the Constitution says "the Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States"; and it is under that clause, and that clause only, that the legislation of Congress in respect to the Territories has been conducted. And it is apparent from our history that no other provision was intended for territorial government, inasmuch as it is highly probable, I think certain, that no acquisition of foreign territory was ever contemplated.

And again: there is another remarkable instance. The honorable gentleman, and his friends who act with him on these subjects, hold that the power of internal improvement within the United States does not belong to Congress. They deny that we can pass any law for internal improvements within any State of this Union, while they all admit that the moment we get out of the State into a Territory we can make just as much improvement as we choose. There is not an honorable gentleman on that side of the chamber who has not, time and again, voted money out of the public treasury for internal improvements out of the Union, in Territories, under the conception that, under that provision of the Constitution to which I have referred, they do not constitute any portion of the Union—that they are not parts of the Union.

Sir, there is no end to illustrations that might be brought upon this subject; our history is full of them. Our history is uniform in its course. It began with the acquisition of Louisiana. It went on after Florida became a part of the Union. In all cases, under all circumstances, by every proceeding of Congress on the subject, and by all judicature on the subject, it has been held that Territories belonging to the United States were to be governed by a constitution of their own, framed by a convention, and in approving that constitution the legislation of Congress was not necessarily confined to those principles that bind it when it is exercised in passing laws for the United States itself. But, sir, I take leave of the subject.

SENATOR CALHOUN.—Mr. President, a few words. First, as to the judiciary. If Congress has decided the judiciary of the Territories to be part of the judiciary of the United States, CONgress has decided wrong. It may be that it is a part of the judiciary of the United States, though I do not think so.

SENATOR WEBSTER (in his seat).—Nor I.

SENATOR CALHOUN.—Again: the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts says that the Territories are not a part of the United States—are not of the United States. I had supposed that all the Territories were a part of the United States. They are called so.

SENATOR WEBSTER (in his seat).—Never.

SENATOR CALHOUN.—At all events, they belong to the United States.

SENATOR WEBSTER (still in his seat).—That is another thing. The colonies of England belong to England, but they are not a part of England.

SENATOR CALHOUN.—Whatever belongs to the United States, they have authority over, and England has authority over whatever belongs to her. We can have no authority over anything that does not belong to the United States, I care not in what light it may be placed.

But, sir, as to the other point raised by the Senator—internal improvements. The Senator says there is not a member on this side of the chamber but what has voted to appropriate money out of the public treasury for internal improvements in the Territories. I know that a very large portion of the gentlemen on this side have voted to appropriate money out of the public treasury for improvements in Territories, upon the principle of ownership; that the land in the Territories in which improvements are made has an increased value in proportion to the sums appropriated, and the appropriations have, in every case, been given in alternate sections. But many gentlemen here have even utterly denied our right to make them under that form. But that question comes under another category altogether. It comes under the category whether we have a right to appropriate funds out of the common treasury at all for internal improvements.

Sir, I repeat it, that the proposition that the Constitution of the United States extends to the Territories is so plain a one, and its opposite—I say it with all respect—is so absurd a one, that the strongest intellect cannot maintain it. And I repeat that the gentlemen acknowledge, by implication, if not more than that, that the extension of the Constitution of the United States to the Territories would be a shield to the South upon the question in controversy between us and them. I hold it to be a most important concession. It narrows the ground of controversy between us. We then cannot be deprived of our equal participation in those Territories without being deprived of the advantages and rights which the Constitution gives us.

Senator John M. Berrien [Ga.] offered a modification of Senator Walker's amendment to the effect that the Constitution, insofar as its provisions can be applied to the condition of a Territory, should extend to the Territories; this was accepted by the mover, and the amendment so modified was adopted by a vote of 29 to 27.

Senator Webster made a determined effort to have the Walker amendment dropped, and succeeded in doing so only on the last day of the session. The Senate sat until the early morning hours of March 4, 1849, when Webster's motion was passed by a vote of 38 to 7, and the appropriations went through with no proviso about the new territories. President Polk at once signed the bill—perhaps unconstitutionally, for it is a disputed point as to whether his Administration had terminated at midnight, even though this hour had been conventionally advanced by the Senate to the close of their deliberations.

President Taylor, at the opening of the session of Congress (December 3, 1849), gave Robert Toombs [Ga.], a member of the House of Representatives, who approached him on the subject, clearly to understand that he would not veto a bill for the admission of the Territories with the Wilmot proviso.

The Southern Representatives then made a determined effort to elect one of themselves (Howell Cobb of Georgia) Speaker, in order, so far as possible, to prevent the passage of the proviso. Owing to the fact that a majority of the votes cast were required to elect, a deadlock ensued, and the feelings of the Southern Representatives were wrought up to a high pitch. On December 13 Richard K. Meade [Va.] made threats of secession from the Union by the South, which were more strongly repeated by Mr. Toombs, Alexander H. Stephens [Ga.], and William F. Colcock [S. C.].

ported that a plurality should decide. This was agreed to by a vote of 113 to 106, and on the next day Cobb was elected by a vote of 102, Robert C. Winthrop [Mass.], a Whig, receiving 99 votes, and David Wilmot [Pa.], the choice of the Free Soilers, 8 votes. Thus, through a division of the North, the South won its point.

On December 31 Joseph M. Root [O.] moved to instruct the Committee on Territories to bring in a bill for the organization of New Mexico with the Wilmot proviso. Of this proposition Thomas L. Clingman [N. C.] remarked on January 22, 1850:

"Attempt to trample on us and we part company. Remember, sir, that this very territory was acquired by conquest, and that while the South, according to its population, would have been required to furnish only one-third of the troops, it in point of fact did furnish two-thirds of the men that made the conquest. And the North, deficient comparatively as it was in the struggle, now says that its conscience, or its cupidity, will not permit us to have the smallest portion of that territory. Why, sir, this is the most impudent proposition that was ever maintained by any respectable body of men!"

RULE OR RUIN

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 13, 1849

MR. MEADE.—Sir, let a proposition be made and supported by those who are desirous of erasing this demon of discord, for the purpose of uniting the conservatism on both sides, in opposition to any measure which shall look to the abolition of slavery in the District, or a prohibition of it in the Territories. If such a proposition should be adopted, I should be willing to take a Speaker from either side of the House, relying upon him to carry out the views thus expressed by a majority of this body.

But, sir, if the organization of this House is to be followed by the passage of these bills, if these outrages are to be committed upon my people, I trust in God, sir, that my eyes have rested upon the last speaker of the House of Representatives.

If the North generally, whose big prosperity is the result of unrestricted intercourse with the South, refuse the terms we prescribe, let us talk no more about the blessings of Union.

MR. TOOMBS.—I do not hesitate to avow before this House, and the country, and in the presence of the living God, that if by your legislation you seek to drive us from the Territories of California and New Mexico, purchased by the common blood and treasure of the whole people, and to abolish slavery in this district, thereby attempting to fix a national degradation upon half the States of this confederacy, I am for disunion, and, if my physical courage be equal to the maintenance of my convictions of right and duty, I will devote all I am and all I have on earth to its consummation.

MR. STEPHENS.—I concur in every word uttered by my colleague [Mr. Toombs], and, furthermore, I declare that, from the moment a concerted attack, made by the North upon the rights of the South, is an accomplished fact, the Union is thereby dissolved.

MR. COLCOCK.—As soon as the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia is resolved upon, or the Wilmot proviso is passed, that moment I shall move for the dissolution of the Union.

These threats did not materialize, since Cobb, after all, was elected Speaker. On December 22 the question of the contest was referred to a committee which re-

THE OMNIBUS BILL

[DEBATES ON THE CLAY COMPROMISE MEASURES]

Message of President Taylor on Admission of California—Henry Clay's Resolutions in the Senate in Favor of Compromise on Slavery—Debate: in Favor of the Resolution, Clay, Thomas H. Benton [Mo.], Daniel Webster [Mass.]; Opposed, Henry S. Foote [Miss.], James M. Mason [Va.], Jefferson Davis [Miss.], John C. Calhoun [S. C.]—Resolutions Are Referred to a Committee of Thirteen—Death of Senator Calhoun—Report of the Committee Proposing Bills; These Are Amended and Combined in an "Omnibus Bill," and Passed—Protest of Southern Senators.

PRESIDENT TAYLOR, in a special message to Congress January 21, 1850, urged the admission of California under the Constitution which she had prepared, announcing himself in favor of the principle of Popular Sovereignty.

THE RIGHT OF A STATE TO SELF-GOVERNMENT

PRESIDENT TAYLOR

Should Congress, when California shall present herself for incorporation into the Union, annex a condition to her admission as a State affecting her domestic institutions contrary to the wishes of her people, and even compel her temporarily to comply with it, yet the State could change her constitution at any time after admission, when to her it should seem expedient. Any attempt to deny to the people of the State the right of self-government in a matter which peculiarly affects themselves will infallibly be regarded by them as an invasion of their rights; and, upon the principles laid down in our own Declaration of Independence, they will certainly be sustained by the great mass of the American people. To assert that they are a conquered people, and must as a State submit to the will of their conquerors, in this regard, will meet with no cordial response among American freemen. Great numbers of them are native citizens of the United States, and not inferior to the rest of our countrymen in intelligence and patriotism; and no language of menace to restrain them in the exercise of an undoubted right, substantially guaranteed to them by the treaty of cession itself, shall ever be uttered by me, or encouraged and sustained by persons acting under my authority. It is to be expected that in the residue of the territory ceded to us by Mexico the people residing there will, at the time of their incorporation into the Union as a State, settle all questions of domestic policy to suit themselves.

On January 29 Henry Clay [Ky.], who had returned to the Senate for this express purpose, presented to that body his famous compromise resolutions on the subject of slavery. Upon them a prolonged debate occurred in which the chief speakers in favor of the resolutions, besides Senator Clay, were Thomas H. Benton [Mo.], Daniel Webster [Mass.]; those opposed to them were Henry S. Foote [Miss.], James M. Mason [Va.], Jefferson Davis [Miss.] and John C. Calhoun [S. C.].

SENATOR CLAY'S COMPROMISE RESOLUTIONS

SENATE, JANUARY 29-MARCH 7, 1850

SENATOR CLAY.—Mr. President, I hold in my hand a series of resolutions which I desire to submit to the consideration of this body. Taken together, in combination, they propose an amicable arrangement of all questions in controversy between the free and the slave States, growing out of the subject of slavery. The preamble and first resolution are as follows:

It being desirable for the peace, concord, and harmony of the Union of these States to settle and adjust amicably all existing questions of controversy between them arising out of the institution of slavery, upon a fair, equitable, and just basis: Therefore

1st. Resolved, That California ought, upon her application, to be admitted as one of the States of this Union, without the imposition by Congress of any restriction in respect to the exclusion or introduction of slavery within those boundaries.

The second resolution, sir, is as follows:

2d. Resolved, That as slavery does not exist by law, and is not likely to be introduced into any of the territory acquired by the United States from the Republic of Mexico, it is inexpedient for Congress to provide by law either for its introduction into or exclusion from any part of the said territory; and that appropriate territorial governments ought to be established by Congress in all of the said territory, not assigned as the boundaries of the proposed State of California, without the adoption of any restriction or condition on the subject of slavery.

This resolution, sir, proposes a declaration of two truths—one of law and the other of fact. The truth of law which it declares is that there does not exist, at this time, slavery within any portion of the territory acquired by the United States from Mexico.

The next truth which the resolution asserts is that slavery is not likely to be introduced into any portion of that territory. That is a matter of fact. California, of all other portions acquired by us from Mexico that country into which it would have been most likely that slavery should have been introduced, California herself has met in convention, and, by a unanimous vote, embracing slaveholders from Mississippi, as well as from other parts, who concurred in the resolution, has declared against the introduction of slavery within her limits. I think, then, that, taking this leading fact in connection with all the evidence we have from other sources on the subject, I am warranted in the conclusion which constitutes the second truth which I have stated in this resolution.

The third resolution fixes the boundaries of the State, and the fourth provides for the assumption by the United States Government of California's obligations to Texas.

The fifth resolution, sir, and the sixth, like the third and fourth, are somewhat connected together. They are as follows:

5th. Resolved, That it is inexpedient to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, while that institution continues to exist in the State of Maryland, without the consent of that State, without the consent of the people of the District, and without just compensation to the owners of slaves within the District.

6th. But Resolved, That it is expedient to prohibit within the District the slave-trade, in slaves brought into it from States or places beyond the limits of the District, either to be sold therein as merchandise, or to be transported to other markets without the District of Columbia.

The first of these resolutions, Mr. President, in somewhat different language, asserts substantially no other principle than that which was asserted by the Senate of the United States twelve years ago (1838) upon Resolutions which I then offered, and which passed—at least the particular resolution passed—by a majority of four-fifths of the Senate.

The next resolution proposed deserves a passing remark. It is that the slave trade within the District ought to be abolished, prohibited. I do not mean by that the alienation and transfer of slaves from the inhabitants within this District—the sale by one neighbor to another of a slave which the one owns and the other wants, that a husband may perhaps be put along with his wife, or a wife with her husband. I do not mean to touch at all the question of the right of property in slaves among persons living within the District; but the slave trade to which I refer was, I think, pronounced an abomination more than forty years ago by one of the most gifted and distinguished sons of Virginia, the late Mr. Randolph. And who is there who is not shocked at its enormity? Sir, it is a great mistake at the North if they suppose that gentlemen living in the slave States look upon one who is a regular trader in slaves with any particular favor or kindness. They are often—sometimes unjustly, perhaps—excluded from social intercourse. But, then, what is this trade? It is a good deal limited since the retrocession (in 1846) of the portion of the District formerly belonging to Virginia. Let the slave dealer who chooses to collect his slaves in Virginia and Maryland go to ports in these States; let him not come here and establish his jails and put on his chains, and sometimes shock the sensibilities of our nature by a long train of slaves passing through that avenue leading from this Capitol to the house of the Chief Magistrate of one of the most glorious republics that ever existed. Why should he not do it? Sir, I am sure I speak the sentiments of every Southern man, and every man coming from the slave States, when I say let it terminate, and that it is an abomination; that there is no occasion for it; it ought no longer to be tolerated.

The seventh resolution relates to a subject embraced in a bill now under consideration by the Senate. It is as follows:

7th. Resolved, That more effectual provisions ought to be made by law, according to the requirement of the Constitution, for the restitution and delivery of persons bound to service or labor in any State who may escape into any other State or Territory in the Union.

Sir, that is so evident and has been so clearly shown by the debate which has already taken place on the subject, that I have not now occasion to add another word.

The last resolution of the series of eight is as follows:

And 8th. Resolved, That Congress has no power to prohibit or obstruct the trade in slaves between the slaveholding States; but that the admission or exclusion of slaves brought from one into another of them depends exclusively upon their own particular laws.

It is obvious that no legislation is necessary or intended to follow that resolution. It merely asserts a truth, established by the highest authority of law in this country, and in conformity with that decision I trust there will be one universal acquiescence.

Mr. President, you have before you the whole series of resolutions, the whole scheme of arrangement and accommodation of these distracting questions, which I have to offer, after having bestowed on these subjects the most anxious, intensely anxious, consideration ever since I have been in this body. How far it may prove acceptable to both or either of the parties on these great questions it is not for me to say. I think it ought to be acceptable to both. There is no sacrifice of any principle, proposed in any of them, by either party. The plan is founded upon mutual forbearance, originating in a spirit of conciliation and concession; not of principles, but of matters of feeling.

Sir, although I believe this project contains about an equal amount of concession and forbearance on both sides, I might have asked from the free States of the North a more liberal and extensive concession than should be asked from the slave States. And why? You are numerically more powerful than the slave States, and greatness and magnanimity should ever be allied together.

But there are other reasons why concession upon such a subject as this should be more liberal, more expansive, coming from the free than from the slave States. It is a sentiment, a sentiment of humanity and philanthropy on your side. Aye, sir, and when a sentiment of that kind is honestly and earnestly cherished, with a disposition to make sacrifices to enforce it, it is a noble and beautiful sentiment; but, sir, when the sacrifice is not to be made by those who cherish that sentiment and inculcate it, but by another people, in whose situation it is impossible, from their position, for you to sympathize and to share all and everything that belongs to them, I must say to you, Senators from the free States, it is a totally different question. On your side it is a sentiment without sacrifice, a sentiment without danger, a sentiment without hazard, without peril, without loss. But how is it on the other side, to which, as I have said, a greater amount of concession ought to be made in any scheme of compromise?

In the first place, sir, there is a vast and incalculable amount of property to be sacrificed, and to be sacrificed, not by your sharing in the common burdens, but exclusive of you. And this is not all. The social intercourse, habit, safety, property, life, everything is at hazard in a greater or less degree in the slave States.

Behold, Mr. President, that dwelling house now wrapped in flames. Listen, sir, to the rafters and beams which fall in succession, amid the crash; and the flames ascending higher and higher as they tumble down. Behold those women and children who are flying from the calamitous scene, and with their shrieks and lamentations imploring the aid of high Heaven. Whose house is that? Whose wives and children are they? Yours in the free States? No. You are looking on in safety and security, while the conflagration which I have described is raging in the slave States, and produced, not intentionally by you, but produced from the inevitable tendency of the measures which you have adopted, and which others have carried far beyond what you have wished.

In the one scale, then, we behold sentiment, sentiment, sentiment alone; in the other, property, the social fabric, life, and all that makes life desirable and happy.

Senator Clay closed his speech with the relation of an incident. A man, he said, had come to his lodgings that very morning and presented him with a precious relic.

And what, Mr. President, do you suppose it is? It is a fragment of the coffin of Washington—a fragment of that coffin in which now repose in silence, in sleep, and speechless, all the earthly remains of the venerated Father of his Country. Was it portentous that it should have been thus presented to me? Was it a sad presage of what might happen to that fabric which Washington's virtue, patriotism, and valor established? No, sir, no. It was a warning voice, coming from the grave to the Congress now in session to beware, to pause, to reflect before they lend themselves to any purposes which shall destroy that Union which was cemented by his exertions and example. Sir, I hope an impression may be made on your mind such as that which was made on mine by the reception of this precious relic.

SENATOR FOOTE.—Mr. President, I know well that the honorable Senator's intentions are pure and patriotic—that he designs only the safety and happiness of the whole Republic; and yet I do verily believe that if the resolutions now introduced by him shall be adopted, accompanied by the remarks which he has just uttered in our hearing, without any response, or even suggestion of objection from any Southern Senator, a presumption of acquiescence might arise which would be deeply detrimental to a cause which I hold dearer than life itself.

If I understand the resolutions properly, they are objectionable, as it seems to me:

1. Because they only assert that it is not expedient that Congress should abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; thus allowing the implication to arise that Congress has power to legislate on the subject of slavery in the District, which may hereafter be exercised if it should become expedient to do so; whereas, I hold that Congress has, under the Constitution, no such legislative power at all, and any attempt thus to legislate would be a gross fraud upon all the States of the Union.

2. The resolutions of the honorable Senator assert that slavery does not now exist by law in the territories recently acquired from Mexico; whereas I am of opinion that the treaty with the Mexican Republic carried the Constitution, with all its guarantees, to all the territory obtained by treaty, and secured the privilege to every Southern slaveholder to enter any part of it, attended by his slave property, and to enjoy the same therein free from all molestation or hindrance whatsoever.

3. Whether slavery is or is not likely to be introduced into these territories, or into any one of them, is a proposition too uncertain, in my judgment, to be at present positively affirmed; and I am unwilling to make a solemn legislative declaration on the point. Let the future provide the appropriate solution of this interesting question.

4 and 5. * * * *

6. As to the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, I see no particular objection to it, provided it is done in a delicate and judicious manner, and is not a concession to menaces or demands of factionists and fanatics. If other questions can be adjusted, this one will, perhaps, occasion but little difficulty.

7. The resolutions which provide for the restoration of fugitives from labor or service, and for the establishment of territorial governments free from all restriction on the subject of slavery, have my hearty approval. The last resolution—which asserts that Congress has no power to prohibit the trade in slaves from State to State—I equally approve.

8. If all other questions connected with the subject of slavery can be satisfactorily adjusted, I see no objection to admitting all California above the line of 36 degrees and 30 minutes into the Union; provided another new slave State can be laid off within the present limits of Texas, so as to keep up the present equipoponderance between the slave and the free States of the Union; and provided, further, all this is done by way of compromise, and in order to save the Union (as dear to me as to any man living).

SENATOR MASON.—Sir, I regret deeply that, in the earnest and honest desire which I have no doubt the Senator entertains to have these disturbing questions composed, he has felt it his duty, representing one of the slaveholding States, to offer such a proposition. I would go with him who went furthest, but within the limits of strict duty, in adjusting these unhappy differences; but I do not feel at liberty to move one step toward such a compromise, if constitutional right is invaded in the slightest degree.

Sir, so far as I have read these resolutions, there is but one proposition to which I can give a hearty assent, and that is the resolution which proposes to organize territorial governments at once in these Territories, without a declaration one way or the other as to their domestic institutions. But there is another which I deeply regret to see introduced into this Senate by a Senator from a slaveholding State; it is that which assumes that slavery now does not exist by law in those countries. I understand one of these propositions to declare that by law slavery is now abolished in New Mexico and California. That was the very proposition advanced by the non-slaveholding States at the last session, combated and disproved, as I thought, by gentlemen from the slaveholding States, and which the compromise bill was framed to test. So far I regarded the question of law as disposed of, and it was clearly and satisfactorily shown to be against the spirit of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky. If the contrary is true, I presume the Senator from Kentucky would declare that, if a law is now valid in the Territories abolishing slavery, it could not be introduced there even if a law was passed creating the institution or repealing the statutes already existing; a doctrine never assented to, so far as I know, until now, by any Senator representing one of the slaveholding States. Sir, I hold the very opposite, and with such confidence that at the last session I was willing and did vote for a bill to test this question in the Supreme Court. Yet this resolution assumes the other doctrine to be true, and our assent is challenged to it as a proposition in law.

I deem it my duty to enter a decided protest on the part of Virginia against such doctrines. They concede the whole question at once, that our people shall not go into the new Territories and take their property with them; a doctrine to which I never will assent, and for which, sir, no law can be found. There are other portions of the resolutions, for which, if they could be separated, I should be very willing to vote. That respecting fugitive slaves, and that respecting the organization of governments in these Territories, I should be willing to vote for, and I am happy to declare the gratification I experience at finding the Senator from Kentucky differing so much on this subject from the executive message recently laid before the Senate. I beg not to be understood as having spoken in any spirit of unkindness toward the Senator from Kentucky, for whom I entertain the warmest and most profound respect; but I cannot but express also my regret that he has felt it to be his duty, standing as he does before this people, and representing the people he does, to introduce into this body resolutions of this kind.

SENATOR DAVIS.—As it has been made an historical question as to what the position of the Senate was twelve years ago, and as with great regret I see this, the conservative branch of the Government, tending toward that fanaticism which seems to prevail with the majority in the United States, I wish to read from the journals of that date the resolutions then adopted, and to show that they went further than the honorable Senator from Kentucky has stated. I take it for granted, from the date to which the honorable Senator has alluded, he means the resolutions introduced by the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun], not now in his seat, and to which the Senator from Kentucky proposed certain amendments.

Senator Davis read the resolutions with Senator Clay's amendments.

Here, then, was fully and broadly asserted the danger resulting from the interference in the question of slavery in the District of Columbia, as trenching upon the rights of the slaveholding States. Twelve years only have elapsed, yet this brief period has swept away even the remembrance of principles then deemed sacred and necessary to secure the safety of the Union. Now an honorable and distinguished Senator, to whom the country has been induced to look for something that would heal the existing dissensions, instead of raising new barriers against encroachment, dashes down those heretofore erected, and augments the existing danger. A representative from one of the slaveholding States raises his voice for the first time in disregard of this admitted right.

But, sir, we are called on to receive this as a measure of compromise! Is a measure in which we of the minority are to resolve nothing a measure of compromise? I look upon it as but a modest mode of taking that the claim to which has been more boldly asserted by others; and that I may be understood upon this question, and that my position may go forth to the country in the same columns that convey the sentiments of the Senator from Kentucky, I here assert that never will I take less than the Missouri compromise line extended to the Pacific Ocean, with the specific recognition of the right to hold slaves in the territory below that line; and that, before such territories are admitted into the Union as States, slaves may be taken there from any of the United States at the option of their owners. I can never consent to give additional power to a majority to commit further aggressions upon the minority in this Union; and will never consent to any proposition which will have such a tendency, without a full guarantee or counteracting measure in connection with it. I forbear commenting at any further length upon the propositions embraced in the resolutions at this time.

SENATOR CLAY.—I am extremely sorry that this premature, and—allow me to say—in my opinion unnecessary, discussion has taken place. Whenever the Senator who has just resumed his seat chooses to meet me in argument at a proper time, I pledge myself to show him that there is not the slightest discrepancy in my course in 1838 and now.

SENATOR DAVIS.—Now is the time.

SENATOR CLAY.—I choose not to give way now.

SENATOR DAVIS.—The Senator asked me to name my time; and I say now.

SENATOR CLAY.—Not until I am done. I am reminded of my coming from a slave State. I tell the Senator from Mississippi, and I tell the Senator from Virginia, that I know my duty, and that I mean to express the opinions that I entertain, fearless of all mankind.

But, sir, as I do not choose that what I consider a mistaken representation of my sentiments in 1838 should go out, I will simply state what they were then, and what they are now.

Sir, there is not a word in that resolution that implies that any faith was pledged to the States, other than to Virginia and to Maryland, that Congress would not abolish slavery in this District. The resolution says that the agitation of the question of abolition by people living out of the District is, in its tendency, dangerous to the slave States; and that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia would be just cause of alarm, not merely to Virginia and Maryland, but to all the slave States. And why? What was it that Abolitionists then proposed? It was abolition without compensation; it was to take the slaves without paying for them. And would it not in that form have been a just cause of alarm to the other States of the Union owning property of that description? The assertion, therefore, of opinion which I made then was that, by the nature and object of the cession of the ten-miles-square by Virginia and Maryland, it could not have been anticipated by either of those States that the power conveyed to the general Government over the ten-miles-square would be so exercised as to abolish slavery within those States respectively; and, further, that slavery, continuing in Virginia and Maryland, if such an abolition were to take place in the District of Columbia, and without compensation to the slaveholder, it would be, as it undoubtedly would have been, a just cause of alarm to the owners of that description of property, wherever situated. Now, sir, that was my doctrine in 1838, and that is my doctrine still.

Sir, I do not regard the mere phraseology of the resolution. I will not substitute the word "unconstitutional" for the word "inexpedient," for I do not believe it to be unconstitutional. I cannot believe it. If a power to legislate in all cases whatever be granted to Congress, does it not comprehend the power to legislate on the subject of slavery as well as upon all other subjects? The power is there; but there is an implied faith connected with the power, resulting from the circumstances to which I have referred, imposing on Congress the obligation not to exercise the power as long as slavery in Virginia and Maryland exists. And now that Virginia has separated from the District, such abolition may not take place without the consent of the people of the District and of Maryland, and also without, what I contended for in 1838, compensation to the owners of the slaves for their property thus liberated.

I am extremely sorry to hear the Senator from Mississippi say that he requires, first, the extension of the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific, and also that he is not satisfied with that, but requires, if I understood him correctly, a positive provision for the admission of slavery south of that line. And now, sir, coming from a slave State, as I do, I owe it to myself, I owe it to truth, I owe it to the subject, to say that no earthly power could induce me to vote for a specific measure for the introduction of slavery where it had not before existed, either south or north of that line. Coming as I do from a slave State, it is my solemn, deliberate, and well-matured determination that no power, no earthly power, shall compel me to vote for the positive introduction of slavery either south or north of that line. Sir, while you reproach, and justly, too, our British ancestors for the introduction of this institution upon the continent of America, I am, for one, unwilling that the posterity of the present inhabitants of California and of New Mexico shall reproach us for doing just what we reproach Great Britain for doing to us. If the citizens of those Territories choose to establish slavery, and if they come here with constitutions establishing slavery, I am for admitting them with such provisions in their constitutions; but then it will be their own work, and not ours, and their posterity will have to reproach them, and not us, for forming constitutions allowing the institution of slavery to exist among them. These are my views, sir, and I choose to express them; and I care not how extensively or universally they are known. The honorable Senator from Virginia has expressed his opinion that slavery exists in these Territories, and I have no doubt that opinion is sincerely and honestly entertained by him; and I would say, with equal sincerity and honesty, that I believe that slavery nowhere exists within any portion of the territory acquired by us from Mexico.

SENATOR DAVIS.—The Senator from Kentucky rose with an announcement that he wanted to know my time for meeting him in argument, and I have told him that my time is now. Several times has he regretted this premature discussion; but pray, sir, who introduced it? The Senator submitted his resolutions, discussed them seriatim, and then concluded with a net speech. Are we to understand that all this was done without intending to influence opinion? Was it a mere volley of blank cartridges that he was firing, in order that he might come up under cover of the smoke, and make a charge upon us before we saw him?

The Senator has set up his own cob-house, to show how skillfully he could knock it down. It is no fabric of mine. We maintain that it is the right of the people of the South to carry this species of property to any portion of the Territories of the United States; that it rests, under the Constitution, upon the same basis as other property; but, when speaking of a compromise, it was the ultimatum I announced. It is strange that the Senator from Kentucky should be so much surprised; it certainly was not a new question with him, nor with his colleagues, with whom, on a former occasion, a similar proposition originated. It is a partial recognition of a right we claim to be coextensive with the Territories of the United States; but which we are willing, in a spirit of compromise, and in compliance with the past acquiescence of the States, to restrict by the parallel of 36 degrees 30 minutes north.

Now, this is conceding a great deal. If the line were established upon any great principle arising from climate or productions, it would be different; then the line would not extend upon the same parallel of latitude. If it were a line of temperature, then, as the isothermal line bends upward, it would go north of that parallel of latitude. It is out of respect to the past, and from anxious desire peaceably to adjust a most vexatious and dangerous question, that we agree to adopt this arbitrary line. And this compromise, upon which most of his fame rests, originated, under like circumstances, with the Senator who now with such settled purpose declares his opposition to a fair application of its principle to the present case. Then all the territory involved, that of Missouri, was slave territory; the compromise act prohibited slavery in a part of the territory. Now, according to the position of the Senator, slavery is excluded from the whole territory of California and New Mexico. What, then, would the application of the spirit of the Missouri compromise require? Clearly that in running the line the question should be put at rest by declaring that below said line slavery should be permitted. It is common property of the States, and, if it be proposed to make a division of it, fairness and future peace require that the rights and conditions of each part should be prescribed. Less than this would but narrow the ground and preserve the controversy. And, unless that compromise was founded in fraud, we expect its application in this case, where all is disputed—express provisions on both sides of the line. We cannot agree to leave the question open, especially after what has been said to-day. It is the effect and not the form which I consider it my duty to examine. What matters it whether it be under cover of the acts of the Mexican Government, or by the operation of Congressional law, that slavery is excluded? The effect is the same, under the rule the Senator from Kentucky adopts, as would result from an act of prohibition by the Congress of the United States. I can only say that whenever the Senator chooses to make his argument I shall be ready to meet it.

SENATOR CALHOUN.—I have, Senators, believed from the first that the agitation of the subject of slavery would, if not prevented by some timely and effective measure, end in disunion. Entertaining this opinion, I have on all proper occasions endeavored to call the attention of each of the two great parties which divide the country to adopt some measure to prevent so great a disaster, but without success. The agitation has been permitted to proceed, with almost no attempt to resist it, until it has reached a period when it can no longer be disguised or denied that the Union is in danger. You have thus had forced upon you the greatest and the gravest question that can ever come under your consideration: How can the Union be preserved?

To give a satisfactory answer to this mighty question, it is indispensable to have an accurate and thorough knowledge of the nature and the character of the cause by which the Union is endangered. The first question, then, is: What is it that has endangered the Union?

To this question there can be but one answer: that the immediate cause is the almost universal discontent which pervades all the States composing the southern section of the Union. This widely extended discontent is not of recent origin. It commenced with the agitation of the slavery question, and has been increasing ever since. The next question, going one step further back, is: What has caused this widely diffused and almost universal discontent?

It is a great mistake to suppose, as is by some, that it originated with demagogues, who excited the discontent with the intention of aiding their personal advancement, or with the disappointed ambition of certain politicians, who resorted to it as the means of retrieving their fortunes. On the contrary all the great political influences of the section were arrayed against excitement, and exerted to the utmost to keep the people quiet. The great mass of the people of the South were divided, as in the other section, into Whigs and Democrats. The leaders and the presses of both parties in the South were very solicitous to prevent excitement and to preserve quiet; because it was seen that the effects of the former would necessarily tend to weaken, if not destroy the political ties which united them with their respective parties in the other section. Those who know the strength of party ties will readily appreciate the immense force which this cause exerted against agitation and in favor of preserving quiet. But as great as it was, it was not sufficiently so to prevent the widespread discontent which now pervades the section. No, some cause far deeper and more powerful than the one supposed must exist to account for discontent so wide and deep. The question then recurs: What is the cause of this discontent? It will be found in the belief of the people of the Southern States, as prevalent as the discontent itself, that they cannot remain as things now are consistently with honor and safety in the Union. The next question to be considered is: What has caused this belief?

One of the causes is, undoubtedly, to be traced to the long-continued agitation of the slave question on the part of the North, and the many aggressions which they have made on the rights of the South during the time.

There is another, lying back of it, with which this is intimately connected, that may be regarded as the great and primary cause. That is to be found in the fact that the equilibrium between the two sections of the Government as it stood when the Constitution was ratified and the Government put in action has been destroyed.

On February 5 the debate was resumed.

SENATOR BENTON.—Mr. President, it has been affirmed and denied on this floor that slavery was abolished in Mexico. I am one of those who affirm its abolition; and I propose now to read some passages from Mexican law for the purpose of supporting my opinion.

[SENATOR BENTON read these passages.] I think everyone must see that slavery was abolished throughout the Mexican territory before the cession of California and New Mexico to the United States, and that slavery cannot exist there now by virtue of Mexican law. This is enough, in my opinion, to show the Wilmot proviso, in relation to these countries, to be a thing of nothing—an empty provision—a cloud without rain—unless it be a rain of blood.

Senator Calhoun, being indisposed, had put his speech in writing; it was read by Senator James M. Mason [Va.].

Senator Calhoun spoke of the growing political preponderance of the free States. Five new States would in all probability shortly be added to their number, making twenty free States to fifteen slave, for there was no prospect of an increase in the latter number.

This great increase of Senators added to the great increase of members of the House of Representatives and the electoral college on the part of the North, which must take place under the next decade, will effectually and irretrievably destroy the equilibrium which existed when the Government commenced.

Had this destruction been the operation of time, without the interference of Government, the South would have had no reason to complain; but such was not the fact. It was caused by the legislation of this Government, which was appointed as the common agent of all, and charged with the protection of the interests of and security of all. The legislation by which it has been effected may be classed under three heads. The first is that series of acts by which the South has been excluded from the common territory belonging to all of the States, as the members of the Federal Union, and which have had the effect of extending vastly the portion allotted to the Northern section, and restricting within narrow limits the portion left the South; the next consists in adopting a system of revenue and disbursements, by which an undue proportion of the burden of taxation has been imposed upon the South and an undue proportion of its proceeds appropriated to the North; and the last is a system of political measures by which the original character of the Government has been radically changed.

The Senator stated that the legislative acts to which he referred were the Ordinance of 1787, the Missouri compromise, and the Oregon act. He did not include the territory recently acquired from Mexico. If slavery were also debarred here, the North would have acquired three-fourths of the acquired domain since the formation of the nation.

Taking up the second cause of the destruction of the equilibrium between the two sections of the country, the revenue system, Senator Calhoun showed that the South paid far more revenue than the North, and received far less disbursements of it, with the result that the North was increasing in wealth and population (for this wealth attracted immigration) at the expense of the South.

The third cause of the destruction of the equilibrium he declared was the change of the Federal Republic into a consolidated democracy, "as despotic in its tendency as any absolute government that ever existed."

However, even these aggrandizements and changes might be acquiesced in by the South were not her peculiar institution [slavery] also attacked in its home.

Every portion of the North entertains views and feelings more or less hostile to it. Those most opposed and hostile regard it as a sin, and consider themselves under the most sacred obligation to use every effort to destroy it. Indeed, to the extent that they conceive they have the power, they regard themselves as implicated in the sin, and responsible for suppressing it by the use of all and every means. Those less opposed and hostile regard it as a crime, an offence against humanity, as they call it; and, although not so fanatical, feel themselves bound to use all efforts to effect the same object; while those who are least opposed and hostile regard it as a blot and a stain on the character of what they call the nation, and feel themselves accordingly bound to give it no countenance or support. On the contrary, the Southern section regards the relation as one which cannot be destroyed without subjecting the two races to the greatest calamity, and the section to poverty, desolation, and wretchedness; and accordingly they feel bound by every consideration of interest and safety to defend it.

Is it not certain that, if something decisive is not now done to arrest the agitation for the abolition of slavery, the South will be forced to choose between it and secession? Indeed, as events are now moving, it will not require the South to secede to dissolve the Union. Agitation will of itself effect it, as I shall proceed to show.

It is a great mistake to suppose that disunion can be effected by a single blow. The cords which bind these States together in one common union are far too numerous and powerful for that. Disunion must be the work of time. It is only through a long process, and successively, that the cords can be snapped, until the whole fabric falls asunder. Already the agitation of the slavery question has snapped some of the most important, and has greatly weakened all the others.

Here the Senator referred to the division of the religious denominations into Northern and Southern branches on the subject of slavery.

Parties, too, were breaking up on the issue.

If the agitation goes on, the same force, acting with increased intensity, will finally snap every cord, until nothing will be left to hold the States together except force.

He then asked: How can the Union be saved? In introducing this subject he first discussed how the Union could not be saved.

It cannot be saved by eulogies on the Union, however splendid or numerous. The cry of "Union, Union, the glorious Union!" can no more prevent disunion than the cry of "Health, health, glorious health!" on the part of the physician can save a patient lying dangerously ill. So long as the Union, instead of being regarded as a protector, is regarded in the opposite character, by not much less than a majority of the States, it will be in vain to attempt to conciliate them by pronouncing eulogies on it.

Besides, this cry of Union comes commonly from those whom we cannot believe to be sincere; it usually comes from our assailants. But we cannot believe them to be sincere; for, if they loved the Union, they would necessarily be devoted to the Constitution. It made the Union, and to destroy the Constitution would be to destroy the Union. But the only reliable and certain evidence of devotion to the Constitution is to abstain, on the one hand, from violating it, and to repel, on the other, all attempts to violate it.

But how stands the profession of devotion to the Union by our assailants, when brought to this test? Have they abstained from violating the Constitution? Let the many acts passed by the Northern States to set aside and annul the clause of the Constitution providing for the delivery up of fugitive slaves answer.

Nor can the Union be saved by invoking the name of the illustrious Southerner whose mortal remains repose on the western bank of the Potomac. He was one of us—a slaveholder and a planter. We have studied his history, and find nothing in it to justify submission to wrong. On the contrary, his great fame rests on the solid foundation that, while he was careful to avoid doing wrong to others, he was prompt and decided in repelling wrong. I trust that, in this respect, we profited by his example.

Nor can we find anything in his history to deter us from seceding from the Union, should it fail to fulfil the objects for which it was instituted, by being permanently and hopelessly converted into the means of oppressing instead of protecting us. On the contrary, we find much in his example to encourage us, should we be forced to the extremity of deciding between submission and disunion.

There existed then, as well as now, a union—that between a parent country and her ten colonies. It was a union that had much to endear it to the people of the colonies. Washington was born and grew up to manhood under that Union. He acquired his early distinction in its service, and there is every reason to believe that he was devotedly attached to it. But his devotion was a rational one. He was attached to it, not as an end, but as a means to an end. When it failed to fulfil its end, and, instead of affording protection, was converted into the means of oppressing the colonies, he did not hesitate to draw his sword, and head the great movement by which that union was forever severed, and the independence of these States established. This was the great and crowning glory of his life, which has spread his fame over the whole globe, and will transmit it to the latest posterity.

Nor can the plan proposed by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, nor that of the Administration, save the Union. I shall pass by, without remark, the plan proposed by the Senator, and proceed directly to the consideration of that of the Administration. I, however, assure the distinguished and able Senator that, in taking this course, no disrespect whatever is intended to him or his plan. I have adopted it, because so many Senators of distinguished abilities have replied to him.

The plan of the Administration cannot save the Union, because it can have no effect whatever toward satisfying the States composing the Southern section of the Union that they can, consistently with safety and honor, remain in the Union. It is, in fact, but a modification of the Wilmot proviso. It proposes to effect the same object, to exclude the South from all territory acquired by the Mexican treaty. It is well known that the South is united against the Wilmot proviso, and has committed itself by solemn resolutions to resist should it be adopted. Its opposition is not to the name, but that which it proposes to effect. That the Southern States hold to be unconstitutional, unjust, inconsistent with their equality as members of the common Union, and calculated to destroy irretrievably the equilibrium between the two sections. These objections equally apply to what, for brevity, I will call the executive proviso. There is no difference between it and the Wilmot, except in the mode of effecting the object, and in that respect I must say that the latter is much the least objectionable. It goes to its object openly, boldly, and distinctly. It claims for Congress unlimited power over the Territories, and proposes to assert it over the territories acquired from Mexico by a positive prohibition of slavery. Not so the executive proviso. It takes an indirect course, and, in order to elude the Wilmot proviso, and thereby avoid encountering the united and determined resistance of the South, it denies, by implication, the authority of Congress to legislate for the Territories, and claims the right as belonging exclusively to the inhabitants of the Territories. But to effect the object of excluding the South, it takes care, in the meantime, to let in emigrants freely from the Northern States, and all other quarters, except from the South, which it takes special care to exclude by holding up to them the danger of having their slaves liberated under the Mexican laws. The necessary consequence is to exclude the South from that territory, just as effectually as would the Wilmot proviso.

In claiming the right for the inhabitant, instead of Congress, to legislate for the Territories, in the executive proviso, it assumes that the sovereignty over the Territories is vested in the former; or, to express it in the language used in a resolution offered by one of the Senators from Texas [General Houston, now absent], they have "the same inherent right of self-government as the people in the States." The assumption is utterly unfounded, unconstitutional, without example, and contrary to the entire practice of the Government, from its commencement to the present time, as I shall proceed to show.

The recent movement of individuals in California to form a constitution and a State government, and to appoint Senators and Representatives, is the first fruit of this monstrous assumption. It was the United States who conquered California, and finally acquired it by treaty. The sovereignty of that territory, of course, is vested in them, and not in the individuals who have attempted to form a constitution and a State, without their consent.

Now, if the sovereignty over the Territories is vested in the United States—that is, in the several States composing the Union—and the power of legislating over them is expressly vested in Congress, it follows that the individuals in California who have undertaken to form a constitution and a State have usurped the sovereignty of the State and the authority of Congress, and have acted in open defiance of them both. In other words, what they have done is revolutionary and rebellious in its character, anarchical in its tendency, and calculated to lead to the most dangerous consequences. Had they acted from premeditation and design, it would have been, in fact, actual rebellion; but such is not the case. The blame lies much less upon them than upon those who have induced them to take a course so unconstitutional and dangerous. They have been led into it by language held here, and the course pursued by the executive branch of the Government.

But, it may be asked, what is to be done with California should she not be admitted? I answer, remand her back to the territorial condition, as was done in the case of Tennessee in the early stage of the Government.

Having now shown what cannot save the Union, I return to the question with which I commenced. How can the Union be saved? There is but one way by which it can with any certainty; and that is by a full and final settlement, on the principle of justice, of all the questions at issue between the two sections. The South asks for justice, simple justice, and less she ought not to take. She has no compromise to offer but the Constitution, and no concession or surrender to make. She has already surrendered so much that she has little left to surrender. Such a settlement would go to the root of the evil, and remove all cause of discontent, by satisfying the South, that she could remain honorably and safely in the Union, and thereby it would restore the harmony and fraternal feelings between the sections which existed anterior to the Missouri agitation. Nothing else can, with any certainty, finally and forever settle the questions at issue, and so terminate agitation, and save the Union.

But can this be done? Yes, easily; not by the weaker party, for it can of itself do nothing—not even protect itself—but by the stronger. The North has only to will it to accomplish it—to do justice by conceding to the South an equal right in the acquired territory, and to do her duty by causing the stipulations relative to fugitive slaves to be faithfully fulfilled—to cease the agitation of the slave question, and to provide for the insertion of a provision in the Constitution, by an amendment, which will restore to the South in substance the power she possessed of protecting herself, before the equilibrium between the sections was destroyed by the action of this Government. There will be no difficulty in devising such a provision—one that will protect the South, and which at the same time will improve and strengthen the Government, instead of impairing and weakening it.

But will the North agree to do this? It is for her to answer this question. But, I will say, she cannot refuse, if she has half the love of the Union which she professes to have, or without justly exposing herself to the charge that her love of power and aggrandizement is far greater than her love of the Union. At all events, the responsibility of saving the Union rests on the North, and not the South. The South cannot save it by any act of hers, and the North may save it without any sacrifice whatever, unless to do justice, and to perform her duties under the Constitution, should be regarded by her as a sacrifice.

It is time, Senators, that there should be an open and manly avowal on all sides as to what is intended to be done. If the question is not now settled, it is uncertain whether it ever can hereafter be; and we, as the representatives of the States of this Union, regarded as governments, should come to a distinct understanding as to our respective views, in order to ascertain whether the great questions at issue can be settled or not. If you, who represent the stronger portion, cannot agree to settle them on the broad principle of justice and duty, say so; and let the States we both represent agree to separate and part in peace. If you are unwilling we should part in peace, tell us so, and we shall know what to do, when you reduce the question to submission or resistance. If you remain silent, you will compel us to infer by your acts what you intend. In that case, California will become the test question. If you admit her, under all the difficulties that oppose her admission, you compel us to infer that you intend to exclude us from the whole of the acquired territories, with the intention of destroying irretrievably the equilibrium between the two sections. We would be blind not to perceive, in that case, that your real objects are power and aggrandizement, and infatuated not to act accordingly.

Having faithfully done my duty to the best of my ability, both to the Union and my section, throughout this agitation, I shall have the consolation, let what will come, that I am free from all responsibility.

Senator Webster replied to the arguments of Senator Calhoun.

Mr. President, I wish to speak to-day, not as a Massachusetts man, nor as a Northern man, but as an American, and a member of the Senate of the United States.

It is fortunate that there is a Senate of the United States; a body not yet moved from its propriety, not lost to a just sense of its own dignity and its own high responsibilities, and a body to which the country looks with confidence for wise, moderate, patriotic, and healing counsels. It is not to be denied that we live in the midst of strong agitations, and surrounded by very considerable dangers to our institutions of government. The imprisoned winds are let loose. The east, the west, the north, and the stormy south all combine to throw the whole ocean into commotion, to toss its billows to the skies, and to disclose its profoundest depths. I do not expect, Mr. President, to hold, or to be fit to hold, the helm in this combat of the political elements; but I have a duty to perform, and I mean to perform it with fidelity—not without a sense of the surrounding dangers, but not without hope. I have a part to act, not for my own security or safety, for I am looking out for no fragment upon which to float away from the wreck, if wreck there must be, but for the good of the whole, and the preservation of the whole; and there is that which will keep me to my duty during this struggle, whether the sun and the stars shall appear or shall not appear for many days. I speak to-day for the preservation of the Union. "Hear me for my cause." I speak to-day, out of a solicitous and anxious heart, for the restoration to the country of that quiet and that harmony which make the blessings of this Union so rich and so dear to us all. These are the topics that I propose to myself to discuss; these are the motives, and the sole motives, that influence me in the wish to communicate my opinions to the Senate and the country; and if I can do anything, however little, for the promotion of these ends I shall have accomplished all that I desire.

Senator Webster then related the circumstances which made it imperative that California have an organized government—chiefly the great rush of settlers to the gold country.

It became a very important subject for legislative consideration and legislative decision to provide a proper territorial government for California, yet differences of opinion in the counsels of the Government prevented the establishment of any such territorial government for California at the last session of Congress. Under this state of things, the inhabitants of San Francisco and California—then amounting to a great number of people—in the summer of last year thought it to be their duty to establish a local government. Under the proclamation of General Riley, the people chose delegates to a convention. That convention met at Monterey. They formed a constitution for the State of California, and it was adopted by the people of California in their primary assemblages. Desirous of immediate connection with the United States, its Senators were appointed and Representatives chosen, who have come hither, bringing with them the authentic constitution of the State of California; and they now present themselves, asking in behalf of their State that the State may be admitted into this Union as one of the United States. This constitution, sir, contains an express prohibition against slavery or involuntary servitude in the State of California. It is said, and I suppose truly, that of the members who composed that convention some sixteen were natives, and had been residents of the slaveholding States, and about twenty-two were from the non-slaveholding States, and the remaining ten members were either native Californians, or old settlers in that country. This prohibition against slavery, it is said, was inserted with entire unanimity.

And it is this circumstance, sir, the prohibition of slavery by that convention, which has contributed to raise—I do not say it has wholly raised—the dispute as to the propriety of the admission of California into the Union under this Constitution. It is not to be denied, Mr. President, whatever reasons were assigned at the commencement of the late war with Mexico, that it was prosecuted for the purpose of the acquisition of territory. And, as the acquisition was to be south of the line of the United States, in warm climates and countries, it was naturally expected by the South that whatever acquisitions were made in that region would be added to the slaveholding portion of the United States. Events have turned out as was not expected, and that expectation has not been realized; and therefore some degree of disappointment and surprise has resulted. In other words, it is obvious that the question which has so long harassed the country, and at times very seriously alarmed the minds of wise and good men, has come upon us for a fresh discussion—the question of slavery in these United States.

Now, sir, upon the general nature, and character, and influence of slavery there exists a wide difference between the Northern portion of this country and the Southern. It is said, on the one side, that, if not the subject of any injunction or direct prohibition in the New Testament, slavery is a wrong; that it is founded merely in the right of the strongest; and that it is an oppression, like all unjust wars—like all those conflicts by which a mighty nation subjects a weaker nation to their will; and that slavery, in its nature, whatever may be said of it in the modifications which have taken place, is not in fact according to the meek spirit of the Gospel. It is not kindly affectioned. It does not "seek another's and not its own." It does not "let the oppressed go free." These are sentiments that are cherished, and recently with greatly augmented force, among the people of the Northern States. It has taken hold of the religious sentiment of that part of the country, as it has more or less taken hold of the religious feelings of a considerable portion of mankind. The South, upon the other side, having been accustomed to this relation between the two races all their lives, from their birth; having been taught in general to treat the subjects of this bondage with care and kindness—and I believe, in general, feeling for them great care and kindness—have yet not taken this view of the subject which I have mentioned. There are thousands of religious men, with consciences as tender as any of their brethren at the North, who do not see the unlawfulness of slavery, and there are more thousands, perhaps, that, whatsoever they may think of it in its origin, and as a matter depending upon natural right, yet take things as they are, and, finding slavery to be an established relation of the society where they live, can see no way in which—let their opinions on the abstract question be what they may—it is in the power of the present generation to relieve themselves from this relation. And, in this respect, candor obliges me to say that I believe they are just as conscientious, many of them—and, of the religious people, all of them—as they are in the North, in holding different opinions.

Senator Webster here referred to the division of religious denominations on slavery. He had read the proceedings of the Methodist Episcopal separation, and had seen no real ground for it. It was the nature of religious men to become warm in such matters, and to go to extremes.

These persons are disposed to mount upon some duty as a war-horse, and to drive furiously on, and upon, and over all other duties that may stand in the way.

There are men who, in times of that sort, and disputes of that sort, deal with morals as with mathematics, thinking what is right may be distinguished from what is wrong with the precision of an algebraic equation. They have, therefore, none too much charity toward others who differ with them. They are apt, too, to think that nothing is good but what is perfect, and that there are no compromises or modifications to be made in submission to difference of opinion, or in deference to other men's judgment. If their perspicacious vision enables them to detect a spot on the face of the sun, they think that a good reason why the sun should be struck down from heaven. They prefer the chance of running into utter darkness to living in heavenly light, if that heavenly light be not absolutely without any imperfection. These are impatient men—too impatient al-against it as the South, and the reason is, I suppose, because there was much less at the North; and the people did not see, or think they saw, the evils so prominently as they were seen, or thought to be seen, at the South.

The Convention reflected the judgment and sentiments of the great men of the South. The question was how to deal with it, and how to deal with it as an evil? Well, they came to this general result. They thought that slavery could not be continued in the country if the importation of slaves were made to cease, and therefore they provided that, after a certain period, the importation might be prevented by the act of the new Government. Twenty years was proposed by some gentlemen—a Northern gentleman, I think—and many of the Southern gentlemen opposed it as being too long. Mr. Madison, especially, was somewhat warm against it. He said it would bring too much of this mischief into the country to allow the importation of slaves for such a period, because we must take along with us, in the whole of this discussion, when we are considering the sentiments and opinions in which this constitutional provision originated, that the conviction of all men was that, if the importation of slaves ceased, the white race would multiply faster than the black race, and that slavery would therefore gradually wear out and expire. It may not be improper here to allude to that—I had almost said celebrated—opinion of Mr. Madison. You observe, sir, that the term slave, or slavery, is not used in the Constitution. The Constitution does not require that "fugitive slaves" shall be delivered up. It requires that "persons bound to service in one State, and escaping into another, shall be delivered up." Mr. Madison opposed the introduction of the term slave, or slavery, into the Constitution; for he said he did not wish to see it recognized by the Constitution of the United States of America that there could be property in men. Now, it was in the summer of 1787, the very time when the convention in Philadelphia was framing this Constitution, that the Congress in New York was framing the Ordinance of 1787. They passed that ordinance on the 13th of July, 1787, at New York, the very month—perhaps the very day—on which these questions about the importation of slaves, and the character of slavery, were debated in the convention at Philadelphia. And, so far as we can now learn, there was a perfect concurrence of opinion between these respective bodies; and it resulted in this ordinance of 1787, excluding slavery, as applied to all the territory over which the Congress of the United States had jurisdiction, and that was all the territory northwest of the Ohio.

ways to give heed to the admission of St. Paul, "that we are not to do evil that good may come"—too impatient to wait for the slow progress of moral causes in the improvement of mankind. They do not remember that the doctrines and the miracles of Jesus Christ have in eighteen hundred years converted only a small portion of the human race; and among the nations that are converted to Christianity they forget how many vices and crimes, public and private, still prevail, and that many of them—public crimes especially, which are offenses against the Christian religion—pass without exciting particular regret or indignation. Thus wars are waged, and unjust wars. I do not deny that there may be just wars. There certainly are, but it was the remark of an eminent person, not many years ago, on the other side of the Atlantic, that it was one of the greatest reproaches to human nature that wars were sometimes necessary. The defence of nations sometimes causes a war against the injustice of other nations.

Now, sir, in this state of sentiment, upon the general nature of slavery, lies the cause of a great portion of those unhappy divisions, exasperations, and reproaches which find vent and support in different parts of the Union.

And now let us consider, sir, what was the state of sentiment, North and South, in regard to slavery at the time this Constitution was adopted. Now, it will be found, sir, if we will carry ourselves by historical research back to that day, and ascertain men's opinions by authentic records still existing among us, that there was no great diversity of opinion between the North and the South upon the subject of slavery; and it will be found that both parts of the country held it equally an evil—a moral and political evil. It will not be found that, either at the North or at the South, there was much, though there was some, invective against slavery as inhuman and cruel. The great ground of objection to it was political; that it weakened the social fabric; that, taking the place of free labor, society was less strong and labor was less productive; and, therefore, we find, from all the eminent men of the time, the clearest expression of their opinion that slavery was an evil. And they ascribed it, not without truth, and not without some acerbity of temper and force of language, to the injurious policy of the mother country, who, to favor the navigator, had entailed these evils upon the colonies. The eminent men of the South held that slavery was an evil, a blight, a blast, a mildew, a scourge, and a curse. There are so terms of reprobation of slavery so vehement in the North of that day as in the South. The North was not so much excited

An honorable member, whose health does not allow him to be here to-day—

A SENATOR.—He is here. (Referring to Mr. Calhoun.)

MR. WEBSTER.—I am very happy to hear that he is—may he long be in health and the enjoyment of it to serve his country—said the other day that he considered this ordinance as the first in the series of measures calculated to enfeeble the South, and deprive them of their just participation in the benefits and privileges of this Government. He says, very properly, that it was done under the old Confederation, and before this Constitution went into effect; but my present purpose is only to say, Mr. President, that it was done with the entire and unanimous concurrence of the whole South.

But soon a change began at the North and the South, and a severance of opinion soon showed itself—the North growing much more warm and strong against slavery, and the South growing much more warm and strong in its support. Sir, there is no generation of mankind whose opinions are not subject to be influenced by what appears to them to be their present, and emergent, and exigent interest. I impute to the South no particularly interested view in the change which has come over her. I impute to her certainly no dishonest view. All that has happened has been natural.

Senator Webster ascribed the change in Southern sentiment to the sudden uprising and growth of the cotton industry.

The age of cotton became a golden age for our Southern brethren. It gratified their desire for improvement and accumulation at the same time that it excited it. The desire grew by what it fed upon, and there soon came to be an eagerness for other territory—a new area or new areas for the cultivation of the cotton crop; and measures were brought about, somewhat rapidly, one after another, under the lead of Southern men at the head of the Government—they having a majority in both branches of the Government—to accomplish their ends. In 1802, in pursuit of the idea of opening a new cotton region, the United States obtained a cession from Georgia of the whole of her Western territory, now embracing the rich and growing State of Alabama. In 1803 Louisiana was purchased from France, out of which the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Missouri have been framed, as slaveholding States. In 1819 the cession of Florida was made, bringing another cession of slaveholding property and territory. Sir, the honorable member from South Carolina thought he saw in certain operations of the Government, such as the manner of collecting the revenue, and the tendency of those measures to promote emigration into the country, what accounts for the more rapid growth of the North than the South. He thinks they were not the operation of time, but of the system of government established under this Constitution. That is a matter of opinion. To a certain extent it may be so; but it does not seem to me that, if any operation of the Government could be shown in any degree to have promoted the population, and growth, and wealth of the North, it is much more sure that there are sundry important and distinct operations of the Government, about which no man can doubt, tending to promote, and which absolutely have promoted, the increase of the slave interest and the slave territory of the South. Allow me to say that it was not time that brought in Louisiana; it was the act of men. It was not time that brought in Florida; it was the act of men. And, lastly, sir, to complete those acts of men who have contributed so much to enlarge the area and the sphere of the institution of slavery, Texas—great, and vast, and illimitable Texas—was added to the Union, as a slave State, in 1845; and that, sir, pretty much closed the whole chapter and settled the whole account.

And I now say, sir, as the proposition upon which I stand this day, and upon the truth and firmness of which I intend to act until it is overthrown, that there is not, at this moment, within the United States, or any Territory of the United States, a single foot of land, the character of which, in regard to its being free-soil territory or slave territory, is not fixed by some law, and some irrepealable law, beyond the power of the action of this Government.

Now, as to California and New Mexico, I hold slavery to be excluded from those Territories by a law even superior to that which admits and sanctions it in Texas—I mean the law of nature—of physical geography—the law of the formation of the earth. That law settles forever, with a strength beyond all terms of human enactment, that slavery cannot exist in California or New Mexico. This country is fixed for freedom to as many persons as shall ever live there by as irrepealable, and a more irrepealable, law than the law that attaches to the right of holding slaves in Texas; and I will say further that, if a resolution, or a law, were now before us to provide a territorial government for New Mexico, I would not vote to put any prohibition into it whatever. The use of such a prohibition would the persons whose slaves escape from them? None at all—none at all. Wherever I go and whenever I speak on the subject—and when I speak here I desire to speak to the whole North—I say that the South has been injured in this respect, and has a right to complain; and the North has been too careless of what I think the Constitution peremptorily and emphatically enjoins upon it as a duty.

Complaint has been made against certain resolutions that emanate from legislatures at the North, and are sent here to us, not only on the subject of slavery in this District, but sometimes recommending Congress to consider the means of abolishing slavery in the States. I should be sorry to be called upon to present any resolutions here which could not be referable to any committee or any power in Congress, and, therefore, I should be unwilling to receive from the legislature of Massachusetts any instructions to present resolutions expressive of any opinion whatever on the subject of slavery, as it exists at the present moment in the States, for two reasons: because, first, I do not consider that the legislature of Massachusetts has anything to do with it; and, next, I do not consider that I, as her representative here, have anything to do with it. Sir, it has become, in my opinion, quite too common; and, if the legislatures of the States do not like that opinion, they have a great deal more power to put it down than I have to uphold it. I will simply say this: if there be any matter of interest pending in this body while I am a member of it in which Massachusetts has an interest of her own not adverse to the general interest of the country, I shall pursue her instructions with gladness of heart and with all the efficiency which I can bring to it. But, if the question be one which affects her interest and at the same time affects the interests of all other States, I shall no more regard her political wishes or instructions than I would regard the wishes of a man who might appoint me an arbitrator or referee to decide some question of important private right and who might instruct me to decide in his favor. If ever there was a government upon earth, it is this Government; if ever there was a body upon earth, it is this body, which should consider itself as composed by agreement of all, appointed by some, but organized by the general consent of all, sitting here under the solemn obligations of oath and conscience to do that which they think is best for the good of the whole.

The Senator then discussed the Abolition societies. Though he knew that thousands of their members were be idle as it respects any effect it would have upon the Territory, and I would not take pains to reaffirm an ordinance of nature, nor to reenact the will of God. And I would put in no Wilmot proviso for the purpose of a taunt or a reproach. I would put into it no evidence of the votes of superior power, to wound the pride, even whether a just pride, a rational pride, or an irrational pride—to wound the pride of the gentlemen who belong to the Southern States. I propose to inflict no such wound upon anybody, unless something essentially important to the country and efficient to the preservation of liberty and freedom is to be effected.

The Senator then discussed the mutual recrimination of North and South as tending to alienate the sections. Passing by as matters of dispute the other complaints of the South which had been enumerated by Senator Calhoun, he admitted that one complaint was just, namely, the Northern State legislatures had tried to evade the constitutional obligation to return fugitive slaves.

I have always thought that the Constitution addressed itself to the legislatures of the States themselves, or to the States themselves. When it is said that a person escaping into another State and becoming, therefore, within the jurisdiction of that State shall be delivered up, it seems to me the import of the passage is that the State itself, in obedience to the Constitution, shall cause him to be delivered up. But, when the subject, some years ago, was before the Supreme Court of the United States, the majority of the judges held that the power to cause fugitives from service to be delivered up was a power to be exercised under the authority of this Government. I do not know, on the whole, that it may not have been a fortunate decision. My habit is to respect the result of judicial deliberations and the solemnity of judicial decisions. But, as it now stands, the business of seeing that these fugitives are delivered up resides in the power of Congress and the national judicature, and my friend at the head of the Judiciary Committee has a bill on the subject now before the Senate, with some amendments to it, which I propose to support, with all its provisions, to the fullest extent. And I put it to all the sober and sound minds at the North as a question of morals and a question of conscience: What right have they, in all their legislative capacity, or any other, to endeavor to get round this Constitution, to embarrass the free exercise of the rights secured by the Constitution to honest, well-meaning persons, he deplored the results of their agitation as wholly mischievous, defeating, indeed, their professed purpose. Instead of winning the South to their views, they stirred up resentment in that quarter against them until it was now forbidden to speak in any way against slavery, whereas before the abolition societies were organized the subject was freely discussed.

Let any gentleman who doubts of this recur to the debates in the Virginia House of Delegates in 1832 and he will see with what freedom a proposition, made by John Randolph, for the gradual abolition of slavery was discussed in that body. Every one spoke of slavery as he thought; very ignominious and disparaging names and epithets were applied to it. The debates in the House of Delegates on that occasion, I believe, were all published. They were read by every colored man who could read, and, if there were any who could not read, those debates were read to them by others. At that time Virginia was not unwilling nor afraid to discuss this question and to let that part of her population know as much of it as they could learn. That was in 1832. These abolition societies commenced their course of action in 1835. It is said—I do not know how true it may be—that they sent incendiary publications into the slave States; at any event, they attempted to arouse, and did arouse, a very strong feeling; in other words, they created great agitation in the North against Southern slavery. Well, what was the result? The bonds of the slaves were bound more firmly than before; their rivets were more strongly fastened. Public opinion, which, in Virginia, had begun to be exhibited against slavery and was opening out for the discussion of the question, drew back and shut itself up in its castle. I wish to know whether anybody in Virginia can now talk as Mr. Randolph, Governor McDowell, and others talked there openly and sent their remarks to the press in 1832. We all know the fact, and we all know the cause, and everything that this agitating people have done has been, not to enlarge but to restrain, not to set free but to bind faster the slave population of the South.

It is my firm opinion that, within the last twenty years, as much money has been collected and paid to the abolition societies, abolition presses, and abolition lecturers as would purchase the freedom of every slave—man, woman, and child—in the State of Maryland, and send them all to Liberia. I have no doubt of it. But I have yet to learn that the benevolence of these abolition societies has at any time taken that particular turn. [Laughter.]

Again, sir, the violence of the press is complained of. The press violent! Why, sir, the press is violent everywhere. There are outrageous reproaches in the North against the South, and there are reproaches in not much better taste in the South against the North. Sir, the extremists of both parts of this country are violent; they mistake loud and violent talk for eloquence and for reason. They think that he who talks loudest reasons the best. And this we must expect when the press is free, as it is here—and I trust always will be—for, with all its licentiousness and all its evil, the entire and absolute freedom of the press is essential to the preservation of government on the basis of a free Constitution. Wherever it exists there will be foolish paragraphs and violent paragraphs in the press, as there are, I am sorry to say, foolish speeches and violent speeches in both Houses of Congress. In truth, sir, I must say that, in my opinion, the vernacular tongue of the country has become greatly vitiated, depraved, and corrupted by the style of our congressional debates. [Laughter.] And, if it were possible for our debates in Congress to vitiate the principles of the people as much as they have depraved their taste, I should cry out "God save the Republic!"

There are also complaints of the North against the South. The first and gravest is that the North adopted the Constitution, recognizing the existence of slavery in the States, and recognizing the right, to a certain extent, of representation of the slaves in Congress, under a state of sentiment and expectation which do not now exist; and that, by events, by circumstances, by the eagerness of the South to acquire territory and extend their slave population, the North finds itself, in regard to the influence of the South and the North, of the free States and the slave States, where it never did expect to find itself when they entered the compact of the Constitution. They complain, therefore, that, instead of slavery being regarded as an evil, as it was then, an evil which all hoped would be extinguished gradually, it is now regarded by the South as an institution to be cherished and preserved and extended—an institution which the South has already extended to the utmost of her power by the acquisition of new territory. Well, then, passing from that, everybody in the North reads; and everybody reads whatsoever the newspapers contain; and the newspapers, some of them—especially those presses to which I have alluded—are careful to spread about among the people every reproachful sentiment and cultivate a better feeling and more fraternal sentiments between the South and the North.

Mr. President, I should much prefer to have heard from every member on this floor declarations of opinion that this Union should never be dissolved than the declaration of opinion that, in any case, under the pressure of any circumstances, such a dissolution was possible. I hear with pain, and anguish, and distress the word secession, especially when it falls from the lips of those who are eminently patriotic and known to the country and known all over the world for their political services. Secession! Peaceable secession! Sir, your eyes and mine are never destined to see that miracle. The dismemberment of this vast country without convulsion! The breaking up of the fountains of the great deep without ruffling the surface! Who is so foolish—I beg everybody's pardon—as to expect to see any such thing? Sir, he who sees these States now revolving in harmony around a common center and expects to see them quit their places and fly off without convulsion, may look the next hour to see the heavenly bodies rush from their spheres and jostle against each other in the realms of space without producing the crush of the universe. There can be no such thing as a peaceable secession. Peaceable secession is an utter impossibility. Is the great Constitution under which we live here—covering this whole country—is it to be thawed and melted away by secession as the snows on the mountain melt under the influence of a vernal sun—disappear almost unobserved, and die off? No, sir! no, sir! I will not state what might produce the disruption of the States; but, sir, I see it as plainly as I see the sun in heaven—I see that disruption must produce such a war as I will not describe in its twofold characters.

Peaceable secession! peaceable secession! The concurrent agreement of all the members of this great Republic to separate! A voluntary separation with alimony on one side and on the other. Why, what would be the result? Where is the line to be drawn? What States are to secede? What is to remain American? What am I to be—an American no longer? Where is the flag of the Republic to remain? Where is the eagle still to tower? or is he to cower, and shrink, and fall to the ground? Why, sir, our ancestors—our fathers, and our grandfathers, those of them that are yet living among us with prolonged lives—would rebuke and reproach us; and our children, and our grandchildren would cry out: Shame upon us! if we, of this generation, should dishonor these ensigns of the power of the Government and the harmony of the Union, which is every day felt uttered by any Southern man bearing at all against the North—everything that is calculated to exasperate, to alienate; and there are many such things, as everybody will admit, from the South, or some portion of it, which are spread abroad among the reading people; and they do exasperate, and alienate, and produce a most mischievous effect upon the public mind at the North. An honorable member from Louisiana addressed us the other day on this subject. I suppose there is not a more amiable and worthy gentleman in this chamber, nor a gentleman who would be more slow to give offence to anybody, and he did not mean in his remarks to give offence. But what did he say? Why, sir, he took pains to run a contrast between the slaves of the South and the laboring people of the North, giving the preference in all points of condition, and comfort, and happiness, to the slaves of the South. The honorable member doubtless did not suppose that he gave any offence, or did any injustice. He was merely expressing his opinion. But does he know how remarks of that sort will be received by the laboring people of the North? Why, who are the laboring people of the North? They are the North. They are the people who cultivate their own farms with their own hands—freeholders, educated men, independent men. And what can these people think when so respectable and worthy a gentleman as the member from Louisiana undertakes to prove that the absolute ignorance, and the abject slavery, of the South is more in conformity with the high purposes and destinies of immortal, rational human beings than the educated, the independent free laborers of the North?

There is a more tangible and irritating cause of grievance at the North. Free blacks are constantly employed in the vessels of the North, generally as cooks and stewards. When the vessel arrives these free colored men are taken on shore by the police or municipal authority, imprisoned and kept in prison till the vessel is again ready to sail. This is not only irritating but exceedingly inconvenient in practice, and seems altogether unjustifiable and oppressive. The mission of Samuel Hoar, of Massachusetts, some time ago to South Carolina was a well-intended effort to remove this cause of complaint. The North thinks such imprisonment illegal and unconstitutional; as the cases occur constantly and frequently, they think it is a great grievance.

Now, sir, so far as any of these grievances have their foundation in matters of law they can be redressed, and ought to be redressed; and, so far as they have foundation in matters of opinion, in sentiment, in mutual crimination and recrimination, all that we can do is to endeavor to allay the agitation among us with so much joy and gratitude. What is to become of the army? What is to become of the navy? What is to become of the public lands? How is each of the thirty States to defend itself? I know, although the idea has not been stated distinctly, there is to be a Southern confederacy. I do not mean, when I allude to this statement, that any one seriously contemplates such a state of things. I do not mean to say that it is true, but I have heard it suggested elsewhere that that idea has originated in a design to separate. I am sorry, sir, that it has ever been thought of, talked of, or dreamed of in the wildest flights of human imagination. But the idea must be of a separation, including the slave States upon one side and the free States on the other. Sir, there is not—I may express myself too strongly perhaps—but some things, some moral things, are almost as impossible as other natural or physical things; and I hold the idea of a separation of these States—those that are free to form one government and those that are slaveholding to form another—as a moral impossibility. We could not separate the States by any such line if we were to draw it. We could not sit down here to-day and draw a line of separation that would satisfy any five men in the country. There are natural causes that would keep and tie us together, and there are social and domestic relations which we could not break if we would, and which we should not if we could. Sir, nobody can look over the face of this country at the present moment—nobody can see where its population is the most dense and growing—without being ready to admit, and compelled to admit, that, ere long, America will be in the valley of the Mississippi.

Well, now, sir, I beg to inquire what the wildest enthusiast has to say on the possibility of cutting off that river and leaving free States at its source and its branches and slave States down near its mouth? Pray, sir—pray, sir, let me say to the people of this country that these things are worthy of their pondering and of their consideration. Here, sir, are five millions of freemen in the free States north of the River Ohio: can anybody suppose that this population can be severed by a line that divides them from the territory of a foreign and an alien government down somewhere, the Lord knows where, upon the lower banks of the Mississippi? What will become of Missouri? Will she join the arrondissement of the slave States? Shall the man from the Yellowstone and the Platte be connected in the new republic with the man who lives on the southern extremity of the Cape of Florida? Sir, I am ashamed to pursue this line of remark. I dislike it—I have an utter disgust for it. I would rather hear of natural blasts and mildews, war, pestilence, and famine than to hear gentlemen talk of secession. To break up! to break up this great Government! to dismember this great country! to astonish Europe with an act of folly such as Europe for two centuries has never beheld in any government! No, sir; no, sir! There will be no secession. Gentlemen are not serious when they talk of secession.

And now, Mr. President, instead of speaking of the possibility or utility of secession, instead of dwelling in these caverns of darkness, instead of groping with those ideas so full of all that is horrid and horrible, let us come out into the light of day; let us enjoy the fresh air of liberty and union; let us cherish those hopes which belong to us; let us devote ourselves to those great objects that are fit for our consideration and our action; let us raise our conceptions to the magnitude and the importance of the duties that devolve upon us; let our comprehension be as broad as the country for which we act, our aspirations as high as its certain destiny; let us not be pigmies in a case that calls for men.

Never did there devolve on any generation of men higher trusts than now devolve upon us for the preservation of this Constitution, and the harmony and peace of all who are destined to live under it. Let us make our generation one of the strongest, and the brightest, links in that golden chain which is destined, I fully believe, to grapple the people of all the States to this Constitution for ages to come. It is a great popular constitutional Government, guarded by legislation, by law, by judicature, and defended by the whole affections of the people. No monarchical throne presses these States together; no iron chain of despotic power encircles them; they live and stand upon a government popular in its form, representative in its character, founded upon principles of equality, and calculated, we hope, to last forever. In all its history it has been beneficent; it has trodden down no man's liberty; it has crushed no State. Its daily respiration, its liberty and patriotism; its yet youthful veins are full of enterprise, courage, and honorable love of glory and renown. It has received a vast addition of territory. Large before, the country has now, by recent events, become vastly larger. This Republic now extends with a vast breadth across the whole continent. The two great seas of the world wash the one and the other shore. We realize on a mighty scale the beautiful description of the ornamental edging of the buckler of Achilles—

House by his Northern political opponents as well as by the statesmen of the South.

On April 3 John Bell [Tenn.] submitted in the Senate certain resolutions along the line of those of Senator Clay, but more favorable to the South, and more specific, especially in the matter of the return of fugitive slaves. They were referred to the Committee of Thirteen if it should be appointed.

Finally on April 18, 1850, the question was put to form the Committee of Thirteen and decided in the affirmative by a vote of 30 to 22. Henry Clay [Ky.] was appointed chairman of the committee. The other members were representative equally of the North and the South.

On May 8 Senator Clay presented the report of the committee, of which the following is a digest. In the first recommendation alone the committee was unanimous.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THIRTEEN

1. In the case of a new State to be carved out of Texas, the initiative to be taken by the State and the question of slavery therein settled by a vote of the inhabitants. Constitutionality of the admission of States (including Texas) in the Louisiana Purchase not to be inquired into, the country having acquiesced in former admissions.

2. Irregularity of California's actions in applying for admission (such as the formation of a constitution) to be overlooked for similar reasons and her application to be granted.

3. New Mexico and Utah to be organized as Territories.

4. The admission of California into the Union and the territorial organization of New Mexico and Utah to be combined in one bill because of the common condition of acquisition by the United States, their common boundaries being fixed by the act, and because of the fact that certain Senators would not vote for the admission of the State except upon condition of the organization of the Territories. "Every measure," says the report, "may contain objectionable features to some." The question to be decided is, whether the good the measure contains is of greater amount and neutralizes anything exceptionable in it. "As nothing human is perfect, for the sake of that harmony so desirable in such a confederacy as this, we must be reconciled to secure as much as we can of what we wish."

"Now the broad shield complete the artist crowned,
With his last hand, and poured the ocean round;
In living silver seemed the waves to roll,
And beat the buckler's verge, and bound the whole."

On motion of Senator Henry S. Foote [Miss.] the Clay resolutions were, on March 12, 1852, referred to a Committee of Thirteen, who were instructed to "mature some scheme of compromise for the adjustment of all pending questions growing out of the institution of slavery."

The question of this reference was warmly debated, developing into a discussion of all the aspects of slavery. While interesting, the discussion brought forward no new arguments and is here omitted.

The debate on the Clay compromise was interrupted by the death of Senator Calhoun on March 31, 1850. Extended tributes were paid to him in the Senate and the

5. Omission in the joint bill of the Wilmot proviso on the one hand and any provision for the introduction of slavery on the other, the proviso being practically needless and its insertion an affront to the South, and the introduction of slavery being impracticable and an affront to the people of California who have declared against it. Recommendation that, in future legislation of this character the question of slavery be left to the people of the region affected, and so remove a source of discord from the Union. "As for California," says the report, "far from feeling her sensibility affected by her being associated with other kindred measures—she ought to rejoice and be highly gratified that, in entering into the Union, she may have contributed to the tranquillity and happiness of the great family of States of which, it is to be hoped, she may one day be a distinguished member."

6. Proposal that Texas relinquish territorial claims made by New Mexico for a pecuniary consideration made by the United States Government, the Government reimbursing itself by the sales of these relinquished lands. This boundary question to be incorporated in the joint bill aforesaid.

7. Amendment of the existing law (of 1793) more effectually to provide for the recovery of fugitive slaves, and, at the same time, to prevent abuses in such recovery. The report says:

"The text of the Constitution is quite clear: 'No person held to labor or service in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on the claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.'"

"It is now well known and incontestable that citizens in slaveholding States encounter the greatest difficulty in obtaining the benefit of this provision of the Constitution. The attempt to recapture a fugitive is almost always a subject of great irritation and excitement, and often leads to most unpleasant, if not perilous, collisions. An owner of a slave, it is quite notorious, cannot pursue his property, for the purpose of its recovery, in some of the States, without imminent personal hazard. This is a deplorable state of things which ought to be remedied. The law of 1793 has been found wholly ineffectual and requires more stringent enactments. There is, especially, a deficiency in the number of public functionaries authorized to afford aid in the seizure and arrest of fugitives. Various States have declined to afford aid and cooperation in the surrender of fugitives from labor, as the committee believe, from a misconception of their duty arising under the Constitution of the United States. It is true that a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States has given countenance to them in withholding their assistance. But the committee cannot but believe that the intention of the Supreme Court has been misunderstood. They cannot but think that that court merely meant that laws of the several States which created obstacles in the way of the recovery of fugitives were not authorized by the Constitution, and not that State laws affording facilities in the recovery of fugitives were forbidden by that instrument.

"The non-slaveholding States, whatever sympathies any of their citizens may feel for persons who escape from other States, cannot discharge themselves from an obligation to enforce the Constitution of the United States. All parts of the instrument being dependent upon, and connected with, each other ought to be fairly and justly enforced. If some of the States may seek to exonerate themselves from one portion of the Constitution, other States may then endeavor to evade the performance of other portions of it; and thus the instrument, in some of its most important provisions, might become inoperative and invalid.

"In all cases of the arrest, within a State, of persons charged with offences; in all cases of the pursuit of fugitives from justice from one State to another State; in all cases of extradition provided for by treaties between foreign powers—the proceeding uniformly is summary. It has never been thought necessary to apply in cases of that kind the forms and ceremonies of a final trial. And, when that trial does take place, it is in the State or country from which the party has fled, and not in that in which he has found refuge. By the express language of the Constitution, whether the fugitive is held to service or labor or not, is to be determined by the laws of the State from which he fled; and, consequently, it is most proper that the tribunals of that State should expound and administer its own laws. If there have been any instances of abuse in the erroneous arrest of fugitives from service or labor the committee have not obtained knowledge of them. They believe that none such have occurred, and that such are not likely to occur. But, in order to guard against the possibility of their occurrence, the committee have prepared, and herewith report, a section to be added to the fugitive bill now pending before the Senate. According to this section, the owner of a fugitive from service or labor is, when practicable, to carry with him to the State in which the person is found, a record, from a competent tribunal, adjudicating the facts of elopement and slavery, with a general description of the fugitive."

The committee submitted a bill for the form of trial of fugitives in the States whence they had fled. In concluding comment on the Fugitive Law, it said:

"If, in its practical operation, it shall be found insufficient, and, if no adequate remedy can be devised for the restoration to their owners of fugitive slaves, those owners will have a just title to indemnity out of the treasury of the United States."

8. Slavery should not be abolished in the District of Columbia because, without entering in the question of the power of Congress to do so, this is inexpedient, as it would excite alarm in the slave States. Besides, the number of slaves in the District is rapidly diminishing. The slave trade, however, should be abolished in the District.

Bills were presented by the committee to execute its several recommendations.

The anti-slavery sentiment in the country was outraged by the abandonment, on the part of some of the Northern members of the committee, of the Wilmot proviso. The indignation was especially directed against Daniel Webster, who had voted with the Southern Senators on this point. The anti-slavery press charged him with treason to the cause of freedom, and John Greenleaf Whittier, rather in sorrow than in anger, wrote a poem upon his defection entitled "Ichabod," i. e., "The glory has departed."

The debate on the "Omnibus Bill," as the compromise measure of the Committee of Thirteen was now generally termed, was resumed in the Senate on July 22. Henry Clay made a long and eloquent plea in favor of its passage. In the course of his remarks he inferentially alluded to Representative R. Barnwell Rhett [S. C.] as a "disunionist." This was replied to by Senator R. W. Barnwell [S. C.], who drew from Senator Clay the affirmation that if Mr. Rhett put into execution the threats to which he (Senator Clay) had alluded he would be a traitor.

The forebodings of Senator Clay that the "Omnibus Bill" would not be passed were thoroughly realized. One by one it was shorn of its members until all that remained of it was the provision for the territorial organization of Utah. It was received in this form on July 31 by roars of laughter from the Senate. On August 7 the bill fixing the boundaries of Texas was passed in the Senate, and on August 12 the bill to admit California into the Union (by a vote of 34 to 18). A number of Southern Senators entered a protest against

"NO HIGHER LAW"
From the collection of the New York Historical Society

the conditions of the California bill on the ground that "an odious discrimination was made against the property of the fifteen slaveholding States, who are thus deprived of the equality which the Constitution manifestly designs" and that the precedent was thereby established for the future admission of States into the Union with a virtual exclusion of the rights of Southern citizens to carry their slaves thither. This protest was laid on the table on August 15 by a vote of 22 to 19.

On the same day the bill organizing New Mexico was passed in the Senate by a vote of 27 to 10. The bill organizing Utah was also passed. The House concurred in these bills with an amendment that no citizen in the Territories "should be deprived of his life, liberty, or property except by judgment of his peers or the laws of the land." On September 9 this amendment was accepted by the Senate, and the bills received the signature of Millard Fillmore, who had succeeded to the presidency on the death of Zachary Taylor, July 9, 1850.

EARLY in the session of 1849-50 the Judiciary Committee of the Senate reported a bill on the subject of the return of fugitive slaves. After various substitutions and amendments the bill was passed late in the session by a vote of 27 to 12, more than 20 Senators dodging the issue by refraining from voting.

As approved by President Fillmore September 18, 1850, the bill consisted of ten sections, an abstract of which is as follows: (1) the powers of judges under the act of 1793 were now given to United States commissioners; (2) the territorial courts were also to have for issuing a certificate in any State or Territory to which the slave had fled.

The passage of the act, says Alexander Johnston in his "American Political History," gave a sudden and great impetus to the search for fugitive slaves in the North which was accompanied by various revolting circumstances, brutality in the captors, bloodshed by the captors or captured, or both, and attempted suicide to avoid arrest. From many localities in the North, persons who had long been residents were suddenly seized and taken South as fugitive slaves; and these latter arrests were more efficacious than the former in rousing Northern opposition to the law, for they seemed to show that not merely the execution but the principle of the law was unjust and illegal. Margaret Garner's attempted murder of her children in Ohio to save them from slavery,¹ and Anthony Burns's arrest in Boston,² were the cases which made most noise at the time.

The political consequence of the passage of the Fugitive Slave law of 1850 was the demand, first by the Free Soil party, and then by many members of the Republican party, for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave law, which the South considered irrepealable, as part of a compromise. The success of the Republican party in 1860 by a vote of the North was therefore construed by secessionists at the South as a final refusal by the North to enforce the Compromise of 1850, and was the principal excuse for secession.

The Fugitive Slave law was not finally repealed until June 28, 1864.

PERSONAL LIBERTY LAWS

In order to nullify the act within a few years after its passage many Northern States passed "Personal Liberty" laws.

These laws generally prohibited the use of the State's jails for detaining fugitives; provided State officers under various names throughout the State to act as counsel for persons alleged to be fugitives; se-the power of appointing such commissioners; (3) all United States courts were so to enlarge the number of commissioners as to give facilities for the arrest of fugitive slaves; (4) commissioners were to have concurrent jurisdiction with United States judges in giving certificates to claimants and ordering the removal of fugitive slaves; (5) United States marshals and deputies were required to execute writs under the act, the penalty for refusal being a fine of $1,000, the marshal being further liable on his bond for the full value of any slave escaping from his custody "with or without the assent" of the marshal or his deputies; the commissioners or officers appointed by them were empowered to call the bystanders to help execute writs, and all good citizens were required to aid and assist when required; (6) on affidavit before any officer authorized to administer an oath, United States courts or commissioners were to give the claimant a certificate and authority to remove his fugitive slave whence he had escaped; in no case was the testimony of the fugitive to be admitted in evidence, and the certificate, with the seal of the court, was to be conclusive evidence of the claimant's title, thus cutting off any real benefit of the writ of habeas corpus from the fugitive; (7) imprisonment for six months, a fine of $1,000 and civil damages of $1,000 to the claimant were to be the punishment for obstructing an arrest, attempting a rescue, or harboring a fugitive after notice; (8) commissioners were to be paid fees of $10 when a certificate was granted, and of $5 when their decision was in favor of the alleged fugitive; fees of other officers were to follow the rules of the court; (9) on affidavit by the claimant that he apprehended a rescue, the marshal was not to surrender the fugitive to the claimant at once, but was first to take him to the State whence he had fled, employing any assistance necessary to overcome the rescuing force; (10) any claimant, by affidavit before any court of record in his own State or territory, might obtain a record with a general description of the fugitive, and an authenticated copy of such record was to be conclusive evidence, on proof of the identity of the fugitive, cured to all such persons the benefits of habeas corpus and trial by jury; required the identity of the fugitive to be proved by two witnesses; forbade State judges and officers to issue writs or give any assistance to the claimant, and imposed a heavy fine and imprisonment for the crime of forcibly seizing or representing as a slave any free person with intent to reduce him to slavery.

The Fugitive Slave law and the Personal Liberty laws, says Professor Johnston, together show plainly that the Compromise of 1850 was far worse than labor lost. It gave the South a law to which it had no title; even R. Barnwell Rhett, in the South Carolina secession convention, declared that he had never considered the Fugitive Slave law constitutional. It thus provoked the passage of the equally unconstitutional Personal Liberty laws in the North. Each section, ignoring the other's complaints, exhausted its own patience in calling for a redress which neither was willing to accord first.

SUPPRESSION OF SLAVE TRADE IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

With the Fugitive Slave bill was passed that for the suppression of the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

In his annual message at the opening of Congress in December, 1850, President Fillmore declared himself in favor of the enforcement of the Fugitive Slave law.

Upon this declaration and the high officer who made it Joshua R. Giddings [O.] spoke as follows in the House of Representatives on December 9:

A NEW ALIGNMENT OF PARTIES ON SLAVERY

JOSHUA R. GIDDINGS, M. C.

No man had ever come into the presidential chair who so unceremoniously cast aside and repudiated the important pledges of his friends and his party. No public man of high standing, from the free States, has so suddenly and so boldly abjured the cause of freedom and, before the world, pledged fealty to the slave power, saving and excepting his Secretary of State [Daniel Webster], whose counsels he appears to have adopted.

Mr. Giddings charged the President with partiality toward the South in the execution of the laws. He had not removed nor even reprovved Federal officers in that section who had violated the mails, seeking to suppress anti-slavery literature.

He sees the free colored citizens of the free States seized, imprisoned, and sold into bondage by Southern men. He witnesses this transcendent outrage upon the laws, upon the Constitution, and upon humanity in perfect silence; he does not even hint at their existence. He has seen the agents of Massachusetts driven by mob violence from South Carolina and Louisiana when sent there to sustain the legal rights of the citizens of that State now held in slavery. He knew that no Northern State nor individual could rescue those citizens from the chains of servitude. Upon outrages more aggravated than any that have ever occurred under this Government he makes no comment.

Sir, the House and the country must see that the only sympathy exhibited in the message is for slavery; he has none for freedom.

Mr. Chairman, our opposition to the fugitive law is based upon the soundest principles of ethics and of law, as well as the dictates of the common sense of mankind. While the Southern men are thus seizing Northern freemen, enslaving and brutalizing them, they turn round and call on us to leave our employments, give chase, arrest, and return their fugitive slaves. While violating our national compact in its most vital features, they ask us not merely to observe and keep our stipulations, but to go far beyond our covenants to uphold their slavery.

Now, sir, these Southern men have no claim whatever on us to observe the compact, while they disregard and trample upon it. Such are the dictates of law, and of justice, and the teachings of common sense. A compliance with such demand would constitute us the mere subsidiaries, the appendages of Southern slavery. This feeling has thus far been suppressed by our intelligent people, hoping that Congress would relieve them from the position in which they have long been placed. If this fugitive law be kept in force, and Congress shall exert its power and influence to degrade our people, I, sir, will not predict the consequences. They may be read in our past history. One thing may be regarded as admitted truth—while Northern freemen are held in Southern chains the people of the free States will not arrest nor return fugitive slaves.

The President, continued Mr. Giddings, assures us that the power of the army and navy will be used to shoot down Northern freemen if necessary to enforce this law. This attempt at menace is unworthy of a President. It will be fruitless. He may send his troops—his Swiss guards of slavery; he may drench our free land with blood; he may entitle himself to the appellation of a second "Haynau,"¹ but he will never compel them to obey that law. They will obey every constitutional enactment; but they will discard and repudiate this fugitive bill.

The President should have learned ere this that public sentiment, with an enlightened and patriotic people, is stronger than armies or navies; that he himself is but the creature of the people's will—their servant—elected to execute their purposes. In the enactment of this law, their feelings were not consulted, their honor was disregarded, and their wishes were treated with scorn. Sir, a large portion of the Northern people were not represented in this body at the passage of that law. Their servants fled from this hall, and left the interests, the rights, and the honor of their constituents to be disposed of by slaveholders and their obsequious allies. This law "was conceived in sin," and literally "brought forth in iniquity." It is due to our Southern friends that we should inform them distinctly that the law cannot and will not be enforced. Our people, sir, know what constitutes law. This enactment I call a law merely for convenience, because our language furnishes no proper term in which to characterize it. It has the form, but is entirely destitute of the spirit—the essence of law. It commands the perpetration of crimes, which no human enactment can justify. In passing it, Congress overstepped the limits of civil government, and attempted to usurp powers which belong only to God. In this attempt to involve our people in crimes forbidden by inspiration, by every impulse of humanity, and to command one portion of the people to wage a war upon another, Congress was guilty of tyranny unexampled.

Mr. Giddings declared that the law would be a "dead letter," like many other acts of Congress. It was already ineffectual. Of 15,000 fugitives not 10 had been returned.

Julius Jakob, Baron von Haynau (1786-1853), an Austrian general, had made his name a synonym of cruelty by his rigorous acts in suppressing revolution.

When Mr. Jefferson came into power, he found men imprisoned under the sedition law, which he deemed unconstitutional. He did not hesitate to pardon them. But Mr. Fillmore pledges himself to exert his power to punish every man who assists his fellow man to regain his liberty. Such, sir, is the difference between Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Fillmore.

If there be any one feature of the Constitution, which the whole history of its adoption has made plain, it is that slavery is a State institution, over which Congress has no control—with which this Federal Government has no legitimate powers to interfere. We, sir, of the North, will not be constrained, even by your fugitive law, to interfere with it. The slavery of Virginia belongs to her. If she possess the power and the disposition to uphold it, we cannot put it down or abolish it. If she sees fit to abolish it, we have no power to interfere to sustain it.

Neither the law of 1793, nor the Constitution, contemplated the organization of Northern freemen into a constabulary force for catching negroes. Nor did it give the master a guard and assistance to carry back his slave at the expense of the nation. Such provisions could never have been approved by Washington, who signed the law of 1793, nor by his associates who had aided in framing the Constitution, and who also voted for that law. They understood their constitutional duties.

The extent of our powers consists in prohibiting the people from interfering between the master and slave. And this fugitive law is unconstitutional to the full extent to which it attempts to exert its powers in aid of slavery. The appointment of officers, making it their duty to issue process, to pursue the slave, to arrest, to carry him back, and the paying expenses from the treasury, all are unconstitutional acts. They, sir, interfere with slavery, and are repugnant to the whole spirit of the Constitution. The President unintentionally condemns these acts. I condemn them, the country condemns them, humanity condemns them.

All who read this message must see that the only interference with slavery which the President professes to deprecate is that which tends to loosen the chains of bondage; he appears to have no objection to that interference which rivets them closer. Could he have believed that the intelligent freemen of the North would fail to detect the palpable contradiction between that portion of the message which deprecates interference with slavery, and that which urges the continuance of this law, which was enacted for the very purpose of interfering in support of that institution?

But this law goes further; it not only attempts to strike down God's law, which commands us "to feed the hungry," but it attempts to convert every freeman of the North into a savage. If a fugitive from oppression reaches my door amid the ragings of the storm, half clad, and benumbed with cold, fainting and weary, sick and in distress, and asks to warm himself by my fire, this law interferes, and forbids me, under heavy pains and penalties, to comply with his request. If I obey the law, I must drive him from my door, to perish with hunger and cold. If I receive him to my habitation, warm him by my fire—if I feed him, and give him drink, and restore him, so that he pursues his journey and escapes, I am subjected, under this law, to a fine of one thousand dollars and to six months' imprisonment. This law the President approves, and advises us to continue it in force. I reply, in his own language: "Every citizen who truly loves the Constitution will resolutely and firmly resist" the interference which this law enjoins.

Sir, our people will continue to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to visit the sick, and to relieve the oppressed; and no interference of this fugitive law will prevent this compliance with the dictates of our religion, with that law which came from God himself, and which no enactment of slaveholders and doughfaces can repeal or nullify. I speak for no one but myself and constituents; others will choose whether to obey God or the oppressors of mankind; but, as for us, we will obey that higher law of kindness, benevolence, and humanity, which was implanted in the breast of every human being, and written upon the hearts and consciences of mankind by the finger of our Creator.

The common law holds him who aids in a murder as guilty as he who strikes the knife to the heart of the victim. And will anyone suppose that he who assists in arresting and sending a fugitive slave to torture and death will be less guilty than he under whose lash the victim expires?

Sir, we will not commit this crime. No! The freemen of Ohio will never turn out to chase the panting fugitive; they will never be metamorphosed into bloodhounds, to track him to his hiding-place, and seize and drag him out, and deliver him to his tormentors. They may be shot down; the cannon and bayonet and sword may do their work upon them; they may drown the fugitives in the blood of freemen; but never will freemen stoop to the degradation of catching slaves.

Let no man tell me there is no higher law than this fugitive bill. We feel there is a law of right, a law of justice, of freedom, implanted in the breast of every intelligent human being, that bids him look with scorn upon this mis-called law.

The speaker then referred to persons, including ministers of the gospel, who claimed that there was no moral guilt in obeying the law, since the responsibility rested with Congress.

I hesitate not to say that, for its barbarity, that law is unequalled in the history of civilized legislation. Will preachers of righteousness tell them to submit, to let the slave dealer rivet the chains upon the father, tear the mother from her children, and doom her to a life of wretchedness? Will such preachers advise the daughter peacefully to surrender herself into the hands of slave hunters and submit to a life of pollution and shame? And will such men be called promoters of holiness and purity? I trust there are few such teachers in this American land. Sir, all good men must detest this law. God has no attribute which will permit him to look upon it except with abhorrence.

Yet the President assures us that it ought not to be repealed; that it should be kept in force; that these outrages should and ought to continue; that he regards this law as a final settlement of the slave question; and that it is wrong farther to agitate the subject. Vain advice. Agitation will never cease until the law ceases. While such crimes are authorized by statute the American people will not keep silence.

The public meetings of the people of all parties throughout the free States, the spirited resolutions which they have sent forth, are but feeble manifestations of the popular mind. Throughout the North, where free schools have been encouraged, where newspapers circulate and intelligence is disseminated, there public sentiment is loud in condemnation of this law. This feeling is increasing and extending, and rolling forward, and gaining strength and impetus, and will continue to do so until that law shall be repealed and numbered among the things that were.

There is no lingering doubt, no difficulty, no obscurity resting on the party which supports this Administration. All the Whigs throughout the country (and I speak it with some degree of feeling, for I once had the pleasure of acting with them when they had principles; then we avowed and acted upon the doctrines I have stated to-day)—all the Whigs throughout the country must now feel that their unity is gone. They see that the the Clay compromise, to agree upon a united policy for the South, reassembled with delegates from Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee. It declared that all the evils anticipated by the South had been realized by the Clay compromise, and therefore it recommended that the South abstain from social, commercial, and political intercourse with the North until Southern rights were rendered safe. It proclaimed that if such a time should not come, and the North, by its violations of the Constitution, endangered the peace and existence of the South, it would have "the right, as States, there being no common arbiter, to secede from the Federal Union."

Governor J. A. Quitman [Miss.] convoked the State legislature for November 18 with the intention of laying before it a proposition for secession. On this date, however, Senator Henry S. Foote [Miss.] addressed a mass meeting at Jackson, the State capital, upholding the compromise so persuasively that the meeting decided in favor of the measure. This was the beginning of a Union party in the State which held in check the "Fire-Eaters," as the secessionists were called. Similar Union parties arose in the other Southern States, and came together in a constitutional Union party, which over-weighed the secessionist sentiment.

In the North efforts were also making to form a Union party on the basis of the compromise. Such an organization in New York came within 258 votes of electing Horatio Seymour governor, Washington Hunt, the Whig candidate, being elected.

On January 22, 1851, Alexander H. Stephens, a Representative from Georgia, drew up a manifesto on the slavery question which was signed by 44 Senators and Representatives, Senator Henry Clay [Ky.] at the head. It inveighed against the renewal at any time of the sectional quarrel, declaring that the subscribers would not support any candidate for a Federal office who did not condemn further agitation of the slavery question.

On February 15, 1851, at Boston a fugitive slave by name Shadrach, while the question of his extradition under the Fugitive Slave law was under discussion be-party has departed from its doctrines and principles, and has descended, step by step, from its former position until the remnant has literally become a slave-catching party.

I, sir, rejoice at the prospect of seeing every public man, and every elector of the nation, take his position either for freedom or for slavery. The President has come out boldly and manfully on the side of oppression, in favor of compelling the people of the North to become the catchers of Southern slaves. He calls on his friends to take position with him. They will do so. We shall soon have but two political parties. One will contend for the emancipation of the free States and this Government from the control of the slave power; to restore vitality to the Constitution; to give that instrument effect; to maintain the rights of all the States under it; to secure all men under our exclusive jurisdiction in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and happiness. With Gouverneur Morris, and those who assisted in framing the Constitution, that party "never will concur in upholding domestic slavery." With Mr. Gerry, "while they have nothing to do with it in the States, they will lend no sanction to it." With Mr. Sherman, they "can see no more propriety in seizing and surrendering a fugitive slave than a horse."

With these framers of the Constitution the party of freedom will stand. These principles they will maintain and carry out; they will separate and purify themselves from the sin and the shame of slavery; they will redeem this government from its support; they will leave it within the States where it exists. The judgment and conscience of the people are with us! they know our doctrines to be correct. The popular heart beats for freedom. Party prejudices are giving way. Truth is doing its legitimate work. A great political revolution is going forward. No partisan influence can stay its progress. The history of the last few months and years must bear to every reflecting mind a consciousness that the principles of justice, of righteousness, of humanity must triumph. The moral sentiment of the nation demands the repeal of those acts of Congress which authorize and enjoin the commission of crimes. They will be repealed, and the Government will be redeemed from its present position; and its laws and influence will be exerted for the benefit, for the elevation, of man.

THE NASHVILLE CONVENTION

On November 14, 1850, a Southern convention which had met at Nashville, Tenn., during the discussion on fore a commissioner, was forcibly taken from custody by a crowd of negroes, set at liberty, and smuggled safely into Canada. Two days later Henry Clay [Ky.] introduced a resolution in the Senate asking the President for information as to what measures he had taken to enforce the act, and whether, in his opinion, additional legislation on the subject was necessary. On February

PRACTICAL ILLUSTRATION OF THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW
From the collection of the New York Historical Society

18 President Fillmore, by the advice of Daniel Webster, Secretary of State, issued a proclamation commanding all military and civil officers, and entreating all citizens, to aid in executing the law. This was followed (February 21) by a special message to Congress in which he pledged himself to use all his constitutional powers to this end. An extended discussion of the message followed in the Senate, participated in by the following supporters of the President: Henry Clay [Ky.], Stephen A. Douglas [Ill.], and John M. Berrien [Ga.]; leading speakers in opposition were John P. Hale [N. H.], Salmon P. Chase [O.], R. Barnwell Rhett

[S. C.], and Jefferson Davis [Miss.]. As a striking illustration of the fact that politics like misery sometimes makes strange bedfellows it will be noted that the two extremes of American statesmen on the slavery question, Southern "Fire-Eaters" such as Rhett and Davis, and Northern anti-slavery men, such as Hale and Chase, here joined in denouncing the Fugitive Slave law as unconstitutional.

STRANGE BEDFELLOWS—"FIRE-EATERS" AND ABOLITIONISTS

DEBATE ON THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW, SENATE, FEBRUARY 21-24, 1851

SENATOR HALE.—I am glad that the document which has been read has been sent to us for one reason, and but one. It satisfies me most conclusively that the President thinks and feels pretty sure that he is rendering his Administration ridiculous, and that his proclamation has done it; and he sent us a long labored essay, as I understand it, to vindicate the propriety of what cannot be vindicated. The idea of the President of the United States issuing a formal proclamation, calling upon all the naval and military force of the Government to hold themselves in readiness, and all officers and good citizens everywhere, to defend this great Republic against a handful of negroes in Boston! I do not know how it strikes others, but to my mind it is ridiculous in the extreme; and I am determined, as far as I am concerned, I will have no part nor lot in it.

SENATOR CLAY.—What is the aim of the Senator? To consider this mob as an isolated affair, as an affair of the two or three hundred negroes only. Is there any other man in the Senate who believes that it originated among these negroes? Do we not all know the ramified means which are employed by the Abolitionists openly, by word and by print everywhere, to stimulate these negroes to acts of violence, recommending them to arm themselves and to slay, murder, and kill anybody in pursuit of them in order to recover and call them back to the duty and service from which they had escaped?

The proclamation is not aimed solely at the miserable negroes, who are without the knowledge and without a perfect consciousness of what became them or what was their duty. They are urged on and stimulated by speeches, some of which are made on this floor and in the House of Representatives, and by prints which are scattered broadcast throughout the whole country.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW

cision swept the whole of this legislation from the statute books. Then, of course, it became impossible to reclaim fugitives. The decision of the Supreme Court made it impossible, and I believed then, and I believe now, that that decision practically expunged the fugitive servant clause from the Constitution.

And now, sir, what is the particular transaction to which our attention is invoked by the Senator from Kentucky? What is this nodus Deo vindice dignus?¹ Why, sir, in Massachusetts, in the city of Boston, it so happened the other day that an individual claimed as a fugitive slave was arrested and taken before a commissioner. In the progress of the investigation fifteen or twenty colored people lingered about the door. These persons, it seems, formed and executed, upon the spot and at the moment, the purpose of rescuing the prisoner. They burst open the door, took the man out, and set him at liberty. There was no organized mob—no general concert of action—the whole affair was confined to the few immediate participants.

Well, sir, what is there strange or unusual in a rescue by force from legal custody? Such infractions of law occur not unfrequently, and in every State. Does it not seem ridiculous to fulminate proclamations and legislation against a few negroes upon an occasion like this? Surely something more than this must be designed. The proclamation and the contemplated legislation must be intended to operate upon the public sentiment of the country, to subjugate the people to the execution of the law. There can be no practical legislation except in two directions. We may provide for the erection of jails; to which no person could object, since Massachusetts has denied, as she had an undoubted right to deny, the use of her prisons for the confinement of persons arrested under national laws. Were there not existing provisions in the statute books authorizing marshals, in such circumstances, to hire temporary places of confinement? We may go further and authorize the President to call out the militia. But I ask Senators to consider where that will end. Call out the militia! March troops to Boston! You cannot prevent the occurrence of such cases as that at Boston by all the military force in the world. You cannot suppress the spirit of the people, unless you are prepared to establish, and the people are ready to receive, a military despotism. Governor Gage tried the experiment of a proclamation upon the people of Boston some seventy-five years ago. It resulted, not in the suppression of public sentiment, but in a revolution. The proclamation of President Fillmore will not, indeed, lead to any out-

The proclamation, then, has higher and greater aims. It aims at the maintenance of the law; it aims at putting down all those who would put down the law and the Constitution, be they black or white.

SENATOR CHASE.—Sir, it seems to me somewhat remarkable that the very Senator [Mr. Clay] who has most vehemently denounced agitation and agitators should himself have furnished the occasion of almost every debate on slavery topics during this session. And yet peace and quiet and harmony were promised us. I have never believed, I do not believe, and, unless the future developments shall convince me of error, I never shall believe that the measures to which the sanction of this body was given at the last session will be productive of quiet and harmony. We have been told here to-day that those measures in the series which the South approved were passed by Southern votes, and those which received the approbation of the North by Northern votes. Well, sir, are quiet and harmony to be expected when the parties who are to form the compromise are neither of them satisfied with its terms? If each party rejects that portion of the compromise which offends its particular section, how can it be considered as a settlement? Sir, it is no settlement. It has none of the attributes of a settlement. This very fugitive slave law, to which the attention of the Senate has now been called, will, of itself, produce more agitation than any other which has ever been adopted by Congress.

Mr. President, here in my place I opposed the passage of this fugitive act. I opposed it for the reason, among others, because I believed that the obligations which the Constitution imposed in respect to fugitives from labor devolved upon the States. I agree with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] that the clause relating to fugitives from service creates "a federal obligation." And I concur with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Butler] in the opinion that it constitutes "a compact between the States." It is a compact to be executed by the States, just as the other compacts in the same article are to be executed in good faith, but each State is to judge of the extent of its own obligations, and of the particular legislation required to fulfill them. Now, sir, let us refer to the state of things some twelve years ago. From the ocean almost to the base of the Rocky Mountains stretched an unbroken chain of State legislation providing for the reclamation of escaping servants. This being the state of affairs, the Supreme Court, in the case of Prigg against Pennsylvania, decided that the States have no constitutional power to legislate upon the subject. That de-break; but I feel quite sure that it can do no good. Sir, the ordinary authorities and processes are entirely adequate to every such case as that which has occurred; and it will be useless, and much worse than useless, in my judgment, to clothe the President with any such extraordinary powers as seem to be contemplated by the advocates of this reference. I shall not, however, object to the reference proposed. Let the committee act; and, if Senators think fit to waste any more time of the session upon this matter, let us have their report and another debate. I desire to see, and the country will desire to see, how far it is proposed to go, not in the execution of law by its ordinary processes and officers, but in this strange attempt to suppress discussion, to prevent agitation, to restore peace, tranquillity, and harmony to the country, by the employment of military force!

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—The Senator from Ohio refers to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Prigg vs. the State of Pennsylvania, and says that that decision practically expunged from the Constitution of the United States the clause in relation to the surrender of fugitives from labor. I presume the Senator does not mean that the Supreme Court of the United States intended to expunge it. I presume he does not mean that anything they have said in their decision does expunge it. I presume he does not mean that that decision is in conflict with that provision of the Constitution of the United States. But I understand him to mean that, if it could be held that the Congress of the United States had no right to legislate upon the subject, and that therefore the power was reserved exclusively to the States, the free States of this Union would not execute the law. I understand him to mean that while the Constitution of the United States requires every member of a legislature in every State in the Union to take an oath to support that Constitution; while no man can be a judge, a justice of the peace, a constable, a sheriff, or any other officer under a State government without first taking an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, yet when his constituents—the legislature of his State—have elected him to this body, they may be so recreant to their duties under the Constitution, so false to their God, as to vary from their oath in order to violate the Constitution of the country. That is what I understand him to mean.

SENATOR CHASE.—The decision in the case of Prigg vs. the State of Pennsylvania denies to the legislatures of the States the power to legislate upon this subject. What does the Senator mean when he talks about a State legislature being recreant to its public duty and to God, when it simply declines to exercise a power which the decision of the Supreme Court denies to it? I say that, when that decision denied to the legislatures of the States the power to execute this article of the Constitution, it swept from the statute book all State legislation upon the subject; and, inasmuch as it then devolved upon Congress to carry into effect this power, and as those laws must be carried into effect, if at all, by the power and officers of the general Government, it would be, in my judgment, impracticable to execute them so as to give them full effect. I did not intimate, and never intimated, that there would be any organized opposition, publicly sanctioned, to the law; but, in the midst of a reluctant community, every man knows you cannot practically execute a Federal law, such a law as this is, unaided by the officers of the general Government. And, therefore, because that decision devolved upon Congress the duty of legislation which it denied to the States, it did, in my judgment, practically expunge the clause from the Constitution. I respect the judges of the Supreme Court as highly as any man. I believe that they decided the case as they believed the Constitution required. I think, however, and I know that very many intelligent citizens of the slave States concur in the opinion, that the decision was, in its practical effect upon the right of reclamation, an extremely unfortunate one for parties interested in that right.

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—The Senator says that decision practically nullifies the fugitive provision in the Constitution of the United States. How does it practically nullify it? That decision declares that it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to pass laws for carrying into effect that provision of the Constitution. If the Senator had obeyed that decision, and had obeyed the Constitution of the United States according to it, he would have been here the advocate of the fugitive law instead of its enemy, for that would have been his duty under the decision to which he refers. But that decision goes further. It says that the Constitution is imperative, conferring the right to reclaim the slave; that the master has a right to go and reclaim him, and that no citizen has a right to obstruct him. Then how could that decision make that clause of the Constitution a dead letter? How could it expunge that clause from the Constitution, unless the Senator means to intimate that there are men in this country who are prepared to disregard the Constitution—who are prepared to disregard the laws of the land. That decision says that Congress must pass a law to carry the clause of the Constitution into effect. It says that every citizen is that they advised it in this particular instance; but I say that any negro who came into possession of speeches made in our presence during the last session would have felt himself authorized and justified, by the express direction of men high in authority, to go and set the Constitution and the laws at defiance. These negroes have only done what their white confederates have prompted them to do. The negro has been put forward as the active instrument, while the instigators had not the moral courage to show themselves in the front rank. When these trials shall come on, when the majesty of the law shall be asserted, when the judgment of the court shall be pronounced, I trust it will fall upon the conspirators themselves; upon the leading, distinguished white men who put them up to it, instead of upon the ignorant, simple-minded, and abused tools and instruments that they use to carry out their designs.

SENATOR BERRIEN.—Sir, if the resistance to this law shall still continue, and the people of the free States shall turn a deaf ear to remonstrances uttered in no spirit of menace and with no feelings of hostility, but with a sincere desire to cultivate and cherish those kindly relations which ought to exist between States thus intimately associated—if these agitations shall continue, and shall result (in the language of the people of Georgia) “in the disruption of every tie which binds her to the Union,” in the destruction of our constitutional charter, and the Union of which it is the guaranty—then, sir, I have to say that the people of Georgia will stand acquitted of all participation in this outrage upon the principles of regulated liberty—this utter prostration of the cherished hopes of the votaries of freedom throughout the world. Giving expression to the feelings of my constituents, I say, to the people of the free States, the fate of the Union is in your hands; uttering their deliberate opinion and adopting their language, I say, “upon the faithful execution of the Fugitive Slave law by the proper authorities depends the preservation of our much-loved Union.”

SENATOR RHETT.—Sir, the law is not always a law. There is no lawyer who does not know that. A law, to have its practical effect, must move in harmony with the opinions and feelings of the community where it is to operate. In this case no one can doubt that the feeling of the whole and entire North—whatever may be their submission to what they may consider to be the supreme law of the land—is opposed to the institution of slavery and opposed to this law. Now, you may multiply officers as much as you please; you may make every ship a prison; you may make every custom house a guard-room; you bound to aid in its enforcement. If the Senator, and those who act with him, would obey that decision, the fugitives from labor would certainly be sent back according to the Constitution. When the Senator says they will not, he casts an imputation upon the people of the free States of this Union that they disregard the Constitution, disregard their oath to support it, disregard the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and that they will take the law into their own hands and raise the standard of rebellion against the Federal Government. That is what I understand to be the direct and legitimate consequences of the argument which he has made, and it was against that I intended to make my protest. I believe it to be a calumny upon the free States of this Union to say that their sons are not prepared to perform every obligation under the Constitution. I do not believe that the free States of this Union ever sent, or ever will send, four Senators to this Chamber who claim that there is a “law higher” than the Constitution which authorizes them to commit perjury to their God and treason to their country by disobeying the Constitution which they have sworn to support.

I must follow the Senator a few steps further. He can see no necessity for the proclamation of the President. I will not argue that point. He looks upon the matter of the rescue of a fugitive at Boston as an ordinary and a trivial transaction. I do not; and the reason I do not regard it in that light is this: It is well known that there has been a systematic organization throughout many of the free States of this Union to evade the obligations of the Constitution of the United States and to prevent the enforcement of the laws of the United States in relation to fugitive slaves. This organization has been general throughout most of the States, although it does not embrace one in a hundred of the citizens of those States. But it has men of talent, men of genius, men of energy and of daring and of desperate purpose at its head; and the opposition to this fugitive law has been a combined and concerted action. It is in the nature of a conspiracy against the Government. It is a conspiracy to violate the supreme law of the land, to the intent that it shall not be obeyed. I say, therefore, that these conspirators are responsible for all that any of their number may do in resistance to this law. The doctrine of confederates applies to them. Sir, I hold white men now within the range of my sight responsible for the violation of the law at Boston. It was done under their advice, under their teaching, under their sanction, under the influence of their speeches. I do not mean may, in all your great central points, make every effort you can for the purpose honestly of enforcing the law; nay, you may have a large majority in all the free States in favor of its enforcement; and yet, if there be a formidable minority that determine upon the defeat of the operation of the law, they can defeat it, and they will defeat it. The recovery of a fugitive slave is not merely the case of a person coming into court. It is not merely a case in which the law should be enforced by courts. The fugitive slave may be concealed or sworn out of court; a thousand artifices and expedients may be resorted to by which the slaveholder will be unable to recapture his slave or the slave, when regained, will be rescued. Although the Government may be perfectly honest in its determination to enforce the law, although you may legislate with the utmost rigor, yet, after all, the statutes may be nothing more than so much waste paper, of no use but to deceive those who are willing to be deceived. As my honorable colleague very correctly said the other day, out of fifteen thousand slaves at the North—and I have seen a statement myself putting the number at thirty thousand—how many have been recaptured? Some fifteen have been taken in eight or nine months; and in every case in which there was any dispute it cost the master more than the worth of the slave.

It is on an examination of these facts that I have come to the conclusion that this law cannot and will not be so enforced as practically to secure the rights of the South. With this conviction I have looked most carefully into this matter since it arose here in debate; and I have come to the conclusion that, from the beginning of the legislation of Congress on this whole subject to this day, we of the South have been wronged and have been made to abandon a better and more efficient remedy which the Constitution provides.

Every man in the free States must be bound, as a party to the constitutional compact, to deliver up to him his slave on his mere “claim.” This is the great, efficient remedy provided in the Constitution for the recovery of fugitive slaves; and, the claim being made, it rested with the State or the State authorities to do one of two things—“deliver up” the slave or pay for him.

As a substitute—and an exclusive substitute—for this peaceable and more efficient redress under the Constitution, Congress has usurped the power of legislating upon this subject. It has undertaken to thrust the powers of the general Government into the matter and secure to us our fugitive slaves.

Sir, I protest against this doctrine. I protest against this usurpation on the part of Congress. It is fatal to the rights of the South. I maintain that, by the Constitution, we have the faith of the States as sovereigns to a compact with us; and that by that compact the government of every free State, every man in every free State, is bound, morally and constitutionally, to aid in the recovery and restoration of our fugitive slaves.

But Congress has determined otherwise, and the Supreme Court has determined otherwise. I have great respect, personally, for the judges of that court. I believe them to be able and upright; but they are men—very fallible men; and I cannot but remember that, in all times, the judiciary of a country has always been on the side of the Government.

I hold in my hand a compendium of their decisions on this subject and their reasons sustaining them. I will not name the judges delivering the decisions, but quote simply the decisions themselves.

"It cannot be doubted," says the court, "that the Constitution requires the delivery of the fugitive 'on claim' of the master; and the natural inference certainly is that the National Government is clothed with appropriate authority and functions to enforce it." This is very cool. It claims power by nature for the general Government—a new source of authority, certainly. I should say that, as the Constitution does not even mention Congress, much less the National Government, the National Government has nothing to do with it. The decision goes on: "The fundamental principle applicable to all cases of this sort would seem to be that, where the end is required, the means are given." Certainly no one will dispute this position. But the question is, has any power over the end (the recovery of fugitive slaves in a State) been given to Congress by the Constitution? "The clause relating to fugitive slaves is found in the National Constitution, and not in that of any State." Here is a reason as original as it is profound. Where should any of the terms of agreement between the States be found but in their constitutional compact? Did the constitution of any nation ever contain its compacts with other nations? How absurd, then, to attempt to argue that because the States did not, because they could not, insert into their separate constitutions their compact concerning fugitive slaves, that therefore Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over it!

"It might well be deemed an unconstitutional exercise of the power of interpretation to insist that the States are bound to provide means to carry into effect the duties of the National Government, nowhere delegated or intrusted to them by the Constitution. On the contrary, the natural, if not the necessary, conclusion is that the National Government, in the absence of all possible provisions to the contrary, is bound, through its own proper departments, legislative, executive, or judicial, as the case may require, to carry into effect all the rights and duties imposed upon it by the Constitution."

Here again the whole question is begged. It is taken for granted that it is the duty of the general Government to enforce the recovery of fugitive slaves. The learned judge declares the powers of the "National Government," not from any specified grants in the Constitution, but "in the absence of all provisions to the contrary." He proceeds:

"If this be so, it would seem, upon just principles of construction, that the legislation of Congress, if constitutional, must supersede all State legislation upon the subject, and, by necessary implication, prohibit it. For if Congress have a constitutional power to regulate a particular subject, and they actually regulate it in a given manner, and in a certain form, it cannot be that the State legislatures have the right to interfere. Where Congress have an exclusive power over a subject it is not competent for State legislation to interfere."

Here is the doctrine by which Congress not only possesses the power of legislating on the subject of fugitive slaves, but all legislation on the part of the States is prohibited. The same doctrine is reiterated in another case:

"The right to seize and retake fugitive slaves, and the duty to deliver them up, in whatever State of the Union they may be found, is, under the Constitution, recognized as an absolute, positive right and duty, pervading the whole Union with an equal and supreme force, uncontrolled and uncontrollable by State sovereignty or State legislation."

State sovereignty, which alone, under the Constitution, according to its plain purport, had anything to do with the rendition of fugitive slaves, is thus arbitrarily put aside; and State legislation, the only efficient means of enforcing their recovery, is prohibited.

Sir, I know very well that it will be said that these few remarks tend to support the abolitionists; and I should not at all be surprised if I should consequently be denounced by some of the papers of the country, not very far from Washington, as having a very close understanding with the abolitionists. Such imputations are to be expected. He who would be useful as a statesman must be prepared, as the only efficient means of vindication, to act down and live down all imputations on his motives or policy. I think the abolitionists have their way, according to the Constitution as it is construed and administered. I do not think they would be very unwilling that the existing laws should continue without being materially modified or changed. They would infinitely prefer that you should send an army to Boston to enforce them, and thus make our rights under the Constitution incompatible with the independence and sovereignty of the States. Why, you may pass your laws; but a handful of people—it does not require a majority—can baffle your authority in every town in the United States, and thus nullify your law, deride your proclamation, and put your army and navy at defiance. Senators on the other side of the Chamber, not I, are on the side of the abolitionists. Sir, what is the foundation of abolitionism in this Union? It is consolidation. I remember many years since that he who filled the seat I now occupy [Senator Calhoun], and whose shoe-latchets as a statesman I am unworthy to loose, said to the Senator from Massachusetts, now no longer in this body [Mr. Webster], in the great debate that occurred in 1833:

"If the principles you contend for are correct, you will wake up a spirit of abolition in the North; you will make your people believe they are responsible for this institution; and the day that that principle gets into their minds, and that feeling into their hearts, this Union will be at an end. And you yourself will be the very first to feel the effects of the doctrine you are now maintaining by being ostracized and scorned."

Although that great statesman did not live to see the fulfillment of his prophecy, we now see it. Where is the great statesman of Massachusetts in Massachusetts?

The greatest friends of abolition in this country are the consolidationists. They are the fathers of it; they have made it. From their corrupt constructions of the Constitution this hideous monster has arisen, now shaking this Union to its center and, in my opinion, destined to overthrow it.

Sir, what did this Congress do at the last session? Consolidation carried its triumphant career unchecked over the rights and honor of the South, and the rights also of the North. By the compromise, as it was called, you stripped the South, having an equal right in the whole of our vast territories, conquered by us in common with you, of any participation in them. You ignominiously ejected us, but admitted freely not only all the people of the North, but the people of every other land and tongue, even to the convicts of Botany Bay. They are fit to be your compeers in holding that magnificent country; but we—we, your equals in this Confederacy—are spurned and thrust aside. That was one branch of your mighty measures of consolidation. And what else did you do? You passed the Fugitive Slave bill, another measure of consolidation, as I humbly conceive, although not injurious to the North. And after you had done this you then cried out: "All hail! here is peace; there is to be no more contention; the lamb and the wolf are to lie down together; satisfaction, and peace, and quietude prevail all over the Union! the South is satisfied, the North is satisfied; we are all satisfied."

Sir, the South has succumbed far beyond what she expected, or anybody else expected, after the solemn commitments she had made. She had resolved that she would resist, at every hazard and to the last extremity, if you perpetrated over her this enormous spoliation of her ejection from California. She has, nevertheless, apparently succumbed—all at least but two States. But the North for whom you plundered us—the North who had triumphed for your consolidation, instead of being satisfied with what she had gained, was dissatisfied with the poor boon the South acquired for the recapture of fugitive slaves. If the Constitution was violated by this law, they should not have complained, for they had more than its equivalent in the unconstitutional appropriation of California and the subjection of the South. Swollen with the arrogance of predominating power, however, they have risen up and said you shall not enforce this law. We see now this singular state of things: While the South—the wronged, the insulted party—is sinking lower and lower the spirit of the North is rising every day and saying, with its accustomed potency, you shall not enforce this law, until at length we are now deliberately debating whether we shall stretch the Union to the utmost tension of its powers to put down their dissatisfaction and resistance.

There is not a mathematical problem in Euclid more clear than this. Just in proportion as you limit the sphere of the operations of the general Government according to the simple purport of the Constitution, in that proportion you strengthen the Union; and just in proportion as you enlarge the sphere of the operations of the general Government by construction, in that proportion you endanger the stability of the Union. Those who adopt the policy of enlarging the powers of the general Government by construction have only to go on, and they will consummate that prediction made by a distinguished statesman on this floor, if it is not done already, that we would soon become, not one people, but a divided people, a people frowning at and hating each other. You have by this course of consolidation destroyed the bond of peace and brotherly love that has so long united us together. I do not know what other gentlemen may say, but I, for one, can speak for my constituency as to the effect of your legislation upon them. They look upon this Union, in the manner in which the representatives of the North carry out its operations, as a curse rather than a blessing. They deem the course of policy which you have pursued, in your measures of compromise and spoliation, to be inconsistent with their honor and inconsistent with their rights and safety.

One word before I close to my Democratic friends. Sir, I have been a humble follower of that party for more than twenty years. For thirteen years I have been standing up here in Congress endeavoring to bring it back to the original principles upon which it was placed. It was placed there by mighty men. The genius of Jefferson and Madison founded it. It was based not only on principles of policy, but on the fixed and immutable principles of truth and justice. But at the last session of Congress they surrendered to their enemies; they went over in the free States to the consolidationists, in order that together they might spoil the South. They took the honorable Senator from Kentucky as their leader—he who for twenty years has been the leader of the great Federal or Whig party—and an abler leader they have never had or ever will possess. Every step they took under such a leader toward consummating these measures of compromise they strengthened the Federal or consolidation party and weakened themselves. Now where are they? Where are the principles of the Democratic party? They are gone—they are destroyed. The Whig or Federal party is the only party that possesses power in this Union, and those of our Democratic friends who thought proper to cooperate with them in their measures of consolidation of the last Congress must sink into their embraces or sink beneath their feet. There may yet be recuperative power in the country if it could be brought forth; but I have waited here, a watcher of the night, and have looked long and long for the streaks of day. Shall that bright day ever again come, when the Democratic party, chastised by its errors and disciplined by defeat, shall again be clothed in its ancient armor and fighting for their principles, and the noble faith of the Constitution once more mount to victory? I fear not. I fear they are gone, gone forever; and that this Union will soon come to an end, under the mighty sweep of the free States, with the consolidation principles which they have ever advocated and enforced. The wheel is destined to roll on, crushing beneath its weight interest extreme doctrines upon the subject of slavery and considers that institution as a blessing, and the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. Chase], who holds directly opposite opinions, both unite in expressing the opinion that there is no power in the Congress of the United States to pass the Fugitive Slave law, and that Washington and all of us, from the commencement of the Government down to this time, have been wrong; that the Supreme Court has been wrong, and that the Congress of 1793 were wrong. Yet the colleague of the Senator from South Carolina, I believe, originally introduced the bill, and it was perfected by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason].

The Senator from South Carolina says the more you limit the Constitution the more you add strength to it. Then, I suppose, if all the powers of the Government are to be taken away in this process of limitation, it would make the Union stronger. He says the more you stretch the Constitution the more you increase the danger to the perpetuity of the Union. But who is to decide the question of stretching the powers of the Constitution, and of limiting them? What man, mortal, fallible, weak, erring man, can get up here and say the Constitution means this or that, and all others who give it a different interpretation are traitors, consolidationists, Whigs, or Federalists? I have never heard a man get up here and talk about his being a State rights man emphatically and exclusively, per se, a Simon Pure, that I did not feel those emotions which Junius describes whenever he saw a Scotchman smile. [Laughter.] The honorable Senator from Ohio and others who concur with him in opinion anticipated a vast and boundless fund of agitation if the compromise measures were passed. Instead of that, peace has been produced to an extent surpassing even my most sanguine anticipations. There was one exception. It was predicted by myself and others, at least, that the ultra abolitionists would not be tranquilized; that they would go on and agitate; and they would denounce the existence of the Union. Did the Senator suppose we had undertaken the herculean task of pacifying his friends, or at least those who think with him on the general subject of abolition?

SENATOR CHASE.—Does the Senator mean to enumerate me among those who ever expressed a wish for the dissolution of the Union?

SENATOR CLAY.—No, sir; I only mean to say that the Senator is in bad company. [Laughter.] If the Senator will disavow and repudiate the abolitionists of all shades and colors, I should be truly happy to hear him.

after interest, all faith, brotherhood, and peace, until the whole fabric falls, a vast pile of ruin and desolation.

SENATOR CLAY.—The speech of the Senator reminds me of a remark of the late Chief Justice of the United States, when a learned counsel from one of the distant States began to argue, and went as far back as the Flood, laying down certain fundamental rules of the law which he thought essential to be known by the Supreme Court. With that blandness and mildness that characterized that illustrious man, he said: "Why, Mr. Counsel, I really think there are some things which this court may be presumed to understand." The whole difficulty with the Senator and his school is that they undertake to say what are the granted powers, and what is and what is not necessary to carry into effect the granted powers. And if all others do not concur with them they are consolidationists, Federalists, Whigs, precipitating the country into ruin. They dispose of all precedent. What is a precedent? A precedent is the deliberate judgment of a court or a deliberative body upon questions which arise before that court or before that body. It is the opinion of the court or of the body upon the subject matter which is before them. It is, therefore, always entitled to respect, and he who sets aside precedents, he who rejects them all, says, in substance, I am wiser than all men who have pronounced these opinions and established these precedents, and therefore I pay no respect to them. During the last week I heard a Senator, who is not now in his place, I believe, reject in one general mass all precedents upon a particular subject, and immediately afterward shelter himself behind the opinion of the illustrious and lamented Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun], which he thought was superior to all other opinions and all other precedents. So it is with the whole school. They will tell you that the Supreme Court of the United States know nothing about the Constitution; that Congress has been violating it from 1793 down to this day. But if they can find an opinion of the lamented individual to whom I have referred, sanctioning their views, why it is worth all the precedents and the opinions of the Washingtons, Jeffersons, Madisons, Monroes, and all the other Presidents of the United States. The learned Senator has contended that there was no power in the Government of the United States to pass the fugitive slave law. It is not among the most remarkable features of the times that there are certain coincidences between extremes in this body and in the country. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, who, I believe, holds SENATOR CHASE.—I do disavow most emphatically all association or connection with any class of persons who desire the dissolution of this Union. I say now, as I said at the last session, that "we of the West are in the habit of looking upon this Union as we look upon the arch of heaven; without a thought that it can ever decay or fall." I am aware that there are some abolitionists or anti-slavery men—names are of little consequence—who regard the Constitution as at war with moral obligation and the supreme law. I am not of them. But if the Senator, when denouncing abolitionists, means to include in his reproaches all those citizens who, within the limits of constitutional obligation, seek to rescue this Government from all connection with slavery, I can claim no exemption. I am one of those who mean to exercise all legitimate constitutional power to restrict slavery within the limits of the slave States, and in all places under the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Government to maintain every person, of whatever race or origin, in the enjoyment of personal freedom. That is my position.

SENATOR DAVIS.—If the action of the negro mob in the city of Boston be sustained and adopted by the State of Massachusetts; if she has resolved to cast off the obligation of the Constitution and to absolve herself from the duties which devolve upon her as a member of the Union, then she is, of her own free will and sovereign act, virtually out of it. I, for one, will never give a dollar to coerce her back. In saying this I make no special attack upon that State. I attack no State. Though those with whom I am most identified have suffered most grievous wrongs from the State of Massachusetts; though she has been in the lead in that agitation, the object of which has been to deprive us of our property, still I remember the earlier and more glorious portions of her history. Still, if I could have the faintest ray of hope, I would say, despite my wrongs, I love thee still. If we can only have such a ray of hope furnished by the action of the Governor of that State; if he, with the militia of Massachusetts, will put down the mob and enforce the laws made under the Constitution, how much better, more peaceful, efficient, and permanent it would be than any remedy applied by the army and navy. And I reject the idea of the coercion of the State by the power of the Federal Government. If the State will not act thus, it can only be said she has dissolved the bonds that connected her to the other States by repudiating the Constitution. If so, I say let her go—go in peace, go in good will, go with all the kind and proud remembrances which cluster about her early history; go, if she will not maintain her obligations to the Constitution, as becomes a sovereign State and an equal member of the Union.

I know, Mr. President, that this doctrine which I entertain of the freedom of the State from coercion by the Federal Government will be by some identified with the doctrine of nullification, to which it bears no resemblance. I deny the power of Massachusetts to nullify the law and remain in the Union. But I concede to her the right, I am willing she should exercise it, if she deliberately desires it, to retire from the Union—to take the “extreme medicine,” secession.

When I become convinced that this Union solely depends for its preservation on the measures which politicians may suggest, I shall look upon its days as numbered. The charm which invests and binds it with far greater force than bands of brass and steel must have been dissolved, and the efforts of any puny arm to forge fetters to replace the magic power which had passed away would only provoke contempt if it did not heighten the catastrophe. This Union is held together by historical associations and national pride. It is held together by mutual attachments and common interests. It is held together by social links, from the fact that fathers and sons, mothers and daughters, brothers and sisters, and boyhood friends, live in extreme ends of the Union. These States are held together by so many unseen, close, and daily increasing points of contact that it can be rent in twain only by something which loosens these rivets, and permits the use of a lever as powerful as that which has been recently introduced. When it depends upon politicians to manufacture bonds to hold the Union together, it is gone—worthless as a rope of sand.

The Southern Rights Association of South Carolina held a convention in Charleston early in May, 1851, and passed resolutions declaring that the State would not submit to injustice from the Federal Government, and would “relieve herself therefrom whether with or without the coöperation of the other Southern States,” and calling for a “Secession Congress” of those States, which call was ratified by the State legislature. The other Southern States did not respond, and the Virginia legislature expressly declined to take any steps which should endanger the Union, and strongly warned South Carolina to desist from her course. A reaction took place in South Carolina, and at the October election of delegates in that State to the Secession Congress the secessionists were completely defeated. During the same month the Union party in Mississippi elected Henry S. Foote governor over the secession candidate, Jefferson Davis, by 999 votes, after a campaign in which the two candidates debated with each other in meetings held throughout the State. Even Davis was only a moderate secessionist, holding that, so long as a State was in the Union, it had no right to nullify a Federal law.

During May and June, 1851, Daniel Webster, Secretary of State, made a speaking tour through New York and Virginia, defending in brilliant oratory the Fugitive Slave law, yet unintentionally giving evidence of its ineffectiveness by his denunciation of its defiance by Massachusetts, Ohio, and other Northern States.

The reply to Webster by Massachusetts and Ohio was the election to the Senate by the former State of Charles Sumner, an even more radical anti-slavery man than his colleague, John Davis, and by the latter State of Benjamin Wade, equally as fervent in the cause as his colleague, Salmon P. Chase.

On August 26 Senator Sumner established his reputation as the leading orator of the anti-slavery cause by a long and brilliant speech in which he declared “Freedom National and Slavery Sectional.” It was replied to by George E. Badger [N. C.]. As the argument of the debate is abstract, being only incidentally connected with the Fugitive Act, it has been omitted.

In his annual message at the opening of Congress on December 2, 1851, President Fillmore referred as follows to the Fugitive Slave law:

ENFORCEMENT OF THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW

PRESIDENT FILLMORE

The act of Congress for the return of fugitives from labor is one required and demanded by the express words of the Constitution. This injunction of the Constitution is as peremptory and as binding as any other. Some objections have been urged against the details of the act for the return of fugitives from labor; but it is worthy of remark that the main opposition is aimed against the Constitution itself, and proceeds from persons and classes of persons, many of whom declare their wish to see that Constitution overturned. They avow their hostility to any law which shall give full and practical effect to this requirement of the Constitution. Fortunately, the number of these persons is comparatively small, and is believed to be daily diminishing, but the issue which they present is one which involves the supremacy and even the existence of the Constitution.

Cases have heretofore arisen in which individuals have denied the binding authority of acts of Congress, and even States have proposed to nullify such acts, upon the ground that the Constitution was the supreme law of the land, and that those acts of Congress were repugnant to that instrument; but nullification is now aimed, not so much against particular laws as being inconsistent with the Constitution as against the Constitution itself; and it is not to be disguised that a spirit exists and has been actively at work to rend asunder this Union, which is our cherished inheritance from our revolutionary fathers.

REPEAL OF THE MISSOURI COMPROMISE

President Pierce's Inaugural—His Allusion to the Finality of the Compromise of 1850—The Platte Country—Proposal to Organize It as the Territory of Nebraska—Stephen A. Douglas [Ill.] Introduces Bill in the Senate to This Effect—His Report on the Bill Questions Validity of the Missouri Compromise—Debate on the Bill: in Favor, Douglas, Archibald Dixon [Ky.], George E. BY the overwhelming election of Franklin Pierce to the presidency the Whig party received a mortal blow and its disintegration was only a matter of a few years. During the campaign it had lost its greatest leaders by death, Henry Clay passing away on June 29, 1852, and Daniel Webster on October 23, 1852. There now began the political division on the issue of slavery, which these great compromises had sought to avoid. More than any other it was a woman, Harriet Beecher Stowe, who made the issue inevitable, her great anti-slavery novel, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," published in 1851-52, furnishing the chief wedge that was to cleave the country in two during the coming Administrations.

So great was the curiosity to hear what position the new and comparatively unknown President would take on the slavery question, which, though it had been taken out of the campaign, so far as possible, by the Whig and Democratic conventions, still remained the burning issue of the period, that a greater crowd than had ever before assembled in Washington flocked to the capital on March 4, 1853, to hear the inaugural address.

SLAVERY A CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT

PRESIDENT PIERCE

To every theory of society or government, whether the offspring of feverish ambition or of morbid enthusiasm, calculated to dissolve the bonds of law and affection which unite us, I shall interpose a ready and stern resistance. I believe that involuntary servitude, as it exists in different States of this confederacy, is recognized by the Constitution. I believe that it stands like any other admitted right, and that the States where it exists are entitled to efficient remedies to enforce the constitutional provisions. I hold that the laws of 1850, commonly called the "compromise measures," are strictly constitutional, and to be unhesitatingly carried into effect. I believe that the constituted authorities of this Republic are bound to regard the rights of the South in this respect as they would view any other legal and constitutional right, and that the laws to enforce them should be respected and obeyed, not with a reluctance encouraged by abstract opinions as to their propriety in a different state of society, but cheerfully, and according to the decisions of the tribunal to which their exposition belongs. Such have been and are my convictions, and upon them I shall act. I fervently hope that the question is at rest, and that no sectional, or ambitious, or fanatical excitement may of those from Missouri, opposed the measure stoutly. It was, however, passed by the House on February 10 by a vote of 98 to 43. It then went to the Senate, where it was reported by Stephen A. Douglas [Ill.], chairman of the Committee on Territories, on February 11. On March 2 it was laid on the table by a vote of 23 to 17, every Southern Senator but those from Missouri voting in the affirmative. David R. Atchison, from that State, a strong pro-slavery man, clearly intimated that he was voicing the will of his constituents rather than of himself by his vote, and that it was the policy of the South to delay the organization of the Territory until some counterpoise could be found, such as the partition of Texas into several slave States and Territories.

The bill was brought before the Senate of the next Congress on December 14, 1853, by Augustus C. Dodge [Ia.], and was referred to the Committee on Territories, from which Senator Douglas reported it on January 4, 1854, with certain amendments, none of which, however, touched the question of slavery. Nevertheless, Senator Douglas's report on the bill questioned the validity of the 8th section in the Missouri Compromise, which prohibited slavery north of 36 degrees 30 minutes north latitude. The report said:

"Under this section, as in the case of the Mexican law in New Mexico and Utah, it is a disputed point whether slavery is prohibited in the Nebraska country by valid enactment. The decision of this question involves the constitutional power of Congress to pass laws prescribing and regulating the domestic institutions of the various Territories of the Union. In the opinion of those eminent statesmen who hold that Congress is invested with no rightful authority to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the Territories, the 8th section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri is null and void; while the prevailing sentiment in large portions of the Union sustains the doctrine that the Constitution of the United States secures to every citizen an inalienable right to move into any of the Territories with his property, of whatever kind and description, and to hold and enjoy the same under the sanction of law. Your committee do not feel themselves called upon to enter upon the discussion of these controverted questions. They in-again threaten the durability of our institutions or obscure the light of our prosperity.

THE NEBRASKA BILL

The hope of the President was quickly to be destroyed, and that by his own consent and even connivance.

West of Missouri and Iowa and extending to the Rocky Mountains was a great plain called, from the chief river which traversed it, the "Platte country." The eastern portion alone was considered desirable for habitation, and this consisted largely of Indian reservations upon which, as late as 1850, whites had been forbidden to settle. Although the Platte country was traversed by two great highways to the Far West, the Santa Fé and Oregon trails, no emigrants stopped to settle the semi-arid central and western portions which now, as a result of cultivation and irrigation, are flourishing agricultural regions.

By the terms of the Missouri compromise this entire country had been dedicated to freedom. Nevertheless the pact had been broken in part in 1836, when a strip of land along the Missouri frontier was added to that State (so quietly that little notice of the annexation was taken at the time), and six counties were formed of it wherein slavery was introduced.

In the Congress of 1851-52 petitions were presented from the sparse population of the western portion for a territorial organization of the country. No action, however, was taken, until the next session, when, on December 13, 1852, Willard P. Hall [Mo.] submitted in the House of Representatives a bill organizing the Territory of Platte, comprising the whole region. This was referred to the Committee on Territories, and, on February 2, 1853, William A. Richardson [Ill.], of the committee, reported a bill organizing the region under the name of the Territory of Nebraska. While the bill did not mention slavery, nevertheless the restriction against it in the Missouri Compromise was implied, and therefore the Southern Representatives, with the exception volve the same grave issues which produced the agitation, the sectional strife, and the fearful struggle of 1850. As Congress deemed it wise and prudent to refrain from deciding the matters in controversy then, either by affirming or repealing the Mexican laws, or by an act declaratory of the true intent of the Constitution, and the extent of the protection afforded by it to slave property in the Territories, so your committee are not prepared to recommend a departure from the course pursued on that memorable occasion, either by affirming or repealing the 8th section of the Missouri act, or by any act declaratory of the meaning of the Constitution in respect to the legal points in dispute."

Nevertheless, near the close the report said:

"From these provisions it is apparent that the compromise measures of 1850 affirm and rest upon the following proposition: 'That all questions pertaining to slavery in the Territories and the new States to be formed therefrom are to be left to the decision of the people residing therein, by their appropriate representatives, to be chosen by them for that purpose.'"

The bill thus reported was soon after, on Mr. Douglas's motion, recommitted, and on the 23d reported again by him from his Committee on Territories, with material alterations. For, meantime (on January 16, 1854), Archibald Dixon [Ky.] had given due notice that, whenever this bill should come up, he would offer the following amendment:

"That the 8th section of the Missouri compromise shall not be so construed as to apply to the Territory contemplated by this act, or to any other Territory of the United States; but that the citizens of the several States or Territories shall be at liberty to take and hold their slaves within any of the Territories or States to be formed therefrom, as if the said act, entitled as aforesaid, and approved as aforesaid, had never been passed."

This blunt proposition, says Horace Greeley in his "American Conflict," that the Missouri Compromise, in so far as its stipulations favored the consecration of the Territories to free labor, be utterly repudiated, now that so much of it as strengthened slavery had taken full and vigorous effect, was received with more surprise than satisfaction by the engineers of the original measure. The Union, then the Democratic organ at Washington, promptly denounced it as a Whig device to divide and disorganize the Democratic party. It received no hearty welcome from any quarter—certainly none from Senator Douglas, or any supporter of his Presidential aspirations. It had evidently been expected by them that his proposal to organize these territories, so expressly contemplated and covered by the inhibition of bondage contained in the Missouri act, in blank silence on the subject of slavery, would be deemed a concession to Southern prejudices, if not to Southern interests. Yet, in the presence of this bolder, stronger, larger, and more practical concession, that of Senator Douglas dwindled by contrast into insignificance.

Senator Douglas, thus outbid, resolved to start afresh. On the 23d aforesaid he reported from his committee a bill so different from its predecessor as hardly to resemble it, save that it contemplated the same region. Instead of one Territory, to be called Nebraska, and stretching from the parallel of 36 degrees 30 minutes north latitude on the south to that of 43 degrees 30 minutes on the north, and from the western boundary of Missouri and Iowa on the east to the crests of the Rocky Mountains on the west, he now proposed to create two Territories, one to be composed of so much of said region as was directly west of the State of Missouri, to be known as Kansas, the other to comprise the residue and be known as Nebraska. And, with reference to slavery, the new bill contained these provisions:

"Sec. 21. That, in order to avoid all misconception, it is hereby declared to be the true intent and meaning of this act, so far as the question of slavery is concerned, to carry into practical operation the following propositions and principles, established by the compromise measures of 1850, to wit:

"First. That all questions pertaining to slavery in the Territories and in the new States to be formed therefrom are to be left to the decision of the people residing therein, through their appropriate representatives.

the compromise act of 1850 as our guide, and intended to make each and every provision of the bill accord with those principles. Those measures established and rest upon the great principle of self-government—that the people should be allowed to decide the questions of their domestic institutions for themselves, subject only to such limitations and restrictions as are imposed by the Constitution of the United States, instead of having them determined by an arbitrary or geographical line.

The original bill reported by the committee, as a substitute for the bill introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Dodge], was believed to have accomplished this object. The amendment which was subsequently reported by us was only designed to render that clear and specific which seemed, in the minds of some, to admit of doubt and misconception. In some parts of the country the original substitute was deemed and construed to be an annulment or a repeal of what has been known as the Missouri compromise, while in other parts it was otherwise construed. As the object of the committee was to conform to the principles established by the compromise measures of 1850, and to carry those principles into effect in the Territories, we thought it was better to recite in the bill precisely what we understood to have been accomplished by those measures, viz: That the Missouri compromise, having been superseded by the legislation of 1850, has become inoperative, and hence we propose to leave the question to the people of the States and the Territories, subject only to the limitations and provisions of the Constitution.

Senator Douglas, having explained the bill, referred to aspersions that had been cast on the committee for its action, particularly in an article in the Abolition paper, the National Era, which was signed by Senator Salmon P. Chase, Senator Charles Sumner, Representative Joshua R. Giddings, and other anti-slavery statesmen. He read part of the article:

"We arraign this bill as a gross violation of a sacred pledge; as a criminal betrayal of precious rights; as part and parcel of an atrocious plot to exclude from a vast unoccupied region emigrants from the Old World, and free laborers from our own States, and convert it into a dreary region of despotism, inhabited by masters and slaves."

Then speaking of the Committee on Territories, these confederates use this language:

"Second. That 'all cases involving title to slaves' and 'questions of personal freedom' are referred to the adjudication of the local tribunals, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

"Third. That the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States, in respect to fugitives from service, are to be carried into faithful execution in all the 'organized Territories,' the same as in the States."

Proceeding to that section which provides for the election of a delegate to Congress from Kansas, instead of the original stipulation—

"That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory as elsewhere in the United States"— the following important reservation was now added:

"Except the section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March 6, 1820, which was superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, and is declared inoperative."

The section which authorized Nebraska to send a delegate was amended in precisely the same manner.

The amended bill thus reported by Senator Douglas was debated at length by Senators Douglas, Dixon, James C. Jones [Tenn.], George E. Badger [N. C.], Andrew P. Butler [S. C.], and several others in favor, and Senators Salmon P. Chase [O.], Charles Sumner [Mass.], William H. Seward [N. Y.], Benjamin Wade [O.], and others, in opposition.

REPEAL OF THE MISSOURI COMPROMISE

SENATE, JANUARY 30, 1854

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—Upon the question of slavery in the Territories, the committee took the principles established by

"The pretenses, therefore, that the Territory, covered by the positive prohibition of 1820, sustains a similar relation to slavery with that acquired from Mexico, covered by no prohibition except that of disputed constitutional or Mexican law, and that the compromises of 1850 require the incorporation of the pro-slavery clauses of the Utah and New Mexico bill in the Nebraska act, are mere inventions, designed to cover up from public reprobation meditated bad faith."

Again:

"Servile demagogues may tell you that the Union can be maintained only by submitting to the demands of slavery."

Then there is a postscript added, equally offensive to myself, in which I am mentioned by name. The address goes on to make an appeal to the legislatures of the different States, to public meetings, and to ministers of the Gospel in their pulpits, to interpose and arrest the vile conduct which is about to be consummated by the Senators who are thus denounced. That address, sir, bears date Sunday, January 22, 1854. Thus it appears that on the holy Sabbath, while other Senators were engaged in attending divine worship, these abolition confederates were assembled in secret conclave, plotting by what means they should deceive the people of the United States and prostrate the character of brother Senators. This was done on the Sabbath day, and by a set of politicians, to advance their own political and ambitious purposes, in the name of our holy religion.

But this is not all. It was understood from the newspapers that resolutions were pending before the legislature of Ohio, proposing to express their opinions upon this subject. It was necessary to hasten the action of the Ohio legislature, under a misapprehension, to state that it was signed, not only by the abolition confederates, but by the whole Whig representation, and a portion of the Democratic representation in the other House from the State of Ohio.

SENATOR CHASE.—Mr. President, the Senator misstates the facts—

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—Sir, if the Senator does interpose, in violation of the rules of the Senate, to a denial of the fact, it may be that I shall be able to nail that denial, as I shall the statements here which are over his own signature, as a base falsehood, and prove it by the solemn legislation of this country.

SENATOR CHASE.—I call the Senator to order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT.—The Senator from Illinois is certainly out of order.

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—Then I will only say that I shall confine myself to this document, and prove its statements to be false by the legislation of the country. Certainly that is in order.

SENATOR CHASE.—You cannot do it.

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—The argument of this manifesto is predicated upon the assumption that the policy of the Fathers of the Republic was to prohibit slavery in all the territory ceded by the old States to the Union and made United States territory, for the purpose of being organized into new States. I take issue upon that statement.

The Senator here stated that in the organization of the Territories of Mississippi, Louisiana, and Missouri slavery was not restricted.

This continued to be the condition of the country in the Missouri Territory up to 1820, when the celebrated act which is now called the Missouri compromise act was passed. Slavery did not exist in, nor was it excluded from, the country now known as Nebraska. There was no code of laws upon the subject of slavery either way: First, for the reason that slavery had never been introduced into Louisiana and established by positive enactment. It had grown up there by a sort of common law, and been supported and protected. When a common law grows up, when an institution becomes established under a usage, it carries it so far as that usage actually goes and no further. If it had been established by direct enactment, it might have carried it so far as the political jurisdiction extended; but, be that as it may, by the act of 1812, creating the Territory of Missouri, that Territory was allowed to legislate upon the subject of slavery as it saw proper, subject only to the limitations which I have stated; and the country not inhabited or thrown open to settlement was set apart as Indian country, and rendered subject to Indian laws. Hence the local legislation of the State of Missouri did not reach into that Indian country, but was excluded from it by the Indian code and Indian laws. The municipal regulations of Missouri could not go there until the Indian title had been extinguished and the country thrown open to settlement. Such being the case, the only legislation in existence in Nebraska Territory at the time that the Missouri act was passed, namely, the 6th of March, 1820, was a provision in effect that the people should be allowed to do as they pleased upon the subject of slavery.

applying for admission into this Union; but it was necessary to preserve the principle of the Missouri compromise line in order that it might afterward be extended; and it was supposed that, while Congress had no power to impose any such limitation, yet, as that was a compact with the State of Texas, that State could consent for herself that, when any portion of her own territory, subject to her own jurisdiction and control, applied for a constitution, it should be in a particular form; but that provision would not be binding on the new State one day after it was admitted into the Union. The other provision was that such States as should lie south of 36° 30' should come into the Union with or without slavery, as each should decide in its constitution. Then, by that act, the Missouri compromise was extended indefinitely westward, so far as the State of Texas went, that is, to the Rio del Norte; for our Government at the time recognized the Rio del Norte as its boundary. We recognized it in many ways, and among them by even paying Texas for it, in order that it might be included in and form a portion of the Territory of New Mexico.

Then, sir, in 1848 we acquired from Mexico the country between the Rio del Norte and the Pacific Ocean. Immediately after that acquisition the Senate, on my own motion, voted into a bill a provision to extend the Missouri compromise indefinitely westward to the Pacific Ocean, in the same sense and with the same understanding with which it was originally adopted. That provision passed this body by a decided majority and went to the House of Representatives, and was there defeated by Northern votes.

Now, sir, let us pause and consider for a moment. The first time that the principles of the Missouri compromise were ever abandoned, the first time they were ever rejected by Congress, was by the defeat of that provision in the House of Representatives in 1848. By whom was that defeat effected? By Northern votes, with Free-Soil proclivities. It was the defeat of that Missouri compromise that reopened the slavery agitation with all its fury. It was the defeat of that Missouri compromise that created the tremendous struggle of 1850. It was the defeat of that Missouri compromise that created the necessity for making a new compromise in 1850. Had we been faithful to the principles of the Missouri compromise in 1848, this question would not have arisen. Who was it that was faithless? I undertake to say it was the very men who now insist that the Missouri compromise was a solemn compact, and should never be violated or departed from. Every man who is now assailing

The Territory of Missouri having been left in that legal condition, positive opposition was made to the bill to organize a State government, with a view to its admission into the Union; and a Senator from my State, Mr. Jesse B. Thomas, introduced an amendment, known as the eighth section of the bill, in which it was provided that slavery should be prohibited north of 36° 30' north latitude, in all that country which we had acquired from France. What was the object of the enactment of that eighth section? Was it not to go back to the original policy of prescribing boundaries to the limitation of free institutions, and of slave institutions, by a geographical line, in order to avoid all controversy in Congress upon the subject? Hence they extended that geographical line through all the territory purchased from France, which was as far as our possessions then reached. It was not simply to settle the question on that piece of country, but it was to carry out a great principle, by extending that dividing line as far west as our territory went, and running it onward on each new acquisition of territory. True, the express enactment of the eighth section of the Missouri act, now called the Missouri compromise act, only covered the territory acquired from France; but the principles of the act, the objects of its adoption, the reasons in its support, required that it should be extended indefinitely westward, so far as our territory might go, whenever new purchases should be made.

Thus stood the question up to 1845, when the joint resolution for the annexation of Texas passed. There was inserted in that a provision, suggested in the first instance and brought before the House of Representatives by myself, extending the Missouri compromise line indefinitely westward through the Territory of Texas. Why did I bring forward that proposition? Why did the Congress of the United States adopt it? Not because it was of the least practical importance, so far as the question of slavery within the limits of Texas was concerned, for no man ever dreamed that it had any practical effect there. Then why was it brought forward? It was for the purpose of preserving the principle, in order that it might be extended still further westward, even to the Pacific Ocean, whenever we should acquire the country that far.

It will be seen that the joint resolution for the annexation of Texas contains a very remarkable provision, which is that, when States lying north of 36° 30' apply for admission, slavery shall be prohibited in their constitutions. I presume no one pretends that Congress could have power thus to fetter a State the principle of the bill under consideration, so far as I am advised, was opposed to the Missouri compromise in 1848. The very men who now arraign me for a departure from the Missouri compromise are the men who successfully violated it, repudiated it, and caused it to be superseded by the compromise measures of 1850. Sir, it is with rather bad grace that the men who proved false themselves should charge upon me and others, who were ever faithful, the responsibilities and consequences of their own treachery.

Then, sir, as I before remarked, the defeat of the Missouri compromise in 1848 having created the necessity for the establishment of a new one in 1850, let us see what that compromise was.

The leading feature of the compromise of 1850 was congressional non-intervention as to slavery in the Territories; that the people of the Territories and of all the States were to be allowed to do as they pleased upon the subject of slavery, subject only to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

That, sir, was the leading feature of the compromise measures of 1850. Those measures, therefore, abandoned the idea of a geographical line as the boundary between free States and slave States; abandoned it because compelled to do it from an inability to maintain it; and, in lieu of that, substituted a great principle of self-government which would allow the people to do as they thought proper. Now, the question is, when that new compromise, resting upon that great fundamental principle of freedom, was established, was it not an abandonment of the old one—the geographical line? Was it not a superseding of the old one within the very language of the substitute for the bill which is now under consideration? I say it did supersede it, because it applied its provisions as well to the north as to the south of 36° 30'. It established a principle which was equally applicable to the country north as well as south of the parallel of 36° 30'—a principle of universal application.

In order to refute the presumption that the Missouri compromise was abandoned and superseded by the principles of the compromise of 1850, these confederates cite the following amendment, offered to the bill to establish the boundary of Texas and create the Territory of New Mexico in 1850:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair or qualify anything contained in the third article of the second section of the joint resolution for annexing Texas to the United States, approved March 1, 1845, either as regards the number of States that may hereafter be formed out of the State of Texas or otherwise."

After quoting this proviso, they make the following statement, and attempt to gain credit for its truth by suppressing material facts which appear upon the face of the same statute, and, if produced, would conclusively disprove the statement:

"It is solemnly declared in the very compromise acts 'that nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair or qualify' the prohibition of slavery north of 36° 30'; and yet, in the face of this declaration, that sacred prohibition is said to be overthrown. Can presumption further go!"

I will now proceed to show that presumption could not go further than is exhibited in this declaration.

They suppress the following material facts, which, if produced, would have disproved their statement: They first suppress the fact that the same section of the act cuts off from Texas and cedes to the United States all that part of Texas which lies north of 36° 30'. They then suppress the further fact that the same section of the law cuts off from Texas a large tract of country on the west, more than three degrees of longitude, and adds it to the territory of the United States. They then suppress the further fact that this territory thus cut off from Texas, and to which the Missouri compromise line did apply, was incorporated into the Territory of New Mexico. And then what was done? It was incorporated into that Territory with this clause:

"That, when admitted as a State, the said Territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of its adoption."

Yes, sir, the very bill and section from which they quote cuts off all that part of Texas which was to be free by the Missouri compromise, together with some on the south side of the line, incorporates it into the Territory of New Mexico, and then says that that Territory, and every portion of the same, shall come into the Union with or without slavery, as it seen proper.

Now, I ask those Senators, do not those provisions repeal the Missouri compromise so far as it applied to that country cut off from Texas? Do they not annul it? Do they not supersede it? If they do, then the address which has been put forth to the world by these confederates is an atrocious falsehood. If they do not, then what do they mean when they charge me with having, in the substitute first reported from the committee, repealed it, with having annulled it, with having violated it, only agreeing to that which was past, and had no reference to the future? If that was their meaning—if that was their object—they palmed off an atrocious fraud upon the American people. Was it the meaning of the Democratic party, when we pledged ourselves to stand by the compromise of 1850, that we spoke only of the past and had no reference to the future? If so, it was then a fraud. When we pledged our President to stand by the compromise measures, did we not understand that we pledged him as to his future action? Was it as to his past conduct? If it had been in relation to past conduct only, the pledge would have been untrue as to a very large portion of the Democratic party. Men went into that convention who had been opposed to the compromise measures—men who abhorred those measures when they were pending—men who never would have voted affirmatively on them. But inasmuch as those measures had been passed, and the country had acquiesced in them, and it was important to preserve the principle in order to avoid agitation in the future, these men said to the President, we waive our past objections, and we will stand by you and with you in carrying out those principles in the future.

Such I understood to be the meaning of the two great parties at Baltimore. Such I understand to have been the effect of their pledges. If they did not mean this, they meant merely to adopt resolutions which were never to be carried out, and which were designed to mislead and deceive the people for the mere purpose of carrying an election.

I hold, then, that as to the territory covered by the Utah and New Mexico bills, there was an express annulment of the Missouri compromise; and as to all the other unorganized territories, it was superseded by the principles of that legislation, and we are bound to apply those principles in the organization of all new Territories, to all which we now own, or which we may hereafter acquire. If this construction be given, it makes that compromise a final adjustment. No other construction can possibly impart finality to it. By any other construction the question is to be reopened the moment you ratify a new treaty requiring an inch of country from Mexico. By any other construction you reopen the issue every time you make a new territorial government. But, sir, if you treat the compromise measures of 1850 in the light of great principles, sufficient to remedy temporary evils, at the same time that they prescribe rules of action applicable everywhere in all time to come, then you avoid the agitation forever, if you observe good faith to when I only copied those precise words? I copied the precise words into my bill as reported from the committee which were contained in the New Mexico bill. They say my bill annuls the Missouri compromise. If it does, it had already been done before by the act of 1850, for these words were copied from the act of 1850.

SENATOR WADE.—Why did you do it over again?

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—I will come to that point presently and explain why we did it over again. I am now dealing with the truth and veracity of a combination of men who have assembled in secret caucus upon the Sabbath day, to arraign my conduct and belie my character.

In order to give greater plausibility to this falsification of the terms of the compromise measures of 1850, the confederates also declare in their manifesto that they (the territorial bills for the organization of Utah and New Mexico) "applied to the territory acquired from Mexico, and to that only. They were intended as a settlement of the controversy growing out of that acquisition, and of that controversy only. They must stand or fall by their own merits."

Sir, so far as the Utah and New Mexico bills included the territory which had been subject to the Missouri compromise provision, to that extent they absolutely annulled the Missouri compromise. As to the unorganized territory not covered by those bills, it was superseded by the principles of the compromise of 1850. We all know that the object of the compromise measures of 1850 was to establish certain great principles, which would avoid the slavery agitation in all time to come. Was it our object simply to provide for a temporary evil? Was it our object just to heal over an old sore, and leave it to break out again? Was it our object to adopt a mere miserable expedient to apply to that territory, and that alone, and leave ourselves entirely at sea without compass when new territory was acquired, or new territorial organizations were to be made? Was that the object for which the eminent and venerable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Clay] came here and sacrificed even his last energies upon the altar of his country? Was that the object for which Webster, Clay, Cass, and all the patriots of that day struggled so long and so strenuously? Was it merely the application of a temporary expedient in agreeing to stand by past and dead legislation that the Baltimore platform pledged us to sustain the compromise of 1850? Was it the understanding of the Whig party, when they adopted the compromise measures of 1850 as an article of political faith, that they were the provisions of these enactments, and the principles established by them.

Mr. President, I repeat that, so far as the question of slavery is concerned, there is nothing in the bill under consideration which does not carry out the principle of the compromise measures of 1850, by leaving the people to do as they please, subject only to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. If that principle is wrong, the bill is wrong. If that principle is right, the bill is right. It is unnecessary to quibble about phraseology or words; it is not the mere words, the mere phraseology, that our constituents wish to judge by. They wish to know the legal effect of our legislation.

The legal effect of this bill, if it be passed as reported by the Committee on Territories, is neither to legislate slavery into these Territories nor out of them, but to leave the people to do as they please, under the provisions and subject to the limitations of the Constitution of the United States. Why should not this principle prevail? Why should any man, North or South, object to it? I will especially address the argument to my own section of the country, and ask why should any Northern man object to this principle? If you will review the history of the slavery question in the United States, you will see that all the great results in behalf of free institutions which have been worked out have been accomplished by the operation of this principle, and by it alone.

Let me ask you where have you succeeded in excluding slavery by an act of Congress from one inch of the American soil? You may tell me that you did it in the Northwest Territory by the ordinance of 1787. I will show you by the history of the country that you did not accomplish any such thing. You prohibited slavery there by law, but you did not exclude it in fact. Illinois was a part of the Northwest Territory. With the exception of a few French and white settlements, it was a vast wilderness, filled with hostile savages, when the ordinance of 1787 was adopted. Yet, sir, when Illinois was organized into a territorial government it established and protected slavery, and maintained it in spite of your ordinance, and in defiance of its express prohibition. It is a curious fact that, so long as Congress said the Territory of Illinois should not have slavery, she actually had it; and on the very day when you withdrew your congressional prohibition, the people of Illinois, of their own free will and accord, provided for a system of emancipation.

But, sir, these abolition confederates, in their manifesto, have also referred to the wonderful results of their policy in the State of Iowa. Here again they happen to be in fault as to the laws of the land. The act to organize the Territory of Iowa did not prohibit slavery, but the people of Iowa were allowed to do as they pleased under the territorial government. Iowa, when she came to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to admission into the Union, considered the subject of free and slave institutions calmly, dispassionately, without any restraint or dictation, and determined that it would be to the interest of her people in their climate, and with their productions, to prohibit slavery, and hence Iowa became a free State by virtue of this great principle of allowing the people to do as they please, and not in obedience to any Federal command.

The abolitionists are also in the habit of referring to Oregon as another instance of the triumph of their abolition policy. There again they have overlooked or misrepresented the history of the country. Sir, for about twelve years you failed to give Oregon any government or any protection; and during that period the inhabitants of that country established a government of their own, and by virtue of their own laws, passed by their own representatives before you extended your jurisdiction over them, prohibited slavery by a unanimous vote.

How was it in regard to California? Every one of these abolition confederates who have thus arraigned me and the Committee on Territories before the country, who have misrepresented our position, and misquoted the law and the fact, predicted that, unless Congress interposed by law and prohibited slavery in California, it would inevitably become a slave-holding State. Congress did not interfere; Congress did not prohibit slavery. There was no enactment upon the subject; but the people formed a State constitution and then prohibited slavery.

So it was in regard to Utah and New Mexico. We established the territorial governments of Utah and New Mexico without any prohibition. We gave to these abolitionists a full opportunity of proving whether their predictions were true or false. Years have rolled round and the result is before us. The people there have not passed any law recognizing, or establishing, or introducing, or protecting slavery in the Territories.

I know of but one Territory of the United States where slavery does exist, and that one is where you have prohibited it by law, and it is this very Nebraska Territory. In defiance of the eighth section of the act of 1820, in defiance of congressional dictation, there have been, not many but a few, slaves it was in force, and advocated its extension to the Pacific. Now, when that has been abandoned, when it has been superseded, when a great principle of self-government has been substituted for it, I choose to cling to that principle, and abide in good faith, not only by the letter but by the spirit of the last compromise.

SENATOR CHASE.—Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois charges that the address, upon which he has been pleased to comment in terms which befit any other place than the Senate Chamber—however low that place may be—was concocted in what he chooses to call an abolition caucus held upon Sunday. Ay, sir, with a generosity peculiarly his own, he has availed himself of a mere error of date, and piously holds up to public reprobation the gentlemen who have signed that address as violating the sacredness of the Sabbath day, that day for which he cherishes, doubtless, a peculiar reverence.

Well, sir, the Senator further charges that a false statement has been put forth in connection with this address. That false statement, as he alleges, was this: That the appeal was signed by a majority of the members from the State of Ohio. He thinks that the design was to catch some "soft-footed Democrats." "Soft-footed Democrats!" Ay, that is the phrase by which he chooses to mark all Democrats who will vote against this bill. I trust he will find that such Democrats are a little more numerous than he seems now to imagine.

The simple facts are these: The address bears no signatures other than those of the Independent Democrats, whom the Senator chooses to style "the abolition confederates." By no one of them was it ever represented to be otherwise signed. Some gentlemen connected with the press, however, hearing of the purpose that it should be signed by more or less of the delegation from Ohio, have sent it abroad with a statement that it was thus signed in fact.

Well, sir, the Senator proceeded to take exception to the character and scope of the whole document. He says that we, forsooth, have held him up to the country in this address as guilty of certain great and enormous crimes. Why, sir, any man who reads the address will see that in no part of it, from first to last, except in a brief note appended, is the Senator mentioned at all. So far as I am responsible for the document, either by signature or authorship, I tell the Senator he was not in all my thoughts. He exaggerates his importance when he supposes that we had him, rather than any other member of the committee, specially in view. Sir, I know the giganintroduced. I heard a minister of the Gospel the other day conversing with a member of the Committee on Territories upon this subject. This preacher was from that country; and a member put this question to him: "Have you any negroes out there?" He said there were a few held by the Indians. I asked him if there were not some held by white men? He said there were a few, under peculiar circumstances, and he gave an instance: An abolition missionary, a very good man, had gone there from Boston, and he took his wife with him. He got out into the country, but could not get any help; hence he, being a kind-hearted man, went down to Missouri and gave $1,000 for a negro, and took him up there as "help." [Laughter.] So, under peculiar circumstances, when these Free-Soil and abolition preachers and missionaries go into the country, they can buy a negro for their own use, but they do not like to allow anyone else to do the same thing. [Renewed laughter.] I suppose the fact of the matter is simply this: There the people can get no servants, and, from the necessity of the case, they must do the best they can, and for this reason a few slaves have been taken there. I have no doubt that, whether you organize the Territory of Nebraska or not, this will continue for some time to come. It certainly does exist, and it will increase as long as the Missouri compromise applies to the Territory; and I suppose it will continue for a little while during their territorial condition, whether a prohibition is imposed or not. But when settlers rush in—when labor becomes plenty, and therefore cheap, in that climate, with its productions, it is worse than folly to think of its being a slave-holding country. I do not believe there is a man in Congress who thinks it could be permanently a slave-holding country. All I have to say on that subject is that, when you create them into a Territory, you thereby acknowledge that they ought to be considered a distinct political organization. And, when you give them in addition a legislature, you thereby confess that they are competent to exercise the powers of legislation. If they wish slavery they have a right to it. If they do not want it, they will not have it, and you should not force it upon them.

I do not like, I never did like, the system of legislation on our part by which a geographical line, in violation of the laws of nature, and climate, and soil, and of the laws of God, should be run to establish institutions for a people; yet, out of a regard for the peace and quiet of the country, out of respect for past pledges, and out of a desire to adhere faithfully to all compromises, I sustained the Missouri compromise so long as the stature of the Senator;¹ I know the weight and importance which he possesses in the country; I know that he has a great and powerful party surrounding him; and I know also the great disadvantages under which I enter into any controversy which he provokes. I am in a minority. I know that full well. It is no very pleasant position. But I dare do that which I should like to see the Senator also do. I dare adhere to principle, even though that adherence must carry me into a minority.

Sir, our offence is that we deny the nationality of slavery. No man can show that we have ever sought to interfere with the legislation of any State of the Union upon that subject. All that we have ever insisted upon is that the Territories of this Union shall be preserved from slavery; and that where the general Government exercises exclusive jurisdiction its legislation shall be on the side of liberty. It is because we defend these positions that the Senator from Illinois attacks us. He thinks that he can take advantage of his position in the country—that he can take advantage of his connection with a great and powerful political organization, and assail us with little hazard. It is safe to attack opponents who stand, as we stand, without the supports he counts upon. Ay, sir, that shows courage, that shows chivalry, that shows high honor, that shows lofty manhood—to assail the few and the unsupported. I tell the Senator from Illinois that we did not assail him. We did not say a word about him from the beginning to the end of our appeal. He was named only in the postscript, and then merely as the author of the bill. We spoke of the bill. We spoke of its character. We said nothing about the character of the individuals who were its authors; anybody may see that who chooses to read the address.

In the whole discussion of the matter in controversy, we confined ourselves in that appeal strictly and closely to the merits of the case. And now, sir, here, in this Chamber, before this audience, I reaffirm every word and every syllable of that appeal. I make no personal imputations; I make no personal charges; I do not follow the example which has been set here to-day, but which, in my judgment, is not fit to be followed anywhere; but I reaffirm and reiterate, distinctly and emphatically, every word and every syllable of that address. I thank the Senator from Illinois for having brought it so prominently before the country. It will now reach thousands and tens of thousands who would not have read it but for the discussion which has taken place here to-day. It will be seen, read, and judged by the people, and they will determine for themselves whether or not its doctrine is sound and its facts are truly stated.

In this appeal "we arraign this bill as a gross violation of a sacred pledge." The Senator from Illinois thinks that the pledge of the Missouri compromise was nothing worth. We think it was of vast consequence, and absolutely binding; and, as the bill proposes to abrogate it, we do not choose soft words, but characterize it at once as it deserves. We arraign it also as "a criminal betrayal of precious rights." Well, what rights are precious if those secured to free labor and free laborers in that vast Territory are not? What can be criminal, if it be not criminal to subvert these rights for the purpose of giving room to slavery? When the bill proposes to reach this bad end by the baseless declaration that the Missouri prohibition is superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850—a singular mode of repeal that—we call it "a criminal betrayal of precious rights."

The appeal goes on to denounce the bill as "part and parcel of an atrocious plot to exclude from a vast unoccupied region emigrants from the Old World and free laborers from our own States, and convert it into a dreary region of despotism, inhabited by masters and slaves." Well, suppose this Territory opened to slavery. Who does not know that upon the western borders of Missouri there are many slaveholders restrained now by the prohibition, but eager to enter the new Territory with their slaves? Who does not know that the effect of the introduction of slaves will be the exclusion of free laborers, and, to a great extent, of the emigrants from Europe? Why, sir, in my judgment, a concerted movement by slavery confederates to open this great Territory, larger by twelve times than the whole State of Ohio—larger than all the existing free States, with the exception of California—to the ingress of slavery is mildly characterized by the language of the appeal. But I will not further review this document. It will appear with these remarks and will speak for itself.

On February 3, 1854, Senator Chase moved to strike out so much of the bill as declared the restriction regarding slavery in the Missouri compromise "superseded" by the compromise of 1850. He spoke as follows upon the amendment:

REPEAL OF MISSOURI COMPROMISE 281

territorial slavery into Congress—not we who are denounced as agitators and factionists. No, sir; the quietists and the finalists have become agitators; they who told us that all agitation was quieted, and that the resolutions of the political conventions put a final period to the discussion of slavery.

This will not escape the observation of the country. It is slavery that renews the strife. It is slavery that again wants room. It is slavery, with its insatiate demands for more slave territory and more slave States.

And what does slavery ask for now? Why, sir, it demands that a time-honored and sacred compact shall be rescinded—a compact which has endured through a whole generation—a compact which has been universally regarded as inviolable, North and South—a compact the constitutionality of which few have doubted, and by which all have consented to abide.

It will not answer to violate such a compact without a pretext. Some plausible ground must be discovered or invented for such an act; and such a ground is supposed to be found in the doctrine which was advanced the other day by the Senator from Illinois, that the compromise acts of 1850 "superseded" the prohibition of slavery north of 36° 30', in the act preparatory for the administration of Missouri.

It is against this statement, untrue in fact and without foundation in history, that the amendment which I have proposed is directed.

The Senator from Illinois attempts to show that the original policy of the country was one of indifference between slavery and freedom; and that, in pursuance of it, a geographical line was established reaching from the eastern to the western limit of the original States—that is to say, to the Mississippi River. Sir, if anything is susceptible of absolute historical demonstration, I think it is the proposition that the founders of this Republic never contemplated any extension of slavery.

Senator Chase here adduced the anti-slavery opinions of Thomas Jefferson and his part in the organization of the Territorial domain. Jefferson had been a member of the first committee to report an ordinance on the subject. In this early ordinance the proviso was made that slavery should be abolished after 1800 in all the territory belonging to the Government.

Well, what was the action of Congress upon this proviso? The States stood six to three in its favor, four States

LET US MAINTAIN OUR PLIGHTED FAITH

SENATOR CHASE

Mr. President, I had occasion a few days ago to expose the utter groundlessness of the personal charges made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] against myself and the other signers of the Independent Democratic appeal. I now move to strike from this bill a statement which I will to-day demonstrate to be without any foundation in fact or history. I intend afterward to move to strike out the whole clause annulling the Missouri prohibition.

I enter into this debate, Mr. President, in no spirit of personal unkindness. The issue is too grave and too momentous for the indulgence of such feelings. I see the great question before me, and that question only.

Sir, these crowded galleries, these thronged lobbies, this full attendance of the Senate prove the deep, transcendent interest of the theme.

A few days only have elapsed since the Congress of the United States assembled in this Capitol. Then no agitation seemed to disturb the political elements. Two of the great political parties of the country, in their national conventions, had announced that slavery agitation was at an end, and that henceforth that subject was not to be discussed in Congress or out of Congress. The President, in his annual message, had referred to this state of opinion, and had declared his fixed purpose to maintain, as far as any responsibility attached to him, the quiet of the country.

And so, sir, the country was at peace. As the eye swept the entire circumference of the horizon and upward to mid-heaven not a cloud appeared.

But suddenly all is changed. Rattling thunder breaks from the cloudless firmament. The storm bursts forth in fury. Warring winds rush into conflict.

"Eurus, Notusque ruunt, creberque procellis, Africus."

"Yes, sir, "creber procellis Africus"—the south wind thick with storm. And now we find ourselves in the midst of an agitation, the end and issue of which no man can foresee.

Now, sir, who is responsible for this renewal of strife and controversy? Not we, for we have introduced no question of being either divided or not voting. Of the twenty-three delegates present, sixteen were for the proviso and seven against it. But under the provisions of the Articles of Confederation, which then controlled the legislation of Congress, the votes of a majority of all the States were necessary to retain the proviso in the ordinance. It failed, consequently. Sir, if that doctrine of the rights of majorities, of which we hear so much and see in actual practice so little, had then been recognized—if the wishes of a majority of the States, and of the majority of the delegates, had prevailed—if the almost universal sentiment of the people had been respected, the question of slavery in this country would have been settled that day forever. All the territory acquired by the Union would have been covered with the impenetrable ægis of freedom. But then, as now, there was a slave interest in the country—then, as now, there was a slave power. The interest was comparatively small and the power comparatively weak; but they were sufficient, under the then existing Government, to defeat the proviso, and transfer the great question of slavery to future discussion. The facts which I have detailed, however, are sufficient to show what was the general sentiment, and what was the original policy of the country in respect to slavery. It was one of limitation, discouragement, repression.

What next occurred? The subject of organizing this Territory remained before Congress. Mr. Jefferson, in 1785, went to France. His great influence was no longer felt in the councils of the country, but his proviso remained, and in 1787 was incorporated into the ordinance for the government of the territory northwest of the River Ohio. I beg the Senate to observe that this territory was, at that moment, the whole territory belonging to the United States. I will not trouble the Senate by reading the proviso of the ordinance. It is enough to say that the Jefferson proviso of 1784, coupled with a provision saving to the original States of the Union a right to reclaim fugitives from service, was incorporated into the ordinance, and became a fundamental law over every foot of national territory. What was the policy indicated by this action by the Fathers of the Republic? Was it that of indifference between slavery and freedom?—that of establishing a geographical line, on one side of which there should be liberty and on the other side slavery, both equally under the protection and countenance of the Government? No, sir; the furthest thing possible from that. It was the policy of excluding slavery from all national territory. It was adopted, too, under remarkable circumstances.

Slavery was already in the territory under the French colonial law, and also, if the claim of Virginia was well founded, under the laws of that State. These facts prove that the first application of the original policy of the Government converted slave territory into free territory.

And now, sir, let me ask the attention of the Senate to the Constitution itself. That charter of our Government was not formed upon pro-slavery principles, but upon anti-slavery principles. It nowhere recognizes any right of property in man. It nowhere confers upon the Government which it creates any power to establish or to continue slavery.

Not only was the idea of property in men excluded from the Constitution; not only was there no power granted to Congress to authorize or enable any man to hold another as property, but an amendment was afterward ingrafted upon the Constitution which especially denied all such power.

The history of that amendment is worth attention. The State which the Senators from Virginia so ably represent on this floor was one of those which immediately after the adoption of the Constitution proposed amendments of it. One of the amendments which she proposed was this:

"No freeman ought to be taken, imprisoned, or deprived of his freehold, liberties, or franchises, or outlawed, or exiled, or in any manner deprived of his life, liberty, or property, but by the law of the land."

Did Congress adopt that amendment? No, sir; it adopted and proposed to the States a very different amendment. It was this:

"No person * * * shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

Now, sir, in my judgment, this prohibition was intended as a comprehensive guaranty of personal freedom, and denies absolutely to Congress the power of legislating for the establishment or maintenance of slavery. This amendment of itself, rightly interpreted and applied, would be sufficient to prevent the introduction of slaves into any territory acquired by the United States. At all events, taken in connection with the ordinance, and with the original provision of the Constitution, it shows conclusively the absence of all intention upon the part of the founders of the Government to afford any countenance or protection to slavery outside of State limits. Departure from the true interpretation of the Constitution has created the necessity for positive prohibition.

REPEAL OF MISSOURI COMPROMISE 285

the Constitution of the United States, were absolutely in harmony one with the other; and that if the ordinance had never been adopted, the Constitution itself, properly interpreted, and administered, would have excluded slavery from all newly acquired territory. But, sir, whatever opinion may be entertained in respect to the interpretation of the Constitution which I defend, one thing is absolutely indisputable, and that is that it was the original policy of the country to exclude slavery from all national territory.

The Senator continued his historical review of slavery in the United States, showing that there was no thought of establishing a geographical line (such as Senator Douglas had claimed was drawn at that early period) until the Missouri compromise. Having related the history of this adjustment of the question, he said:

Here then is a compact, complete, perfect, irrevocable, so far as any compact, embodied in a legislative act, can be said to be irrevocable. It had the two sections of the country for its parties, a great Territory for its subject, and a permanent adjustment of a dangerous controversy for its object. It was forced upon the free States. It has been literally fulfilled by the free States. It is binding, indeed, only upon honor and conscience; but, in such a matter, the obligations of honor and conscience must be regarded as even more sacred than those of constitutional provisions.

Mr. President, if there was any principle which prevailed in this arrangement, it was that of permitting the continuance of slavery in the localities where it actually existed at the time of the acquisition of the territory, and prohibiting it in the parts of territory in which no slaves were actually held. This was a wide departure from the original policy which contemplated the exclusion of slavery from territories in which it actually existed at the time of acquisition. But the idea that slavery could ever be introduced into free territory, under the sanction of Congress, had not, as yet, entered into any man's head.

Senator Chase continued with his review, taking up the history of the Wilmot proviso. The North's position, he stated, was that territory already free, south of the Compromise line, should remain free. Therefore the free States defeated Senator Douglas's proposal

My general view upon this subject is simply this: Slavery is the subjection of one man to the absolute disposal of another man by force. Master and slave, according to the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and by the law of nature, are alike men, endowed by their Creator with equal rights. Sir, Mr. Pinckney was right when, in the Maryland House of Delegates, he exclaimed, "By the eternal principles of justice, no man in the State has a right to hold his slave for a single hour." Slavery then exists nowhere by the law of nature. Wherever it exists at all, it must be through the sanction and support of municipal or State legislation.

Upon this state of things the Constitution acts. It recognizes all men as persons. It confers no power, but, on the contrary, expressly denies to the Government of its creation all power to establish or continue slavery. Congress has no more power under the Constitution to make a slave than to make a king; no more power to establish slavery than to establish the Inquisition.

At the same time the Constitution confers no power on Congress; but, on the contrary, denies all power to interfere with the internal policy of any State, sanctioned and established by its own constitution and its own legislation, in respect to the personal relations of its inhabitants. The States under the Constitution are absolutely free from all interference by Congress in that respect, except, perhaps, in the case of war or insurrection; and may legislate as they please within the limitations of their own constitutions. They may allow slavery if they please, just as they may license other wrongs. But State laws, by which slavery is allowed and regulated, can operate only within the limits of the State, and can have no extra-territorial effect.

Sir, I could quote the opinions of Southern judges ad infinitum, in support of the doctrine that slavery is against natural right, absolutely dependent for existence or continuance upon State legislation. I might quote the scornful rejection by Randolph of all aid from the general Government to the institution of slavery within the States. I might quote the decision of the celebrated Chancellor George Wythe, of Virginia—overruled afterward, I know, in the court of appeals—that slavery was so against justice that the presumption of freedom must be allowed in favor of every alleged slave suing for liberty, and that the onus of proving the contrary rested upon the master.

I think I have now shown that the Ordinance of 1787, and to extend the line to the Pacific, with the effect that slavery would be introduced in all territory to the south, whatever its previous condition, whether slave or free.

The Senator then came to the Clay Compromise.

What, then, was the principle, if any, upon which this controversy was adjusted? Clearly this: That, when free territory is acquired, that part of it which is ready to come in as a free State shall be admitted into the Union, and that part which is not ready shall be organized into territorial governments, and its condition in respect to slavery or freedom shall be left in doubt during the whole period of its territorial existence.

It is quite obvious, Mr. President, how very prejudicial such a doubt must be to the settlement and improvement of the territory. But I must not pause upon this.

The truth is that the compromise acts of 1850 were not intended to introduce any principle of territorial organization applicable to any other Territory except that covered by them. The professed object of the friends of the compromise acts was to compose the whole slavery agitation. There were various matters of complaint. The non-surrender of fugitives from service was one. The existence of slavery and the slave trade here in this District and elsewhere, under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, was another. The apprehended introduction or prohibition of slavery in the Territories furnished other grounds of controversy. The slave States complained of the free States, and the free States complained of the slave States. It was supposed by some that this whole agitation might be stayed, and finally put at rest by skillfully adjusted legislation. So, sir, we had the Omnibus bill, and its appendages the Fugitive Slave bill, and the District Slave Trade Suppression bill. To please the North—to please the free States—California was to be admitted, and the slave depots here in the District were to be broken up. To please the slave States, a stringent fugitive slave act was to be passed, and slavery was to have a chance to get into the new Territories. The support of the Senators and Representatives from Texas was to be gained by a liberal adjustment of boundary, and by the assumption of a large portion of their State debt. The general result contemplated was a complete and final adjustment of all questions relating to slavery. The acts passed. A number of the friends of the acts signed a compact, pledging themselves to support no man for any office who would in any way renew the agitation. The country was required to acquiesce in the settlement as an absolute finality. No man concerned in carrying those measures through Congress, and least of all the distinguished man whose efforts mainly contributed to their success, ever imagined that in the territorial acts, which formed a part of the series, they were planting the germs of a new agitation. Indeed, I have proved that one of these acts contains an express stipulation which precludes the revival of the agitation in the form in which it is now thrust upon the country, without manifest disregard of the provisions of those acts themselves.

I have thus proved beyond controversy that the averment of the bill, which my amendment proposes to strike out, is untrue. Senators, will you unite in a statement which you know to be contradicted by the history of the country? Will you incorporate into a public statute an affirmation which is contradicted by every event which attended or followed the adoption of the compromise acts? Will you here, acting under your high responsibility as Senators of the States, assert as fact, by a solemn vote, that which the personal recollection of every Senator who was here during the discussion of those compromise acts disproves? I will not believe it until I see it. If you wish to break up the time-honored compact embodied in the Missouri compromise, transferred into the joint resolution for the annexation of Texas, preserved and affirmed by these compromise acts themselves, do it openly—do it boldly. Repeal the Missouri prohibition. Repeal it by a direct vote. Do not repeal it by indirection. Do not “declare” it “inoperative,” “because superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850.”

Senator Chase closed his speech with a philosophical analysis of the history of slavery in the country, dividing the period covered into eras. The Era of Emancipation was the first. It continued until the Louisiana Purchase, when, owing to the acquisition of territory where slavery already existed, it waned into the Era of Conservatism, in which the subject of slavery was “let alone,” e. g., the possession of slaves in Illinois was winked at, while the ordinance of 1787 was continued nominally in force.

The Era of Conservatism passed, also by imperceptible gradations, into the Era of Slavery Propagandism. Under the influences of this new spirit we opened the whole territory ject, to insist upon the practical application of its great principles in all the legislation of Congress.

I repeat, sir, that we who maintain these principles will stand shoulder to shoulder with the men who, differing from us upon other questions, will yet unite with us in opposition to the violation of plighted faith contemplated by this bill. There are men, and not a few, who are willing to adhere to the compromises of 1850. If the Missouri prohibition, which those compromises incorporate and preserve among their own provisions, shall be repealed, abrogated, broken up, thousands will say, Away with all compromises; they are not worth the paper on which they are printed; we will return to the old principles of the Constitution. We will assert the ancient doctrine, that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, by the legislation of Congress, without due process of law. Carrying out that principle into its practical applications, we will not cease our efforts until slavery shall cease to exist wherever it can be reached by the constitutional action of the Government.

Sir, I trust that the result of this discussion will show that the American Senate will sanction no breach of compact. Let us strike from the bill that statement which historical facts and our personal recollections disprove, and then reject the whole proposition which looks toward a violation of the plighted faith and solemn compact which our fathers made, and which we, their sons, are bound by every tie of obligation sacredly to maintain.

On the next day (February 4) Senator Dixon replied to Senator Chase. His chief argument was the familiar one that the Territories belonged in common to the people of the entire Union, and no discrimination, therefore, should be made against the South by Federal restriction of slavery therein.

The debate was renewed on February 6, Senator Wade having the floor. The Senator claimed that the “conspiracy” to overturn the Missouri compromise had been “hatched” within the previous six weeks. When the compromise of 1850 had been proposed the delicate question of whether or not it superseded the compromise of 1820 had been carefully avoided.

But, sir, notwithstanding their extraordinary silence, Senators have discovered that the legislation of 1850 had, in some acquired from Mexico, except California, to the ingress of slavery. Every foot of it was covered by a Mexican prohibition; and yet, by the legislation of 1850, we consented to expose it to the introduction of slaves. Under the evil influences of the same spirit, we are now called upon to reverse the original policy of the Republic; to subvert even a solemn compact of the conservative period, and open Nebraska to slavery.

Sir, I believe that we are upon the verge of another era. That era will be the Era of Reaction. The introduction of this question here, and its discussion, will greatly hasten its advent. We, who insist upon the denationalization of slavery, and upon the absolute divorce of the general Government from all connection with it, will stand with the men who favored the compromise acts, and who yet wish to adhere to them, in their letter and in their spirit, against the repeal of the Missouri prohibition. But you may pass it here. You may send it to the other House. It may become law. But its effect will be to satisfy all thinking men that no compromises with slavery will endure, except so long as they serve the interests of slavery; and that there is no safe and honorable ground for non-slaveholders to stand upon, except that of restricting slavery within State limits, and excluding it absolutely from the whole sphere of Federal jurisdiction. The old questions between political parties are at rest. No great question so thoroughly possesses the public mind as this of slavery. This discussion will hasten the inevitable reorganization of parties upon the new issues which our circumstances suggest. It will light up a fire in the country which may, perhaps, consume those who kindle it.

I cannot believe that the people of this country have so far lost sight of the maxims and principles of the Revolution, or are so insensible to the obligations which those maxims and principles impose, as to acquiesce in the violation of this compact. Sir, the Senator from Illinois tells us that he proposes a final settlement of all territorial questions in respect to slavery, by the application of the principle of popular sovereignty. What kind of popular sovereignty is that which allows one portion of the people to enslave another portion? Is that the doctrine of equal rights? Is that exact justice? Is that the teaching of enlightened, liberal, progressive democracy? No, sir; no! There can be no real democracy which does not fully maintain the rights of man, as man. Living, practical, earnest democracy imperatively requires us, while carefully abstaining from unconstitutional interference with the internal regulations of any State upon the subject of slavery, or any other sub-mysterious manner, superseded the most stern and stubborn law of Congress, which was formed upon a compromise as sacred as could be made between conflicting sections of this Union, and concurred in on all hands for at least one-third of a century. They declare that it is superseded by a new “principle.” Now, as a lawyer, I hardly know what a man means when he tells me that an act of legislation is superseded by a principle. I thought it took an act of Congress to repeal, or annul, or suspend, a former act.

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—I contend that by the acts of 1850 a great principle of self-government was substituted for a geographical line; and hence, by the use of the words “superseded by,” I mean which was “inconsistent with” the compromise of 1850. If the gentleman prefers the words “inconsistent with,” I will put them in with a great deal of pleasure, and that will avoid all the trouble in regard to the use of the word “supersede.”

SENATOR WADE.—The Senator made a very simple declaration in his speech upon this point. It was that the Missouri compromise was annulled to the extent to which Congress, in running the boundary lines of New Mexico and Utah, might take for the sake of convenience any little piece of territory which was covered by the Missouri compromise. That certainly was a truism; but the idea that the acts to organize Utah and New Mexico repealed or superseded the Missouri compromise as to the remainder of the territory acquired by the Louisiana cession is an idea from which I am glad to see that the gentleman now recedes.

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—Not at all.

SENATOR WADE.—What does the Senator mean, then, by saying that the Missouri compromise was superseded by the principles of the compromise measures of 1850? Suppose you run a line with your neighbor, and the line has become uncertain, and in order to straighten it you run another, and in running this other line may possibly take in a little land that belonged to him, or you may leave out a little belonging to yourself; if you find you have entered wrongfully on his land, does the principle of running that line supersede his title to the balance, and therefore can you lay title to the whole of his land? Indeed, the gentleman informed us, in the report, that this was a matter too grave even for Congress to decide, and much too grave for a committee, and therefore they would not do it; and yet in nineteen days afterward they come in with what is equivalent to a total repeal of the compromise.

I will not answer for the consequences of the legislation of this day, sir; but I anxiously desire to inquire if nothing can be established in this Government? Is there nothing too sacred to be overhauled for some miserable party or other purpose?

Why, sir, Henry Clay is scarcely in his grave before another generation comes up that knows not what he had done, and some even pretend that in what he himself did, in 1850, he seemed to concede that the compromise of 1820 was not to be lived up to. I tell the gentlemen there is not a word, nor a syllable, that goes to indicate that anyone supposed that anything was done then to overthrow the time-honored compromise of 1820. Not one word, sir; but, on the contrary, if they could recur to this compromise, they indorsed it and reaffirmed it in 1850 beyond all gainsaying.

But, sir, I need not refer further to the speech of the Senator from Illinois. My colleague [Mr. Chase] so entirely pulverized that speech that there is not enough of it left upon which a man can possibly hang an idea. [Laughter.] In fact, there was nothing to begin with. It was a bare afterthought; after the report of the committee had been made, and the bill had been altered, it was necessary to get up some other reason or pretext than was set forth in the report, in order to show why it was proposed to repeal the Missouri compromise.

Here is a Territory large as an empire. It is pure as nature; it is beautiful as the garden of God. There is nothing now to prevent us doing with it what will minister to the best interests of the people now and hereafter. Our forefathers expressed their opinion as to what was best to be done with it. They believed it should be fenced up from the intrusion of this accursed scourge of mankind, human slavery. They have done this effectually in this Territory. Shall we undo their work? The Southern States have had the benefit of the Missouri compromise for thirty years! Has any Northern man stepped forward, Senators of the South, to impair your rights in that compromise? No, sir, it is not pretended; and now the period is drawing near when that part of this great bargain which is beneficial to us at the North is approaching, and I call upon you as honorable men to fulfill it. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Dixon] told us that this came from the North, and therefore the South were absolved from their obligation. I must say I think you understand well that the North know nothing about this base conspiracy to betray them. When did it come up? Did you let it go before the people, that they might pass upon the question? Why, sir, in the presidential see a cloud, a little bigger now than a man's hand, gathering in the North, and in the West, and all around, and soon the whole northern heavens will be lighted up with a fire that you cannot quench. The indications of it are rife now in the heavens, and any man who is not blind can see it. There are meetings of the people in all quarters; they express their alarm, their dismay, their horror at the proposition which has been made here. You cannot make them believe that the thing is seriously contemplated here. How is it? You of the South, all of you, propose to go for repudiating this obligation. Do you not see that you are about to bring slavery and freedom face to face, to grapple for the victory, and that one or the other must die? I do not know that I ought to regret it, but I say to gentlemen you are antedating the time when that must come. It has always been my opinion that principles so entirely in opposition to each other, so utterly hostile and irreconcilable, could never exist long in the same Government.

I tell you, sir, if you precipitate such a conflict as that, it will not be liberty that will die in the nineteenth century. This is a progressive age; and if you make this fight you must be ready for the consequences. I regret it. I am an advocate for the continuance of this Union; but, as I have already said, I do not believe this Union can survive ten years the act of perfidy that will repudiate the great compromise of 1820.

On February 14, George E. Badger [N. C.] spoke as follows:

My position has never been an extreme one upon this subject. I was always content with the Missouri compromise line—always anxious for it—always voted for it; but my own individual opinion upon the subject always was that the principles adopted in 1850 are the true principles.

We have among us a population of three millions of slaves. They are here. They are slaves. They cannot remain here except as slaves. Everybody knows that. They cannot, by any operation of man's wit, be put into any situation in our country which will not be vastly more injurious to them, physically and morally, than the identical state and condition which they now occupy. They cannot be sent away. Where are your means to come from to make an exodus across the ocean of three millions of slaves—to buy them, and to remove them? And if you could buy them, and remove them, permit me to say that a more cruel act of tyranny and oppression could not election, triumphant as the Democracy were, I ask any gentleman of the North, suppose you had staked the election of Mr. Pierce upon this question, how many votes could he have received in the North? Not one. You gave us no notice of any such thing. The people of the North, even now, do not know what nefarious projects are afoot here in the Capitol. You of the South are not absolved, because one or two men, very honorable men, stand forth here and say, "I am ready to go in and make this monstrous proposition." Sir, in the days of the Revolution, Major André was hung by the neck until he was dead, for accepting a proposition not more base than this, which is a gross betrayal of the rights of the whole North.

Gentlemen seek to extend the market for human beings; and hence the object of this bill. I say it does not consist with the welfare of this Union to do so.

You may call me an abolitionist if you will; I care but little for that; for if an undying hatred to slavery or oppression constitutes an abolitionist, I am that abolitionist. Not, sir, that I ever went with that particular party; but I did not differ from them on these points; but because they did not make their opposition effectual, in my judgment; for I would have gone with those who would have reached your institutions, wherever the Constitution gave us a right to reach them, without encroaching one hair's breadth where we had no right. There I do not undertake, and never shall undertake, to trench, upon them. I admit that in the States you have full control over it. You may do with it as seems to you good. You never found me, you never found the party to which I belong in the North, pretending to do anything adverse to your right to make such laws and regulations with regard to this institution as you please. We hoped that you would see that the system did not work to your best advantage; we were in hopes you would see that a gradual system of emancipation, just such as made the vast difference between the progress of the State of New York and old Virginia, would wake up every sensible man to follow in the track, and to do likewise. We hoped that, but we claimed no right to interfere. You must do with this as seems to you good.

Mr. President, this is an exceedingly dangerous issue. I know the Senator from Kentucky said he did not think there would be very much of a storm after all. He was of opinion that the Northern mind would immediately lie down under it, that the North would do as they have frequently done, submit to it, and finally become indifferent in regard to it. But I tell the gentleman that I see indications entirely adverse to that. I be perpetrated upon any body of men. A very large proportion of them would reject with horror the idea of being transported to those barbarous and foreign climes of Africa, for which, though their fathers came from them, they cherish no feeling of attachment; for this is their country as well as ours.

What, then, are you going to do? Is it not obvious that the true policy, as well as the true Christian philanthropy, involved in this matter is to allow this population to diffuse itself in such portions of the Territories as from climate and soil are adapted to slave cultivation? You can have no injurious competition with your free labor. Slave labor will not be profitable, and largely employed anywhere, except upon the great staples of the South—tobacco, cotton, sugar, and rice. Will white men make these products for exportation? They will not. Will your Northern people compete with Southern slaves for the privilege of making rice, and sugar, and cotton, and tobacco? No, sir. Where that cultivation ceases, rely upon it, a slave population is not going to spread itself. We shall have no conflict, no embarrassment from the meeting of two tides of laborers from the North and South; for the kind of soil and climate which suits us and our slave cultivation does not suit yours.

Here, then, is the great fact we have to deal with. Why not let it adjust itself? Cease to quarrel and wrangle with each other. Live in your free States. Rejoice in the possession of the many advantages you have. But if there is a strip of land belonging to the United States, upon which a Southern planter can make cotton or sugar, why grudge it to him? He reduces no man from freedom to slavery in order to make it. He transfers his slaves from the banks of the Mississippi, or the Cooper, or the Cape Fear, or any of our Southern rivers, to another place; and he certainly will not do it unless the lands are better, the crops larger, and he and his slaves can live more comfortably, and have a more abundant supply of the necessities of life; and I will ask, in the name of Heaven, whom does it hurt? You love freedom. We do not ask you to make freemen slaves. You profess to have a regard for the black man; can you resist the only measure which can enable us to make a progressive improvement of his condition as the amount of black population increases?

I think, Mr. President, it is in the highest degree probable that, with regard to these Territories of Nebraska and Kansas, there will never be any slaves in them. It is possible some gentlemen may go there and take a few domestic servants with them; and I would say that if those domestic servants were faithful and good ones, and the masters did not take them with them, the masters would deserve the reprobation of all good men. What would you have them do? Would you have me to take the servants who wait upon me, and live with me, and to whom I have as strong attachments as to any human beings on this earth out of my own immediate relations and connections, and, because I want to move to Kansas, put them in the slave market and sell them? Sir, I would suffer my right arm to be cut off before I would do it. Why, therefore, if some Southern gentleman wishes to take the nurse that takes charge of his little baby, or the old woman that nursed him in childhood, and whom he called "mammy" until he returned from college, and perhaps afterward, too, and whom he wishes to take with him in her old age when he is moving into one of these new Territories for the betterment of the fortunes of his whole family, why, in the name of God, should anybody prevent it? Do you wish to force us to become hard-hearted slave dealers? Do you wish to aggravate the evils, if there are evils existing in this relation? Do you wish that we shall no longer have a mutual feudal feeling between our dependants and ourselves? Do you want to make us mercenary and hard-hearted? Or will you allow us, having, as I trust we have, some touch of humanity, and some of the beneficial and love-breathing spirit of Christianity, to let these beings go forth as they are accustomed to do, and us to rejoice when we look out and see our slaves happy and cheerful around us, when we hear the song arising from their dwellings at night, or see them dressed in their neat clothes and going to attend their churches on Sunday, and realizing, as they look at us, that we are the best friends they have upon earth?

To the "old mammy" argument Senator Wade replied pertinently: "We have not the least objection to the Senator's migrating to Kansas and taking his old mammy along with him. We only insist that he shall not be empowered to sell her after taking her there."

On February 17 William H. Seward [N. Y.] made a long and carefully prepared speech, in the beginning of which he thus paid his respects to Senator Badger:

The honorable and very acute Senator from North Carolina has wooed us most persuasively to waive our objections to the new principle, as it is called, of non-intervention, by assuring us that the slaveholder can use slave labor only where the soils and absurdity as was attributed to it yesterday by the Senator from Indiana [John Pettit]. Sir, it is a palpable fact that men are not born equal in physical strength or in mental capacities, in beauty of form or health of body. These mortal cloaks of flesh differ, as do these worldly garments. Diversity or inequality, in these respects, is the law of creation. But, as God is no respecter of persons, and as all are equal in his sight, whether Dives or Lazarus, master or slave, so are all equal in natural inborn rights; and pardon me if I say it is a vain sophism to adduce in argument against this vital axiom of Liberty the physical or mental inequalities by which men are characterized, or the unhappy degradation to which, in violation of a common brotherhood, they are doomed. To deny the Declaration of Independence is to rush on the bosses of the shield of the Almighty, which, in all respects, the supporters of this measure seem to do.

To the delusive suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Badger], that, by the overthrow of this prohibition, the number of slaves will not be increased; that there will be simply a beneficent diffusion of slavery, and not its extension, I reply at once that this argument, if of any value, would equally justify and require the overthrow of the prohibition of slavery in the free States, and, indeed, everywhere throughout the world. It is clear, beyond dispute, that, by the overthrow of this prohibition, slaves will be multiplied, while new "room and verge" will be secured for the gloomy operations of slave law, under which free labor will droop, and a vast territory be smitten with sterility. Sir, a blade of grass would not grow where the horse of Attila had trod; nor can any true prosperity spring up in the footprints of the slave.

But it is argued that slaves will not be carried into Nebraska in large numbers, and that, therefore, the question is of small practical moment. Sir, the census shows that it is of vital consequence. There is Missouri at this moment, with Illinois on the east and Nebraska on the west, all covering nearly the same spaces of latitude, and resembling each other in soil, climate, and productions. Mark now the contrast! By the potent efficacy of the ordinance of the Northwestern Territory, Illinois is now a free State, while Missouri has 87,422 slaves; and the simple question which challenges an answer is whether Nebraska shall be preserved in the condition of Illinois or surrendered to that of Missouri? Surely this cannot be treated lightly. But for myself, I am unwilling to measure the exigency of the proclimates favor the culture of tobacco, cotton, rice, and sugar. To which I reply: None of them find these congenial soils or climates at the sources of the Mississippi, or in the valleys of the Rocky Mountains. Why, then, does he want to remove the inhibition there?

But again: That Senator reproduces a pleasing fiction of the character of slavery from the Jewish history, and asks, Why not allow the modern patriarchs to go into new regions with their slaves, as their ancient prototypes did, to make them more comfortable and happy? And he tells us, at the same time, that this indulgence will not increase the number of slaves. I reply by asking, first, whether slavery has gained or lost strength by the diffusion of it over a larger surface than it formerly covered? Will the Senator answer that? Secondly, I quite admire the simplicity of the patriarchal times. But they nevertheless exhibited some peculiar institutions quite incongruous with modern republicanism, not to say Christianity; namely, that of a latitude of construction of the marriage contract, which has been carried by one class of so-called patriarchs into Utah. Certainly no one would desire to extend that peculiar institution into Nebraska. Thirdly, slaveholders have also a peculiar institution, which makes them political patriarchs. They reckon five of their slaves as equal to three freemen in forming the basis of Federal representation. If these patriarchs insist upon carrying their institution into new regions, north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes, I respectfully submit that they ought to reassume the modesty of their Jewish predecessors, and relinquish this political feature of the system they thus seek to extend. Will they do that?

On February 24, 1854, Senator Sumner delivered a long and eloquent address against the bill.

THE LANDMARK OF FREEDOM

SENATOR SUMNER

The primal truth of the equality of men, as proclaimed in our Declaration of Independence, has been assailed, and this great charter of our country discredited. Sir, you and I will soon pass away, but that will continue to stand, above impeachment or question. The Declaration of Independence was a Declaration of Rights, and the language employed, though general in its character, must obviously be restrained within the design and sphere of a Declaration of Rights, involving no such inhibition by the number of persons, whether many or few, whom it may protect. Human rights, whether in a vast multitude or a solitary individual, are entitled to an equal and unhesitating support.

And now, sir, in the name of that public faith which is the very ligament of civil society, and which the great Roman orator tells us it is detestable to break even with an enemy, I arraign this scheme, and hold it up to the judgment of all who hear me.

Sir, the proposition before you involves not merely the repeal of an existing law, but the infraction of solemn obligations originally proposed and assumed by the South, after a protracted and embittered contest, as a covenant of peace—with regard to the Louisiana Purchase. This arrangement in its stipulations for slavery was justly repugnant to the conscience of the North, and ought never to have been made; but it has on that side been performed. And now the unperformed outstanding obligations to freedom, originally proposed and assumed by the South, are resisted.

Years have passed since these obligations were embodied in the legislation of Congress and accepted by the country. This extraordinary lapse of time, with the complete fruition by one party of all the benefits belonging to it, under the compact, gives to the transaction an added and most sacred strength. Prescription steps in with new bonds to confirm the original work; to the end that, while men are mortal, controversies shall not be immortal. Death, with inexorable scythe, has mowed down the authors of this compact; but, with conservative hour-glass, it has counted out a succession of years, which now defile before us, like so many sentinels, to guard the sacred landmark of freedom.

A subtle German has declared that he could find heresies in the Lord's Prayer—and I believe it is only in this spirit that any flaw can be found in the existing obligations of this compact. As late as 1848, in the discussions of this body, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason], while condemning it in many aspects, says:

"Yet as it was agreed to as a compromise by the South for the sake of the Union, I would be the last to disturb it."

This act, under all the circumstances attending its passage, also by long acquiescence and the complete performance of its conditions by one party, has become a part of our fundamental law, irrepealable by any common legislation. As well might Congress at this moment undertake to overhaul the original purchase of Louisiana, as unconstitutional,¹ and now, on this account, thrust away that magnificent heritage, with all its cities, States, and Territories, teeming with civilization. The Missouri compact, in its unperformed obligations to freedom, stands at this day as impregnable as the Louisiana Purchase.

I appeal to Senators about me not to disturb it. I appeal to the Senators from Virginia to keep inviolate the compact made in their behalf by James Barbour and Charles Fenton Mercer. I appeal to the Senators from South Carolina to guard the work of John Gaillard and William Lowndes. I appeal to the Senators from Maryland to uphold the compromise which elicited the constant support of Samuel Smith, and was first triumphantly pressed by the unsurpassed eloquence of Pinkney. I appeal to the Senators from Delaware to maintain the landmark of freedom in the Territory of Louisiana, early espoused by Louis McLane. I appeal to the Senators from Kentucky not to repudiate the pledges of Henry Clay. I appeal to the Senators from Alabama not to break the agreement sanctioned by the earliest votes in the Senate of their late most cherished fellow-citizen, William Rufus King. Sir, I have heard of an honor that felt a stain like a wound. If there be any such in this chamber—as surely there is—it will hesitate to take upon itself the stain of this transaction.

Sir, Congress may now set aside this obligation, repudiate this plighted faith, annul this compact; and some of you, forgetful of the majesty of honest dealing, in order to support slavery, may consider it advantageous to use this power. To all such let me commend a familiar story: An eminent leader in antiquity, Themistocles, once announced to the Athenian Assembly that he had a scheme to propose highly beneficial to the state, but which could not be expounded to the many. Aristides, surnamed the Just, was appointed to receive the secret, and to report upon it. His brief and memorable judgment was that, while nothing could be more advantageous to Athens, nothing could be more unjust; and the Athenian multitude, responding at once, rejected the proposition. It appears that it was proposed to burn the combined Greek fleet, which then rested in the security of peace in a neighboring sea, and thus confirm the naval supremacy of Athens. A similar proposition is now brought before the American Senate. You are asked to destroy a safeguard of freedom, consecrated by solemn compact, under which the country is now reposing in the security of peace, and exist—but a mighty propagandist openly favoring and vindicating it; visiting, also, with displeasure all who oppose it.

The Senator then opposed the arguments in favor of the bill.

I am unwilling to admit, sir, that the prohibition of slavery in the Territories is, in any just sense, an infringement of the local sovereignty. Slavery is an infraction of the immutable law of nature, and, as such, cannot be considered a natural incident to any sovereignty, especially in a country which has solemnly declared, in its Declaration of Independence, the inalienable right of all men to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. In an age of civilization, and in a land of rights, slavery may still be tolerated in fact; but its prohibition, within a municipal jurisdiction, by the Government thereof, as by one of the States of the Union, cannot be considered an infraction of natural rights; nor can its prohibition by Congress in the Territories be regarded as an infringement of the local sovereignty, founded, as it must be, on natural rights.

But another argument is pressed, most fallacious in its character. It is asserted that, inasmuch as the Territories were acquired by the common treasure, they are the common property of the whole Union; and, therefore, no citizen can be prevented from moving into them with his slaves, without an infringement of the equal rights and privileges which belong to him as a citizen of the United States. But it is admitted that the people of this very Territory, when organized as a State, may exclude slaves, and in this way abridge an asserted right founded on the common property in the Territory. Now, if this can be done by the few thousand settlers who constitute the State government, the whole argument founded on the acquisition of the Territories by a common treasure seems futile and evanescent.

But this argument proceeds on an assumption which cannot stand. It assumes that slavery is a national institution, and that property in slaves is recognized by the Constitution of the United States. Nothing can be more false. By the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, and also by the principles of the common law, slavery is a local municipal institution, which derives its support exclusively from local municipal laws, and beyond the sphere of these laws it ceases to exist, except so far as it may be preserved by the clause for the rendition of fugitives from labor. Madison thought it wrong to admit into the Constitution the idea that there can be no property in man; and I rejoice to believe that no such idea can thus confirm the supremacy of slavery. To this institution and its partisans the proposition may seem to be advantageous; but nothing can be more unjust. Let the judgment of the Athenian multitude be yours.

Mr. President, it is not only as an infraction of solemn compact, embodied in ancient law, that I arraign this bill. I arraign it also as a flagrant and extravagant departure from the original policy of our fathers, consecrated by their lives, opinions, and acts.

Sir, the original policy of the country, begun under the Confederation, and recognized at the initiation of the new Government, is clear and unmistakable. Compactly expressed, it was non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the States, and its prohibition in all the national domain. In this way, the discordant feelings on this subject were reconciled. Slave masters were left at home in their respective States to hug slavery, under the protection of local laws, without any interference from Congress, while all opposed to it were exempted from any responsibility therefor in the national domain. This, sir, is the common ground on which our political fabric was reared; and I do not hesitate to say that it is the only ground on which it can stand in permanent peace.

But the original policy of the Government did not long prevail. The generous sentiments which filled the early patriots, giving to them historic grandeur, gradually lost their power. The blessings of freedom being already secured to themselves, the freemen of the land grew indifferent to the freedom of others. They ceased to think of the slaves. The slave masters availed themselves of this indifference, and, though few in numbers, compared with the non-slaveholders, even in the slave States (according to the late census they are fewer than three hundred thousand), they have, under the influence of an imagined self-interest, by the skillful tactics of party, and especially by an unhesitating, persevering union among themselves—swaying, by turns, both the great political parties—succeeded, through a long succession of years, in obtaining the control of the National Government, bending it to their purposes, compelling it to do their will, and imposing upon it a policy friendly to slavery; offensive to freedom only, and directly opposed to the sentiments of its founders. Our Republic has swollen in population and power; but it has shrunk in character. It is now what it was at the beginning, a republic merely permitting, while it regretted, slavery; tolerating it only where it could not be removed, and interdicting it where it did not be found there. The Constitution regards slaves always as "persons," with the rights of "persons," never as property. When it is said, therefore, that every citizen may enter the national domain with his property, it does not follow by any rule of logic or of law that he may carry his slaves. On the contrary, he can only carry that property which is admitted to be such by the universal law of nature, written by God's own finger on the heart of man.

Again. The relation of master and slave is sometimes classed with the domestic relations. Now, while it is unquestionably among the powers of any State, within its own jurisdiction, to change the existing relation of husband and wife, and to establish polygamy, I presume no person would contend that a polygamous husband, resident in one of the States, would be entitled to enter the national territory with his harem—his property, if you please—and there claim immunity. Clearly, when he passes the bounds of that local jurisdiction, which sanctions polygamy, the peculiar domestic relation would cease; and it is precisely the same with slavery.

Sir, I dismiss these considerations. The prohibition of slavery in the Territory of Nebraska stands on foundations of adamant, upheld by the early policy of the Fathers, by constant precedent and time-honored compact. It is now in your power to overturn it; you may remove the sacred landmark, and open the whole vast domain to slavery. To you is committed this high prerogative. Our fathers, on the eve of the Revolution, set forth in burning words among their grievances, that George III., "in order to keep open a market where men should be bought and sold, had prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or restrain this execrable commerce." Sir, like the English monarch, you may now prostitute your power to this same purpose. But you cannot escape the judgment of the world, nor the doom of history.

It will be in vain that, while doing this thing, you plead, in apology, the principle of self-government, which you profess to recognize in the Territories. Sir, this very principle, when truly administered, secures equal rights to all, without distinction of color or race, and makes slavery impossible. By no rule of justice, and by no subtlety of political metaphysics, can the right to hold a fellow-man in bondage be regarded as essential to self-government. The inconsistency is too flagrant. It is apparent on the bare statement. It is like saying two and two make three. In the name of liberty you open the door to slavery. With professions of equal rights on the lips, you trample on the rights of human nature. With a kiss upon the brow of that fair Territory you betray it to wretchedness and shame. Well did the patriot soul exclaim, in bitter words, wrung out by bitter experience: "Oh, liberty! what crimes are done in thy name!"

In vain, sir, you will plead that this measure proceeds from the North, as has been suggested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Dixon].

It is true that the race of men, "white slaves of the North," described and despised by a Southern statesman, is not yet extinct there. It is one of the melancholy tokens of the power of slavery, under our political system, and especially through the operations of the National Government, that it loosens and destroys the character of Northern men, even at a distance—like the black magnetic mountain in the Arabian story, under whose irresistible attraction the iron bolts, which held together the strong timbers of a stately ship, were drawn out, till the whole fell apart, and became a disjointed wreck. Alas! too often those principles, which give consistency, individuality, and form to the Northern character, which render it staunch, strong, and seaworthy, which bind it together as with iron, are drawn out, one by one, like the bolts of the ill-fated vessel, and from the miserable, loosened fragments is formed that human anomaly—a Northern man with Southern principles. Sir—no such man can speak for the North.

[Here there was an interruption of prolonged applause in the galleries.]

Mr. President, pass this bill, and it will be in vain that you say the slavery question is settled. Sir, nothing can be settled which is not right. Nothing can be settled which is adverse to freedom. God, nature, and all the holy sentiments of the heart repudiate any such false seeming settlement.

On the contrary, defeat the bill and you will most truly promote the harmony which you so much desire. You will establish tranquillity throughout the country. Then, at last, sir, the slavery question will be settled. Banished from its usurped foothold under the National Government, slavery will no longer enter, with distracting force, into the national politics—making and unmaking laws, making and unmaking Presidents. Confined to the States, where it was left by the Constitution, it will take its place as a local institution—if, alas! continue it must!—for which we are in no sense responsible, and against which we cannot exert any political power. We shall be relieved from our present painful and irritating connection with horrors of the French Revolution, in all their frantic ferocity and cruelty, will be nothing compared to the consequences which must flow from such a state of things. The effort to confound castes between whom God has made an indelible distinction would but result in the destruction of one, or the base degradation of the higher class. It is presumptuous, arrogant, and criminal to deal with such elements in the spirit which has manifested itself in the speeches of the gentleman to whom I have referred.

Liberty! Sir, liberty is like fire, which may be used either to warm and preserve the temple in which it is kindled, or to be the means of its destruction. It may be an object of worship, or it may be a means of destruction. They who hold their hands in solemn worship at the fires of Vesta occupy a very different place from those who would light firebrands upon her altar to illuminate the temple in which they have none of the rights of priesthood, nor the spirit of worshippers. They are profane intruders, who cannot perceive the difference between dangerous heat and pure light—such as are willing to fire the edifice, in the belief that it might afford the light of delusive salvation.

There was a remark made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Chase] which struck me with more astonishment than any. It was that this bill ought to be defeated, because the slaveholder with his laborers, in the form of slaves, would pollute the soil upon which they settled, and might, by such settlement, exclude foreigners as well as citizens from the non-slaveholding States.

Why, sir, the slaveholder, with his slaves well governed, forms a relation that is innocent enough, and useful enough. I believe that it is a population which Iowa to-morrow would prefer to an inundation of those men coming as emigrants from a foreign country, wholly unacquainted with the institutions of this country.

I am told, however, Mr. President, by another Senator from Ohio [Mr. Wade], who, it seems to me, has taken very contradictory positions, as have the other gentlemen who have sustained him, that the black man, under the sentimental idea contained in the Declaration of Independence, has a right to claim an equality with the white man; and I think that honorable Senator said that, but for his degradation by the master, he would elevate himself to that equality. According to the argument of these gentlemen, at one moment he is the equal of the master and entitled to claim the franchises of a civilized freeman, but the next moment he is so degraded that he pollutes the very

it. The existing antagonism between the North and South will be softened; crimination and recrimination will cease; the wishes of the Fathers will be fulfilled, and this great evil be left to the kindly influences of morals and religion, and the prevailing laws of social economy.

The North and the South, sir, as I fondly trust, amid all differences of opinion, will ever have a hand and a heart for each other; and, believing in the sure prevalence of almighty truth, I confidently look forward to the good time when both will unite, according to the sentiments of the Fathers and the true spirit of the Constitution, in declaring freedom and not slavery national, while slavery and freedom shall be sectional. Then will be achieved that Union, contemplated at the beginning, against which the storms of faction and the assaults of foreign power shall beat in vain, as upon the Rock of Ages; and Liberty, seeking a firm foothold, will have at last whereon to stand and move the world.

Senator Butler replied to Senator Sumner upon the same day.

SENTIMENTALITY VS. STATESMANSHIP

SENATOR BUTLER

After premising that he would (1) show that the Missouri compromise was, instead of a soothing salve, a thorn in the body of the South; (2) that, whatever benefit there was in it to the South had been nullified, and (3) was unconstitutional, he addressed himself to answering Senator Sumner.

I might begin by adopting the remark quoted by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

"Oh, Liberty! what crimes have been committed in thy name!"

The blood that lay in pools around the posts of the guillotine would make a historical response, but there may have been, with the French people, some excuse, at least, for their excesses. If, however, the efforts of fanatical organization shall result as that honorable Senator has indicated they must result in breaking down the distinction between the black and the white man, and elevating one, or degrading the other, to an equality, the soil on which he stands, making it offensive to the white man to be even in his territorial neighborhood. The gentleman said, however, notwithstanding all this, he guessed there would be no difference in the races in the sight of God.

Sir, I will not invade the province of God. I will not undertake to say in what point of view the white and the black man may be regarded at the bar of His tribunal. I should regard it as profanity in me to do so. Inequality pervades the creation of this universe.

Yes, sir, with a chain of subordinate links and gradation, all existence upon this earth is connected together, from the lowest worm that crawls upon the earth to the purest angel that burns before the altar of God. Inequality seems to characterize the administration of the providence of God. I will not undertake to invade that sanctuary, but I will say that the abolitionists cannot make those equal whom God has made unequal, in human estimation. That He has made the blacks unequal to the whites, human history, as far as it can take cognizance of the matter, has pronounced its uniform judgment. The judgment of the earth and the history of mankind lead to but one judgment—revealing to us, perhaps, a melancholy truth.

Now, sir, what is the truth in relation to this matter? I am perfectly willing that the blindest fanatic should hear me in regard to it. I should be perfectly willing that even William Lloyd Garrison should hear me. He sends me his paper, and I sometimes read it as a mere matter of curiosity. I am perfectly willing that the blindest fanatic upon earth should hear me upon this subject. Is the black man equal with the white man under human judgment? All history refutes it. Who ever heard of the African astronomer, statesman, general, poet? Who ever heard of the African soaring in those regions in which the Caucasian race have made their greatest developments? Is it not perfectly true, so far as regards the statutory provisions of the Federal and State legislation, that the black man has never been, and never can be, equal with the white man? In your naturalization laws it is provided that none but a white man shall be a citizen of the United States. Under your militia laws, none but a white man can take a musket in the service of the country, or be enrolled among the militia. It is notorious that those very gentlemen who bestow so much tongue-expressed philanthropy upon the black man do not themselves regard him as an equal, and they cannot so regard him.

I appeal to those who hear me, if gentlemen who have gone to the South, who have lived amid slaveholders, who have partaken of their hospitality, and have seen the administration of justice and all the graver forms of civilization there, are not better reconciled to the institution of slavery than that class and school of persons who read and take in their notions from "Uncle Tom's Cabin"?

Sir, there are various isms at the North, and there is but one of them for which I have any respect, and that is Puritanism. The Puritan, who came to this country with the sword in one hand and the Bible in the other, was an honest man, though he may have made a mistake in some of his peculiarities; but when we come to Abolitionism, to Maine-liquor-law-ism, to Strong-minded-woman-ism, Bloomerism, and all the isms which now pervade some portions of the North, I am far from supposing that they do infuse into the social system anything like a healthful action. No, sir; they are the cankers of theoretical conceit, of impudent intrusion, and cheerless infidelity.

The most extraordinary development of that class of persons and that temper of society that gives rise to such isms is to be found in conventions of women, who step from the sphere prescribed to them by God, to enter into the political arena, and claim the rights of men. I have a profound respect for woman in all the true relations for which she is fitted. Man always has a respect for woman. So long as she confines herself within the jurisdiction prescribed to her by the Almighty, she fulfills the ends of her existence; but when she passes those lines, and undertakes to intrude herself into a jurisdiction not assigned to her, I regard her as committing an impious transgression. Her sphere is higher than that of man—more sublime in spirit, and more useful in moulding society to the obligations of virtue, the influence of religion, and the happiness of affection and friendship. Hers is the sphere of love, and affection, and benevolence. What bounds are there to the sphere of a mother's love, a daughter's and sister's tenderness, or a wife's devotion? I know of none. Washington Irving has beautifully remarked, that the "heart is the woman's world." It is there her ambition should seek for empire, and her avarice seek for hidden treasures. But when she unsexes herself, and puts on the habiliments and claims to exercise the masculine functions of man in society, she has lost the position which she should occupy. When woman violates the law which God has given her, she has no law, and is the creature of hateful anarchy. She may be the worst or the best of human beings. She may approach the angel, or she may assimilate herself to the demon.

The motion of Senator Chase to strike out the clause stating that the restriction of slavery in the Missouri Compromise had been "superseded" was defeated on February 6 by a vote of 30 to 13. Senator Douglas then moved to substitute for the clause the following one:

—which being inconsistent with the principles of non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories, as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, is hereby declared inoperative and void, it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

This was adopted on February 15 by a vote of 35 to 10.

On March 2 Senator Chase moved to add to this clause the words:

"Under which the people of the Territory, through their appropriate representatives, may, if they see fit, prohibit the existence of slavery therein."

This was voted down by 36 nays to 10 yeas. The bill was passed on March 3 by a vote of 37 to 14.

In the House, says Horace Greeley in his "American Conflict," this bill was not taken up for more than two months after it had passed the Senate. There were scruples to vanquish, objections to remove or to soften, and machinery to adjust, in order to give the measure a chance of success. Meantime, the hum of public dissatisfaction rose louder and louder, and members who were soon to face Northern constituents were reasonably reluctant to vote for it, unless the Democratic majorities in their districts were well-nigh impregnable.

A House bill (nearly a copy of that of Senator Douglas) having been reported on January 31 by Mr. Richardson [Ill.], from the Committee on Territories, William H. English [Ind.]—a most unflinching Democrat—from the minority of said committee, proposed to strike

Senator Butler then paid his respects to Senator Seward, who had elevated himself to the position of protagonist of the anti-slavery cause, chiefly by his enunciation of the "higher law" of obedience to the dictates of conscience rather than to human statutes when the two are in conflict. Senator Seward first used this phrase in March, 1850, in a speech on the Omnibus bill.

I must, Mr. President, deny the claim of the Senator from New York to be the author of the law which he undertakes to administer or propagate. Sir, the teacher of that law was an ancient author. It was no less than the serpent who crept into the Garden of Eden and whispered to Eve that there was a higher law. She was banished from the Garden, and Paradise was lost.

At the close of his speech, having elaborated the propositions of his premise, Senator Butler praised Senator Douglas, the author of the bill, for his tactful presentation of it to the Senate and his energy in pressing it to a decision.

A wise man knows how to take advantage of circumstances—in common phrase, to strike when the iron is hot. You had better do a right thing than to content yourself by saying it ought to be done. Words produce wrangle; acts require affirmation or opposition.

If the honorable Senator from Illinois has shown that address, and that judgment, and that wisdom, let him have the honor of it. I know the aspersions which have been thrown upon him. He does not need support from me. He is sustained by his own State. But, sir, the difference between rashness and timidity was never better illustrated than in the conversation between Telemachus and Mentor. Telemachus noticed that Mentor trembled in the consideration of a measure, but became steady after his resolution to pursue it. "Why is this?" said the young man. The reply was, "I may well have trembled, because I saw the danger; but when resolved to meet it I armed myself with the resolution that would enable me to go through with success, or at once to perish." Sir, the Senator from Illinois has embarked upon this question, knowing its perils; and if he shall be sustained by the country he deserves the honor of success.

out the clause which we have seen reported by Mr. Douglas to the Senate, and adopted by that body, repealing the 8th section of the Missouri act, and insert instead the following:

"Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prevent the people of said Territory, through the properly constituted legislative authority, from passing such laws, in relation to the institution of slavery, as they may deem best adapted to their locality, and most conducive to their happiness and welfare; and so much of any existing act of Congress as may conflict with the above right of the people to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

It is highly probable that this proposition could not have been defeated on a call of the yeas and nays in the House—which was doubtless the reason why it was never acted on. The House bill was never taken up, save at a late day (May 8), so as to enable the Senate bill to be moved as an amendment.

There was a violent struggle in the House for and against closing the debate on this measure, and it was finally agreed that said debate should terminate on Saturday, May 20.

When the hour for closing the debate had arrived, Alexander H. Stephens [Ga.] moved that the enacting clause of the bill be stricken out, which was carried by a preconcerted and uncounteracted rally of the unflinching friends of the measure. Of course, all pending amendments were thus disposed of, the bill being reported as dead. Having thus got the bill out of committee and before the House, Messrs. Stephens & Co. voted, by 117 yeas to 97 nays, not to agree to the report of the Committee of the Whole, thus bringing the House to an immediate vote on the engrossment of the bill. Mr. Richardson now moved an amendment in the nature of a substitute (being, in effect, the Senate's bill), and thereupon called the previous question, which was seconded: Yeas, 116; nays, 90; when his amendment was adopted—yeas, 116; nays, 95; the bill ordered to be engrossed—yeas, 112; nays, 99; the previous question again ordered and sustained, and the bill finally passed: Yeas, 113; nays, 100. Thus the opponents of the measure in the House were precluded from proposing any amendments or modifications whatever, when it is morally certain that, had they been permitted to do so, some such amendment as Senator Chase's or Mr. English's would have been carried.

The free States contributed 44 votes—all cast by Democrats—to the support of this measure. From the slave States, 12 Whigs and 57 Democrats sustained it. Against it were 91 members from free States, of whom 44 were chosen as Whigs, three as "Free Soil" proper, and 44 as Democrats. So that precisely as many Democrats from free States voted for as against the final passage of the Nebraska bill. Only nine members from slave States opposed it, of whom but two had been regarded as Democrats; and of these Thomas H. Benton [Mo.] was not so regarded thereafter. Of the Whigs who so voted, but two were returned to the next House.

The bill had thus passed the House in form as an original measure of that body, although it was in essence the amended Senate bill. Being sent to the Senate as such, an attempt to amend was voted down, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, by 35 yeas to 13 nays. It was immediately passed (on May 24, 1854) and, being approved by President Pierce, became a law of the land.

At the time he proposed to Senator Dixon the repeal of the Missouri compromise Senator Douglas had prophesied that he would be reviled and, perhaps, even mobbed by his constituents for introducing the measure, but he had declared that he would carry out the project for the sake of the Union whatever might be the consequences to himself.

The results justified his prediction. The entire press and public sentiment of Chicago, his home city, were arrayed solidly against him. Nevertheless he boldly faced his fellow citizens. The term of his colleague, General James Shields, was about to expire and, in order to obtain a majority of the Illinois legislature favorable to his reelection, Senator Douglas went to Chicago in September and attempted to make a speech justifying the course of Shields and himself. He was unable to make himself heard, owing to the hoots and jeers of his audience. He thereupon announced that he would speak in the State capitol on October 5. He did so, presenting in varied and more popular form the arguments he had delivered in the Senate. At the close of his address it was announced that a reply would be made to it on the following day by Abraham Lincoln. Lincoln's opposition in Congress to the Mexican war had been so unpopular with his "jingo" Western constituency that he not only refused to stand for reelection but resolved to devote himself exclusively to the law, wherein he speedily obtained local preëminence. Probably fearing that he might be impelled to break his resolution and to reënter politics he did not join his townsmen as they crowded into the State capitol to hear the bold and brilliant man who had kindled into its fiercest flame the now lambent, now latent, but ever-living issue of early American politics. However, he was irresistibly drawn to the meeting, and entered the Hall of Representatives in which it was held shortly before the close of Douglas's remarks. He probably had not realized before how deeply he felt on the violation of the national pledge in regard to the restriction of slavery in the Territories, but the sophistry of the advocate of this violation, the very sight of one toward whom he had been on principle an inveterate antagonist and whom he believed with all his heart to be the prince of demagogues,¹ caused him to throw to the winds all selfish personal considerations and, in default of an available statesman of Douglas's rank, to enter the lists himself against the redoubtable "Little Giant" as the champion of national faith and human freedom.

On the day appointed Lincoln spoke for three hours,

¹ Lincoln's mantle of "charity for all" was not wide enough to cover the "Little Giant" in the ante-bellum days. Later Lincoln learned that he had misjudged his fellow statesman. This was at the testing of souls in the spring of 1861, when Douglas came to the sorely troubled President and offered his whole-hearted services to the Union cause—an earnest of which he gave soon after in a speech at Chicago, which was the most eloquent of his career as well as his last, since he died a few weeks after delivering it.
